Sir, said Mr. P., we have been told, in language not to be misunderstood, coming directly from the Executive chamber, and communicated to this body through honorable Senators who speak by authority, that the present alarming condition of the country is to remain unchanged, and that the appeals which have been so forcibly and so feelingly made from all quarters, for the adoption of some measure which shall restore a sound circulating medium, and reinstate credit and confidence, are to remain unanswered; that the President, holding in his own hands the power to control the legislative department, is unalterably fixed in his determination to turn a deaf ear to the complaints of his oppressed and suffering countrymen. The die is cast. The currency can no longer be regulated by the representatives of the people; the petitions and memorials which flow in upon us from all classes of our fellow-citizens can no longer be addressed to Congress for grave and solemn deliberation, with any prospect of ultimate success in the redress of their grievances; but we must bow down in humble submission to the arbitrary will of an imperial power, claiming to wield the destinies of the nation in defiance of all the other departments of the Government. The powerful arm of the Executive, backed by popular delusion and party discipline, is arrayed in opposition to the constitution and laws of the country, and threatens, by force or fraud, to destroy the beauty and symmetry, the checks and balances so essential to the preservation of liberty and the free institutions of which we have so proudly boasted. Be it so. If a majority of the American people can be induced, by a misplaced confidence in men, to sanction the invasions of the constitution which are now in a course of practical operation, the effects of which have already been felt with most signal severity, and must continue to augment the public distress beyond the point of endurance, the remedy is only to be found in the people themselves, when they shall arouse from their slumbers, and, in the majesty of their strength, punish the daring usurper who has trampled upon their rights, and spread among them the desolation of misery and ruin.

The wisdom which experience teaches, is the surest guide to human action, and, sooner or later, it must bring the people of this country to the exercise of sober reflection, disinterested patriotism, and, as a necessary consequence, to proper conclusions in the management of their own affairs. The result cannot be doubted, sir. I have been drawn into this incidental debate, by some remarks which fell from the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] in relation to the recent curtailments of the discounts of the Bank of the United States at several of its branches, located in the Western States. The honorable gentleman complains of the conduct of the directors of that institution, for having called on its debtors at Pittsburg and Nashville, between which places intimate commercial intercourse is said to be carried on, to reduce their accommodations below the sum at which they stood prior to the late movement of the President in removing the public deposits. The Senator has referred to the Treasury statements to show, that while Pittsburg had been required to reduce five hundred thousand dollars of its debt to the bank, in the course of a few months, and Nashville had been pressed for a still greater amount of reduction, the discounts on domestic bills of exchange had not been diminished, but rather increased, at the branch located at Natchez. The honorable gentleman has ventured (doubtless without any evidence of the fact, for he did not vouch for its truth) to ascribe this circumstance to my personal influence with the directors at Philadelphia, and its exertion in behalf of the State which I in part represent in the Senate. The honorable gentleman is mistaken. I hold no communication with any director or stockholder of the Bank of the United States, in reference to the management of its money transactions; nor have I, at any time in my life, written a line to an individual director or stockholder on the subject of rechartering the bank, or received one, asking my support of that measure. The honorable gentleman, I am sure, did not mean to impute to me any unworthy connexion with the bank; and I am very certain his claims to the favor of those who manage its concerns, on the score of past political support, are much higher than any to which I can pretend. I have occasionally sold to the bank bills of exchange, for my own accommodation, which, if that medium had not existed, I should have sold to some local bank or broker. These bills have been duly honored, and paid at maturity, and so the matter ended. But, by an experiment of that kind lately made, I find that I am now taxed two and a half per cent. for facilities heretofore afforded me at a much smaller premium. This, I presume, is one of the blessings which we are to enjoy under the reform system of providing a safe and sound currency, for which we are so much indebted to him "who shuns no responsibility," and his duplicate cabinet advisers. I do not credit the idea that the directors of the bank could be influenced, by considerations of personal favor, to relax the vigilant course which it has been compelled to adopt for its own security and safety. The existing pressure in the money market can only be traced to causes over which that much abused institution had no agency or control. The honorable Senator is perhaps unacquainted with the causes which operated to swell the amount of domestic bills discounted at the Natchez branch during the past autumn. I will endeavor to satisfy him on that point. That city is a place of pretty extensive trade, situated in the centre of a rich and highly cultivated cotton region.

During the period at which this staple article of the South is in progress of delivery and shipment, business at Natchez assumes more animation than usual. The planter who consigns his cotton to a commission merchant at New Orleans, often wishes to anticipate the sale of his crop; and to effect it, he draws on his merchant for one-half or two-thirds of the estimated value of the cotton in market, at thirty or sixty days, which enables the merchant to take the chance of an advance, and obtain a fair price for the article. These domestic bills, in the course of the season, might well amount to several millions of dollars; they are discounted at the local State banks, or at the Branch Bank of the United States: the latter is usually preferred, because it does not charge by one-half per cent. or perhaps one per cent. so high a rate of exchange as some of the State banks. It is a short process, and highly beneficial to the bank; for, besides the profits arising from discounts, it places in the branch at New Orleans, a large amount of acceptances, redeemable at periods of from one to two months, founded on the solid basis of the great staple product of that market; and the capital thus put in circulation at Natchez, operates to strengthen the more important branch at New Orleans. It collects these acceptances in specie, or the notes of the State banks, at its option. Heretofore, either mode of payment would have been equally acceptable: how it is in that respect now, I do not know, but I think it probable that, in the present deranged state of the currency, specie may, in most cases, be demanded. The funds of the bank so transferred from Natchez to New Orleans, are replaced from time to time, for the accommodation of the country, without risk or inconvenience, and while the operation gives activity to enterprise and industry, it adds strength and stability to the bank through which it is carried on. I have no doubt that one-half, or perhaps more, of the amount of bills of this class, reported in the last returns, have already been redeemed. These money transactions are of short duration, and are limited to the cotton season.

The State from which I come, has, I am informed, experienced less distress from the prevailing pressure, than many other parts of the country. I am happy to hear that it is so; but her day of reckoning is to come, and may not be far distant. Most assuredly, if the present state of things shall continue unmitigated; if no step shall be taken to restore credit and confidence to their former healthful condition, we shall not be among the fortunate few who may escape the calamities brought on the country by the mad schemes of undisciplined ambition. I am glad to find my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] has been undeceived as to the general distress which is felt at Pittsburg. He assured us, on a former occasion, that his friends and neighbors were wholly exempt from the sufferings and embarrassments of which we heard so much from the commercial cities on the seaboard. He seemed to have brought his mind to the conclusion that those complaints were confined to the commercial cities in the vicinity of the Bank of the United States; to chambers of commerce, and importing merchants; all others he thought were prosperous and contented.

But very soon after the honorable gentleman presented to us this glowing picture of the flourishing condition of the city of his residence, the cry of distress and ruin reached his ear, in tones not to be mistaken or disregarded. The industry of that great manufacturing town is paralyzed; their spindles "stand still," and their looms are unharnessed. It is not more lamentable than true, that at this moment labor of every description languishes, and the artisan looks in vain for the rewards which have, in better times, filled the measure of his highest expectations.

Yes, sir, I will tell the honorable Senator that I have letters now before me, from highly intelligent and respectable gentlemen in Pittsburg, communicating facts which leave no doubt of the actual distress which is felt there. I will not consume the time of the Senate by reading these letters; they are substantially of the same import with the one read this morning by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] The Senator from Pennsylvania has hitherto moved steadily with the advocates of protection to domestic manufactures; his constituents have looked to him as the unwavering friend of that branch of industry, in the success of which they feel the deepest interest. Can the honorable gentleman look on its downfall without emotions of sorrow and regret? Can he witness its embarrassments without compunction and remorse? If not, he ought to be admonished by the information which we daily receive of the deleterious consequences to that important interest, resulting from the ill advised action of the Government on our fiscal affairs; (I speak of the Government as it is now familiarly understood to mean the President alone); the honorable Senator ought to raise his voice to sustain the policy of which he has been the patron and advocate, and, if possible, to remove the obstructions interposed by Executive power to impede its march to full maturity and manhood. The honorable gentleman cannot be uninformed of the actual condition of the cotton manufacturers at Pittsburgh; of the extensive curtailments which have, in a few weeks, been made in the business of their factories, and of the causes which have produced this state of things. If these causes are not arrested, they must lead to a further decline in that branch of domestic manufactures, and of many other branches requiring the aid of capital to keep them in successful operation. The honorable gentleman is assuredly better acquainted with the wants of his constituents than I am, but I trust he will not deem me obtrusive in the suggestions which I have thrown out for his consideration.

The universal panic, and the consequent depression in the trade and industry of the country, are now too palpable to be denied. It is reluctantly admitted by honorable gentlemen who attempt to sustain the recent disastrous measure of the President. They, however, seek to evade the "responsibility" of having brought on the people these disasters, by turning round on the institution which they have endeavored to crush, and gravely charging on it all the mischiefs of their own weak and vindictive policy. If the cry of distress is heard throughout the land, and its echo reaches our ears within these walls, honorable Senators remain unmoved by the sound, and the only response which they condescend to give their complaining fellow-citizens, is, "You must endure your sufferings with fortitude and patience, to enable the 'old Roman' to consummate his glory in this war of extermination which he has waged against the bank. The monster must be strangled; the tyrant must be humbled at the feet of the President; the bank could relieve the country, but it will not, and therefore down with it. The bank is using its money to purchase support, and, by producing a pressure, to force the Government to renew its charter." Sir, I listen to this inflammatory tirade with ineffable disgust; I see in it the deceptive guises which have been hitherto so successfully employed to deceive and mislead the American people, by those who infest the council chamber of the Executive, and abuse the confidence reposed in them, by exciting his passions and prejudices, when they can be turned to a good account for the accomplishment of their own selfish and fraudulent purposes. It is manifest, sir—no one can doubt it, who will candidly examine all the facts connected with the subject—that the present critical posture of our public affairs owes its origin to a band of political jugglers, combined with speculators in the stocks, who hope to profit by a deranged state of the national currency, and the downfall of the Bank of the United States. These are the precious materials of which the composition of cabinets is formed, above and below stairs, by whom the finger of the President is pointed; who direct and control his judgment, and adapt it to the consummation of their plans of ambition and avarice. The Secretary of the Treasury has relieved Congress from the arduous constitutional duty of regulating the currency; he has taken the power into his own hands, by authority, and his reformed system has been submitted to us, not for our ratification, for we are told it cannot be touched or amended; but I presume we may be allowed to admire its profound wisdom. The first step which he proposed to take in the extensive range of his plans, was to put his feet on the "reptile" bank, which had committed the unpardonable sin of offending the majesty of "the Government." He indulged the confident belief that, by withdrawing nine millions of deposits from its vaults, he could, by the use which he intended to make of this large capital, in connexion with certain selected State banks, or "pet banks," as they are called, compel the Bank of the United States to wind up its affairs, cease its operations, and withdraw altogether from the field of competition.

The announcement was made by one whose authority in these matters is quite equal to that of the Secretary himself, that, for forty days next following the first day of October last, the bank could "exist only by the forbearance of the Secretary of the Treasury," and great forbearance, indeed, it would require to enable it to survive that short period of time. This boasting giant was to be humbled in the dust under the feet of our good Secretary, and on its ruins was to rise up a galaxy of State banks, more efficient, more sound, and able to supply a better circulating medium to the country than that which he was about to prostrate and throw out of existence. Sir, the experiment was fairly made; the power of the Executive was pushed to its utmost extreme, regardless of constitution or law; and how has it resulted? The astonished Secretary, after laying violent hands on the bank, discovered that he had caught a Tartar. This unmanageable Tartar was found to be too strong to be forced out of his position, and, what was still worse, the Secretary could not get along without his permission. The forty days have gone by, months have rolled on, the nine millions have been abstracted from their only lawful place of deposit for the public convenience and safety; the solemn farce is ended, and the bank still lives, unshorn of its strength, rich in its resources, and high in the confidence of the whole community, from one extremity of the Union to the other. The pet banks implore the aid of their new master, the Secretary of the Treasury; he tells them, "Be patient my friends, the transfer drafts are exhausted; nothing remains but the pension fund, and that is claimed under pretence of some law; but we will never retrace our steps, our chieftain is unskilled in retreat; better suffer the ills that are upon us, than confess our errors, and be driven in disgrace from our high places." The suffering people must be appeased; they are loud and clamorous in their complaints.

And what, sir, is the new attitude assumed to rescue the Executive from public scorn and indignation? Why, tell the people that the bank has been the cause of all the distress which they feel, and ask them to unite with the President to put down the monster which is capable of producing so great a pressure on the country. There are no means of escape but by diverting public attention from the Government, and fixing it on the bank. Sir, this attempt, full of treachery and deception, is resorted to as the only desperate expedient in the last agonies of expiring despotism. Let us cast our recollections a few years back, and trace the progress of Executive denunciations against the Bank of the United States, and their effects on the currency and commercial operations. As early as December, 1829, the present Chief Magistrate, in his annual message to Congress, expressed, very decisively, his opinion that the charter of the bank was inconsistent with the powers vested in Congress by the constitution; he invited the immediate attention of Congress to the subject, that it might be put at rest by a refusal to re-charter the institution.

The directors of the bank, and every stockholder, felt this blow aimed at its credit, and even its existence, so far as Executive influence could produce these results. Did this movement of the President cause any pressure in the money market, or any derangement of the currency? None, sir. The bank pursued the even tenor of its way, went on to accommodate merchants and others to the extent of its means, and the country remained tranquil, undisturbed by the question raised in the message. The same opinion and recommendation were repeated by the President in his two succeeding annual messages. All this produced no pressure. The bank continued unmoved to grant the necessary facilities to commerce, and to furnish a sound currency throughout the Union. What next? Why, sir, the directors, after the third invitation of the President, ventured to approach Congress, and respectfully ask a renewal of the charter, with such modifications and on such conditions as might be deemed just and equitable.

The President had, over and over again, declared that it was high time the question was settled. But what was the course of the administration, when a bill was reported to renew the charter of the bank for a limited time? Sir, the friends of the President, in both Houses of Congress, and the organized press in the pay of the administration, from Maine to Louisiana, denounced the conduct of the president and directors of the bank, and charged them with motives of hostility to General Jackson, on the mere presentation of their memorial; and with a design of interfering in the election of President and Vice President of the United States, which was to take place in the fall of '32, by bringing the subject before Congress at that time, although their attention had been called to it two years before by the President himself, with an urgent request that they would give it an early consideration! So much for the duplicity thus practised, to place the incumbent before the nation as a candidate for re-election to the Presidency, in such an attitude, that, with suitable reservations and exceptions, he might be defended in different quarters of the Union, either as the friend or enemy of the bank, according to the political complexion of the community, in which either ground might be assumed. The bank made no reply to these unfounded imputations, cast on it by interested parties, and finally carried out by the unwarrantable usurpation on the chartered rights of the corporation. Congress, after much debate and great deliberation, passed the bill to re-charter the bank by respectable majorities in both branches of the legislature. The public voice, thus announced through the immediate representatives of the people, was disregarded; by the uncalled for and wanton exercise of the veto power, the bill was finally lost. The bank was in this emphatic manner notified of the utmost limit of its duration, and warned to take care of its own interests by bringing its affairs to a close. Well, sir, did the bank avail itself of this arbitrary exercise of Executive power, and of the circumstances under which it was placed, to produce any public distress? Did it attempt, by exciting a panic in the money operations of the country, to coerce the Government into a renewal of its charter? Not at all, sir! The same liberality and indulgence were extended to its debtors, the same accommodations were granted to merchants, manufacturers, and traders, and others, which had marked its course at every preceding period of its existence. The whole country was for the moment shocked at this high-handed measure of the Executive; a temporary suspension of confidence was felt on the Western waters; some failures were occasioned in Cincinnati, and many laboring men were turned out of employment. There was, to use a favorite expression of a remarkable man, who held office under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, "a breeze," but it passed away, and no derangement of the currency or general pressure took place.

It is a part of the history of that period, that, for having extended its accommodations, in a year of unusually prosperous commerce, to the importers of foreign goods, by which a vast revenue was thrown into the National Treasury, the bank was assailed, and unblushingly charged with interfering in the elections then pending, and particularly with enlarging its discounts, for the express purpose of defeating the election of the present Chief Magistrate. This charge was never suffered to slumber in the mind of President Jackson. It took deep root at the time, and must, if we are to judge by the feeling disclosed in his famous cabinet paper, have disturbed his day-dreams and midnight visions, until it was expiated at the altar of his vengeance, by an act of tyranny on the supposed offender, unparalleled in the history of this country, or of any other where the laws are respected as paramount to the mandates of a reckless despot. It was, I firmly believe, the principal cause of this rash measure, which must be regarded in all time to come as a dark spot on the administration of the Government, at this most singular epoch in our political history. But, sir, suppose the bank, after the application for a renewal of its charter had been sanctioned by Congress, and vetoed by the President, had taken an opposite course, and, instead of granting these liberal facilities to the community, had restricted its discounts within very narrow limits, called on its debtors for the amount previously loaned by gradual instalments, and thus convulsed the country by producing precisely the same pressure and distress which exist at this time. No one will deny that this might have been done, and to a greater extent than is now the case. It would, by adopting such a system of curtailments, have avoided the imputed crime of extending its accommodations to gain political influence; but it would have been thrown on the other horn of the dilemma. All the epithets which we now hear applied to this institution, would have adorned the court language of that day; the public sensibility would have been aroused into action against the dangerous tendencies of this moneyed aristocracy; this money tyrant; this reptile bank; this monster which had spread distress and ruin throughout the country by means of its money power, without the plea of necessity, for the express purpose, and none other, of rendering the veto message unpopular, of bringing the administration into disrepute among the people to prevent the re-election of General Jackson, and thereby effectually securing a renewal of the charter, to avert the evils of which it was the author. We are admonished by passing events that the bank can adopt no line of conduct which would be acceptable to the Executive.

It may be asked why the president and directors of the bank did not call in its discounts immediately after the question was settled by the veto message. I cannot, sir, give the answer, because I am not in possession of the requisite information. But to me it appears obvious that it never has been their design to abuse the privileges granted in the charter of incorporation. The hostile movements of the President, threatening the stability of the institution, from December, 1829, to the present time, were well calculated to impair the credit and confidence which it enjoyed, both at home and abroad. The stockholders have been the greatest sufferers in this contest for political power, based upon the downfall of their chartered rights. But so long as the bank was permitted to retain its national character; so long as its connexion with the Treasury was unbroken, it continued in good faith to fulfil the objects for which it was created, and to meet the just expectations of the country. The public revenues were secure in its vaults, and the money was promptly transferred, without risk or charge to the Government, to any point at which it might be needed for the public service. It furnished and preserved a circulating medium equal in all respects to gold and silver, in all parts of the world, and more convenient for the practical purposes of commerce. It regulated the internal exchanges of the country, by placing them on a footing of almost perfect equality. It discounted freely on its vast means, and thus gave encouragement to industry and enterprise, and activity to trade, foreign and domestic.

Our condition has suddenly changed: and I ask any man who has not surrendered his reason to the overwhelming influence of party prejudice, to what cause must we ascribe the melancholy gloom which is spread through the land, over which profound peace and universal prosperity had so recently shed their cheering influences? Sir, it is an insult to common sense to turn our attention to the bank to find an adequate cause for these unexpected calamities. The existing pressure has followed, as the shadow does the human body, the arbitrary encroachments of Executive prerogative, now for the first time asserted as one of its constitutional attributes. The whole country was tranquil and prosperous; it did not even dream of distress, until the unhallowed hand of Executive power took within its iron grasp the chartered rights guaranteed by law and the plighted faith of the nation to its own people, and crushed them into dust and ashes. All confidence in the solemn engagements of the Government, the obligations of its contracts, and the supremacy of the laws, was instantly lost; and prudent men very naturally looked round them to guard against an impending storm, and provide for their own security and safety. Our free institutions were virtually annihilated; public credit received a fatal stab; the sacred ark of the tabernacle was touched and violated; all the departments of Government were blended and concentrated in one hand; and who can wonder, in a crisis so novel, that banks should draw in their resources, and limit their issues? or that men of capital should look with jealousy and distrust on the public and private relations which have hitherto bound society together, by the inviolable sanctity imparted to contracts entered into by individuals or bodies corporate, created by the Government for wise and salutary purposes? These relations have been ruptured; power marches onward in its daring usurpations, and bids defiance to all the constituted authorities combined.

In these fundamental and alarming causes we may find the source of all the pressure and distress which is so unjustly charged on the directors of the Bank of the United States. Sir, I am utterly astounded at the range of power now claimed and exercised by the President alone. What may he not do of his own will, if that which he has done be deemed legitimate and constitutional? How has he changed the condition of the bank, in its connexion with the fiscal operations of the Treasury? Sir, he has transcended the united powers which belong to both Houses of Congress and the President, by divorcing the bank from the Treasury, and thereby disrobing it of all the attributes and functions on which the original power to grant the charter was claimed. He has reduced it to the grade of a mere commercial bank—a money corporation, to be conducted for the exclusive benefit of the stockholders, in the same manner that any local bank in Philadelphia or New York is conducted. No man in the nation, either in or out of Congress, has ever pretended that Congress had power to create such a corporation, or that such a one could exist and carry on its operations for a single moment, under the sanction of a law of the United States. And yet the President has brought us into an anomalous situation, from which we cannot escape without his approbation, by his own act, which constitutes this bank a mere commercial machine, having none of the qualities essential to give validity to the charter. I ask, sir, if Congress could, without perpetrating a fraud on the constitution, charter a bank of the United States as the fiscal agent of the Treasury, and then pass a law declaring that so much of the charter as relates to the collection, safe-keeping, and distribution of the public revenue should be deemed and held utterly null and void during the existence of the charter? If such a principle of legislation is sanctioned by Congress, there is nothing to prevent the establishment of fifty or one hundred banks, connecting each one in succession with the Treasury; and then, by repealing that part of the charter, place those institutions on the footing of other commercial banks, although, as such, they could not have been incorporated under any power claimed or exercised at any period since the foundation of this Government.

I hold it to be clear that all the branches of the national legislature, of which the President is a constituent part, do not possess the power either to incorporate a bank merely to afford commercial facilities, or to reduce a bank constitutionally organized to that condition after it shall go into operation; and assuredly to that extent, at least, the powers of the President have been carried, in dissolving, by his mandate, the relations created by the charter of the Bank of the United States with the public Treasury. It is, at this time, purely a moneyed institution, with certain privileges, to be conducted by the directors exclusively for the benefit of the stockholder; it has been made so by the act of the Executive, and will so continue to the end of its charter, without the concurrence and against the will of either or both Houses of Congress. This new code of laws will hereafter, I presume, come under the definition of Executive legislation, to the extent of which there is no limitation, no power of revision, and no other form necessary to be observed, but simply to promulgate the act, with the declaration that "I, the President, take the responsibility." Sir, I sadly mistake the character of the American people if they long endure these giant strides to the climax of arbitrary power. To impede the course of even-handed justice under the sanction of laws constitutionally made, to abrogate chartered rights, to establish new systems of national currency, and annul the operation of the laws, are powers which the Crown of England would not dare to exercise without the co-operation of Parliament. A single attempt of the present king to overturn the settled laws of the realm, by violence, stratagem, or fraud, would arouse the spirit of English liberty, and shake the throne to its foundations. Are we, the citizens of this free republic, less tenacious of our liberties and our laws than the people of England, with their King, Lords, and Commons, and a privileged clergy, to boot? Shall we look on the scenes which are passing before our eyes, and see the Chief Magistrate of a free people, in the administration of a free constitution, boldly march forth and seize the purse and the sword, and taunt the legislature with his determination to hold them, unless he is overruled by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress? Shall a suffering community find no redress but in petitions and appeals to Executive clemency?

Sir, if the proud spirit of independence which animated the bosoms of our patriotic ancestors has departed from amongst us, and we are prepared to affix the seal of our approbation to such acts, our dearbought freedom will exist only on parchment; whilst all the essential power of the Government will be lodged in one of its departments. To such a crisis in the political affairs of the country, I fear we are fast approaching. Sir, honorable gentlemen rise in their places, and admit the distress which pervades the community. They point to the Bank of the United States as the only source from which relief is to be expected; for it has been announced to us that none can be looked for in a change of the measures of the President. I ask, what right have they to speak of the bank, in its present posture, as an institution accountable to the Government in the management of its money transactions? What right have they to say to the president and directors, Increase your discounts, to save us from the frowns of the multitude? Sir, those who know so well how to take responsibility, must learn to answer for the consequences of their own errors. The fiscal agency of the bank no longer exists; it retains only the power to employ its capital for the benefit of the stockholders, according to the judgment and discretion of the directors. Sir, so long as the charter remained inviolate, and the deposits of the public revenue were made in the vaults, the Government might, with great propriety, call on the bank to step forward and relieve an unexpected pressure; but the connexion between the bank and the Treasury has been cut asunder by a tyrant's hand, its destruction was decreed, not for the public good, but to subserve the purposes of unchastened ambition and foul corruption; powers have been assumed which do not properly belong to Congress and the President combined; the bank exists now and will continue to exist, as we are informed, to the end of its charter, as a body corporate, with powers differing only in name from those conferred on the banks of the several States. The stockholders will take care of their own interests, since the President has left them no other duty to perform. They will discount to the extent which prudence and caution recommend, and no further.

Honorable Senators, whose groans and lamentations for the sufferings of the people are accompanied by declamatory appeals against the bank, because it does not choose to help them in their crusade against that institution, the destruction of which is to fill the cup of glory to overflowing, of him "who never was known to abuse power in the course of a long life of public service," must look for aid, in this holy warfare, in another direction. Let them cheer up the drooping spirits of the phalanx of pet banks which are shortly to make such a grand display, by giving the country a better currency than the notes of the national bank; let them use the people's money, now in their exclusive custody; let them tell the people, if they please, that it is in the cause of Andrew Jackson they suffer privations and wants, as our fathers did, for liberty and independence, in the war of the revolution; but let them not hope that the idol they worship may trample under his feet the solemn contract of the Government with the bank, and, when he is reaping the harvest of his tyrannical, uncalled-for, and malicious deed, in the distresses which it has brought on the country, to find their intended victim, which they could not crush, a pliant instrument to shield them from the indignant frowns of an injured and insulted people. No, sir, let honorable gentlemen try their experiment fairly, without interruption or resistance from any quarter; and when they need help let them call on the "party" and their safety-funds to relieve them. We hear it gravely said that the currency will be restored, and the distresses of the people relieved by a combination of State banks. Sir, it is idle so to talk. The honorable Senator from Kentucky might as well attempt to navigate the Atlantic in his twenty bark canoes, lashed together with grape-vines, as for Congress to expect, by means of the Treasury and State banks, to equalize exchanges, and create confidence in State bank notes equal to that which is now universally felt in the notes of the Bank of the United States.

But the act of the President in removing the public deposits, and dissolving the connexion between the bank and the Treasury, has not only violated the solemn contract of the Government with that institution, but reserves to himself the power to force on it the performance of all its engagements to the Government. Why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by the charter to require of the bank weekly statements of its general condition? Most certainly because the public money was there deposited, and it was made the duty of the Secretary to take care that it was at all times secure. This money is now withdrawn. The reasons on which the law was founded have ceased to exist, and yet the bank is bound to continue to furnish these general statements of its affairs to the Treasury, weekly, under pain of subjecting itself to a scire facias and a revocation of its charter.

There is another anomaly in this extraordinary proceeding. The money of the Government is no longer in the custody of the Bank of the United States; it has been removed from that place of deposit, provided by law, at the dictation of the Chief Magistrate; and yet, notwithstanding the violation in this respect of the solemn engagements of the Government with the institution, the obligation on the bank remains in full force "to transfer the public funds from place to place within the United States, or the Territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange, and shall also do and perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several States, or of any one or more of them, whenever required by law." The Secretary of the Treasury might at this time demand of the bank the fulfilment of this engagement, although it has none of the public money within its vaults; and its refusal to comply with the demand would be the foundation of a scire facias for a breach of its contract with the Government. Such is the singular attitude in which the bank is placed by the arbitrary exercise of despotic power, wielded in violation of the constitution and laws, by President Jackson. Sir, the people are relied on, as they have heretofore been, to sustain the President in whatever he may do, without regard to the nature or extent of the powers which he may claim and exercise.

This, sir, is the passport of all usurpers to the consumption of their ambition in overturning the liberties of the people. No usurper ever mounted the throne but in the name of the people, and for the good of the people; and so it ever will be to the end of time. We are told, sir, of the great unanimity, in the empire State of New York, on the subject of the removal of the deposits. The honorable Senator [Mr. WALKER] who presented to the Senate the resolutions of the General Assembly of that State, triumphantly pointed to the overwhelming majority by which they were adopted. Sir, the wonder with me is, not the adoption of these resolutions by a majority so tremendous; I am only astonished that there should be found one man in the assembly sufficiently patriotic and bold to give his vote against these resolutions, or in favor of rechartering the Bank of the United States. If I am not greatly mistaken in the history of the times, the hostility of President Jackson to the Bank of the United States has been not a little excited and stimulated by the party discipline of what is called the Albany Regency. Sir, no State in the Union is so deeply interested in the destruction of a national currency as New York. Were I a citizen of that State, I candidly confess it would require all my virtue and patriotism to enable me to resist the temptations of a policy which seeks the downfall of the Bank of the United States. Sir, since I am on my feet, although I did not intend to touch the subject, I will beg leave to say a few words as to the effect which would be produced by the destruction of a general currency on the relative interests of New York and other portions of the Union. The first operation of the new system would be to give to the city of New York, by means of local banks, the use of an annual deposit, without interest, of at least ten millions of the public revenue, derived from imposts on foreign importations, all of which would, by means of a national bank and its branches, be distributed over the whole country on a scale of perfect equality. This is one advantage; but there are others still more important. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. WAIGHT] has said, and truly said, that the city of New York is the great emporium of commerce in the United States. I admit that it is so. The merchants of the Middle States, the Southern, Southwestern, and Western States, supply themselves with foreign merchandise, for the annual supply of their customers, at this great emporium of commerce. How, sir, do they make their remittances in payment of these goods? At present, through the medium of a national bank, they may, without difficulty, deposit their local State paper, the credit of which is good where it is issued, in a branch bank of the United States, and obtain a check on any part of the United States, however remote, at a very small discount, not exceeding one per cent. They do not run the risk of a protest, as in the case of bills of exchange drawn by individuals, or a company of merchants; they run no risk in transmitting such a check by mail, because if lost, it may be renewed, and the holder cannot demand payment without the endorsement of the person in whose favor it was drawn. Thus the intercourse between the Western country and New York, or the other commercial cities on the seaboard, can be carried on without risk, and for a very small premium, by means of a national bank and a general currency. But let us look at the other side of the picture. Suppose this great point, which is made a desideratum in the policy of this administration, of prostrating the Bank of the United States, should prevail, we shall then be thrown back upon the local State currency, and the ordinary means of remittances, through the medium of bills of exchange. Suppose, under this state of things, a merchant in Natchez, or Mobile, or New Orleans, should become debtor for goods, wares, and merchandise, to an importing merchant in the city of New York, payable in six and twelve months. He sells his goods to his customers, and receives in payment the sound currency of the State in which they are sold, (and he can obtain payment in no other currency.) Well, sir, he takes with him these bank notes, issued by banks which have more specie in their vaults than notes in circulation; equal, in the amount of their solid capital, to any institution of the kind in the world, and offers them, in the payment of his debt, to the New York merchant. And what, sir, will he be told? Why, sir, the cautious merchant would say to him—"Go into Wall street, and whatever your paper is worth at the brokers, I will take it at the same rate of discount, but give me the note of a pet bank in this city, and I will take it at par." The Wall street broker would exhibit to the applicant a regularly-graduated list of the value of bank paper from Passamaquoddy to the Balize; this scale, sir, will be regulated to suit the taste of the Wall street brokers, who without the intervention of a national currency, will take the command and control of the fiscal concerns of this country. New York bank paper would far transcend in value the bank paper of any other State in the Union; it would find pasture in all that vast region of country where the retail merchant is a debtor for foreign goods purchased in the New York market; it would be sought for there, and even bought at a premium by all who desired to make remittances to the city of New York. What, sir, has been the progress of this system since the removal of the public deposits? We find that already the bank paper of the whole Western and Southern country is below par in the Northern cities, at from five to ten per cent. This inequality will increase rather than diminish, as the system advances to maturity. Besides this unfavorable operation on the whole interior of the Union, it is manifest that the exchange capital of the country must be deposited in

New York and other great commercial cities, where the rate of discount on the domestic exchanges of the country will be fixed so as to produce the best practicable profit to those who deal in them. Now, by the agency of a general currency, the people who reside beyond the mountains, in the great valley of the Mississippi, may transfer their funds without risk, and at a small expense, to any portion of the United States; but if they are driven, by the destruction of this currency, to the necessity of making their remittances in local bank paper or bills of exchange, they must inevitably sustain an annual loss of from six to ten per cent. on the whole amount of these remittances. Such, sir, would be some of the blessings of the system which the Chief Magistrate is endeavoring to force into operation, and which we are told is to cover him with glory. I repeat, sir, that I do not wonder at the general support which it receives from the legislature of New York, and the representatives of that State in either House of Congress; but I do wonder that any honorable Senator, representing the interests of the great valley of the Mississippi, should so far forget his duty to his constituents as to bow down at the footstool of power, and humble both himself and them, to subserve the interest of party factions, and gratify the avarice of stockjobbers and speculators. I beg pardon of the Senate for having detained them so long on this preliminary debate; but I felt it my imperious duty to throw out, however imperfectly, some of the views which I have presented to the Senate, of the question which now agitates and convulses the country.

Mr. WILKINS next took the floor, and observed that he had an account to settle, which he would take the earliest opportunity of doing. The Senator from Kentucky had frankly informed him of the statement he had made in his (Mr. W.'s) absence, in reference to the prices of stocks in Ohio and Philadelphia, and that gentleman presuming, on the authority of price currents, with some private advices he had received, that he (Mr. W.) was incorrect in the statements made by him some days since, had called upon him to do justice by the proper explanation. Mr. W. said he was glad that the call had been thus made. It was not his duty to volunteer an examination of the statements referred to by the Senator from Kentucky without such a call, because it would imply a consciousness of error on his part. He had made the statement on the authority of a newspaper, because such authority was generally received; and stated that Pennsylvania stock, bearing 5 per cent. interest, and reimbursable in 1850, was at the price of $101, and that the Ohio stock, reimbursable at the same time, was quoted at $115. He took this from a newspaper, the Philadelphia Sentinel—and there it was: the gentleman might make what use he pleased of it. Mr. W. here quoted "Pennsylvania 5 per cents. 99 offered, 101 asked; Ohio 5 per cents. 114 offered, 116 asked." He was not responsible for any statements made in the newspapers, nor for any typographical errors that might occur in them. He would refer to the price current of New York, February 5th, 1834: "Ohio 5 per cents. reimbursable in 1850, $108 offered, sales at $110." The first paper he had read from, was dated 24th January—this is dated 5th February, therefore the difference was 4 per cent. He was glad the call had been made on him; it was the duty of the Senator from Kentucky to make the quotations he did, and having discovered the error, to ask for an explanation. Having given it—and he hoped it was satisfactory to the gentleman—he would, while he was up, refer to another subject that had been brought forward in the debate.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POINDEXTER] the other day, and again to-day, alluded to him as "speaking by authority." That was a significant phrase, and well understood in the Senate. Sir, said Mr. W., I did speak by authority, and that authority was my own judgment.

[SENATE.]

I take my cue from no man, no matter how elevated, or how deeply he is buried in the affections of his countrymen. Now, sir, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi, and to all who hear me, that, in reference to any political measure—any bill before Congress, I never had a conversation with the President, nor never saw him alone in my life. I hold not to the opinions of any individual whatever. Let it satisfy the gentleman from Mississippi, and all others, that I never had a confidential conversation with General Jackson in all my life. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. W. went on to say, had another phrase that he was very fond of using; and that was "pet banks." If the gentleman used the phrase in a family sense, and it was fair to presume he did, he would say to the gentleman that he had but one pet, while he (Mr. W.) had many, and that one pet was more dangerous than many. The gentleman, therefore, had better take care of his one pet, or it would rule the whole family.

The distress of his immediate constituents had often been adverted to. He had stated, on that floor, that when he left home, all was calm; and yet the Bank of the United States had commenced its curtailments on the 13th of August, without its being felt or known in his section of the country. From the time he left home, until the time he had made this assertion, he had not received one line from any of his constituents on the subject of the distress prevailing there. Since his remarks had had time to reach home, he had received several letters; he had received two that morning, anonymous letters too, threatening him, not with the bank, but containing threats disgraceful to any individuals. He had received letters from his constituents, to which he replied that it was strange he had not heard one word from them as to any distress prevailing among them from the time he left home, until the time his assertions got there.

The difference between me and my constituents, Mr. W. said, was this: They exclaim against the distress prevailing amongst them, and I tell them they have mistaken the cause; that it is to be attributed to the action of the bank, and not to the removal of the deposits. I tell them, that they were not aware of the bank's having broken up the internal exchange, nor were they aware of its enormous curtailments, until this debate commenced.

Sir, said Mr. W., I was desirous, before I closed my remarks, to advert to the state of affairs between S. and M. Allen and the Bank of the United States, which bore on the prices of the Pennsylvania stocks. S. and M. Allen took three millions of this stock on to New York, and becoming involved to a great amount themselves, wished to throw it up, when the Governor agreed to take back $300,000 of it. Of this was taken, by two local banks in Philadelphia, (who have since petitioned for a renewal of the Bank of the United States charter,) $150,000; and by one bank in the interior of the State $150,000. Now, sir, if the State of Pennsylvania, whether she can effect a loan or not, is not dependent on the Bank of the United States, that bank stands in the midst of fifteen State banks, each obliged by its charter to vest a certain amount of its capital in the State loans, who are dependent on it. Standing as these State banks do, the capacity to meet this obligat on to take a certain portion of the State loans, depends entirely on the Bank of the United States, which, with its vast capital, its various facilities, and the patronage of the Government, can easily control them. How often had he (Mr. W.) referred to the fact, as stated by the directors of the State banks themselves, that they lived but by the will of the Bank of the United States. Now, sir, if this Bank of the United States says to the State of Pennsylvania, that, in consequence of your adopting resolutions against us, we will cripple your State banks—prevent their making you loans—and thus deprive you of all resources for internal improvements—does it not follow, that its stock will be depressed?

Mr. President, much has been said about the power of the bank over the internal exchange of the country; and it is well known, that its famous resolutions, so often referred to here, have entirely cut it up and destroyed it. In reference to this, Mr. W. said he would quote some passages from a letter of Mr. Crawford to the President of the bank, to be found in the 8th volume of the documents of the House of Representatives, showing the opinions held by that officer on the subject.

When the bank went into operation, it was about to establish a system of domestic exchange, and one of the Government directors wrote to Mr. Crawford, apprising him of the fact. Now, sir, said Mr. W., if you take the single letter of Mr. Crawford, it would of itself be sufficient to justify Mr. Taney for the removal of the deposits. Mr. Crawford says to the bank, "If you adopt a system of internal and domestic exchange, to the oppression of the public, I will call down on you the power I possess, and the act will bring down on you the indignation of the public." I will read the exact words. They are as follows:

"Deeply sensible of the importance of the bank, in its fiscal operations, and sincerely deprecating the adoption of any measure which may affect its popularity or reputation, and endanger the continuance of its existence after the expiration of the charter, I have learned, with much regret, from one of your body, that the board of directors has now under its consideration, a system for regulating domestic exchanges, with a view to the pecuniary emolument of the bank. As the gentleman who made this communication has asked for my opinion and advice upon this question, I feel it to be my duty to submit, for your consideration, such observations as the subject has suggested, premising, at the same time, that they are not clothed with the President's approbation."

"The bank has nothing to apprehend (from these complaints) so long as it affords to the community those facilities which its great capital and extensive ramifications, in every section of the Union, place so completely in its power. But if that institution should change its policy—should refuse those facilities to the commercial class which it has amply furnished from the commencement of its operations—should introduce a system of internal exchange, with a view to increase its profits, it will require but little address in the State banks to excite against it the public indignation, in a degree that would not fail to produce great embarrassment, and ultimately lead to the extinction of the bank at the expiration of its charter."

Mr. Crawford was of opinion that exchange should be regulated, not with a view to the emoluments of the bank, but with a view to the public convenience. I will, said Mr. W., read further extracts:

"The exaction of one-quarter, one-half, or one per cent, on checks drawn by one office of discount upon another, without reference to the commercial relations which exist between the two places, by a capitalist which always sells and never buys, will as effectually convince the community of the prostration of its rights and interests, at the will of the bank, as the exaction of ten per cent. It is the establishment of the principle, and not the amount of the exaction, which will exhibit the power of the bank to levy contributions on the commerce of the nation, ad libitum. In the moderation of a moneyed institution, whose vital principle is profit, no reliance will be placed by the community."

"In proportion to the profit arising from domestic exchange, will be the inducement to destroy the universality of the currency of the bills of the bank. As this universality is diminished, the demand for exchange will be increased. Thus the interests of the bank will be directly opposed to one of the great objects of its creation, viz: the supply of a currency of universal circulation, and of uniform value."

"In whatever point of view I have been able to consider the subject, it appears fraught with mischief to the community, calculated to draw upon the bank the public indignation, and effect its extinction at the expiration of the charter. It places the bank and the community in a state of open hostility, continually exciting to acts of mutual aggression upon the rights and interests of each other. In such a contest the Government will have no alternative. It cannot hesitate upon the course which public duty requires it to take. Its weight and influence must be exerted to save the community from the cupidity to which the adoption of such a system must inevitably subject the bank."

Here the bank is expressly told, that, in such a contest, the Government has no alternative left but the exercise of its power; and yet the bank itself has commenced that contest, and rendered itself liable to the exercise of the power of the Government. Mr. W. said, he had a quotation of the prices of exchange, at present charged in Philadelphia, by which it was shown that the bank had increased the premiums for its own profit, and really held them higher than any of the local banks. Mr. W. here quoted from a Philadelphia price current the rates of exchange charged by several of its banks, with the rates charged by the Bank of the United States. This shows, said he, not only the disposition of the Bank of the United States to break up the exchange, and make money out of the community, but it also shows the capacity of the local banks to afford the necessary facilities for commercial intercourse.

Mr. W. concluded by saying, that he rose principally for the purpose of replying to the call made by the Senator from Kentucky; and he would, therefore, not detain the Senate with any further remarks.

Mr. SILSBEE considered it to be his duty to say a few words. He presumed that the present pecuniary embarrassments would now be doubted by none. He had heard the fact from those who were the most likely to be correctly informed. It was known to him, and, he presumed, to others, that, in some parts of the country, the banks, and creditors generally, had found it to be their duty and interest to grant to all their debtors all possible indulgence; and it was the duty of the Government to pursue the same course. But the gentleman from Illinois was of opinion that the importing merchants should not be indulged, because indulgence could not be granted to every other class of sufferers. He (Mr. S.) was willing to give relief to all who came under the pressure. But he thought that the importing merchants had a strong claim on the indulgence of the Government. Under the state of things prior to the last tariff act, the credits given on duty bonds were never less than six months, and varied from that time to eighteen months. But by the last law, the credit had been reduced to three and six months, and within eighteen months from the 4th of March last, about seventy millions of duty would probably be called for, whereas but about half that amount would have been called for within that period, if these credits had not been reduced. The importers, therefore, seem to have a particular claim on the forbearance of the Government, as they were required to pay, within eighteen months from the 4th of March last, nearly double what they had expected to pay. The gentleman from Illinois expressed a belief that there would be but few deposits to make in any bank, if this resolution should pass. Now, Mr. S. said, he apprehended that the deposits might be fewer if the resolution did not pass than if it did. He considered it to be a most important measure, at the present moment of severe pressure, peculiarly called for by the distressed condition of the commercial community, and one which he hoped the Senate would be induced to adopt.

Mr. BLACK said he had no objection to vote for the resolution, as it went no further than referring it to the committee to inquire into the subject. But he was not of the opinion that any particular measure could be founded on such inquiry. It would be the duty of the committee to report to the Senate the amount of the existing distress, and whether there was any measure of relief which could be given, consistently with the interests and security of the country. He had no objection to all this. He believed, however, that the specific relief pointed out in the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky could not be granted.

While he was up, he felt desirous to communicate to the Senate the impressions of his own mind. It was his opinion that the existing distress could only be relieved by the bank. As a fiscal agent, that institution had two duties to perform—a duty to the community and a duty to the Government. So far as the Government was concerned, the bank had been discharged from any obligation on account of the withdrawal of the public deposits. But it was still incumbent on it to discharge the duty it owed to the community. One object of its incorporation was to grant facilities to the commercial community. What was the course of the bank? It had fully demonstrated its solvency and efficiency. It was universally admitted, that both these points were established. It had duties still existing, the performance of which would be perfectly consistent with the profitable administration of the bank, because whatever was calculated to produce distress among the community, tended to diminish the profits of the bank. The bank could, therefore, afford facilities to trade, and at the same time increase its own profits. The contingent drafts, amounting, as he believed, to about two millions and a half, had all been met and paid off. The amount of the Government deposits had been paid off. It was incumbent on the bank to show not only its efficiency and solvency, but also its good will to the community as far as its means would permit. He knew not to what extent its means would allow it to go. It may have done so, for aught he knew. But if the bank, instead of showing that disposition, should endeavor to force a re-charter by increasing the distress of the country, there were those who would recollect it.

On the subject of the agency of banks in regulating the national currency, there were two modes to which he had directed his attention—first by a national bank, and then by the State banks. He threw entirely out of the question all idea of a metallic currency. He believed that such a currency would at once be swept away, and the vacuum would then be filled up by issues from State banks. For every dollar issued by these banks, a dollar of specie would disappear—a result which was unavoidable. It was only necessary to refer gentlemen to the corporation notes in this district. Here, there were large issues made of notes under the value of five dollars, the effect of which was to render the metallic currency so scarce that it had almost entirely disappeared; and such would always be the consequence of such issues. There could be no power in the legislature to control the State institutions, except through the agency of a United States bank. Congress could not direct the banks to restrain their issues, because the States had plenary power to regulate the institutions, and according to the increase of the paper issues would be the diminution of the metallic currency. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RYAN] had referred to the metallic currency in France; but the condition of France was widely different from the condition of this country. There the power of the Government was consolidated, and was able to exercise full control over the issues of the local banks. But no such control could be exercised here by the Federal Government.

Revenue Bonds.

[SENATE.]

As, on the one hand, the States had the exclusive right to exercise this power, the Government, on the other, would be without any means to sustain the currency. For these reasons, he had entirely laid out of sight a metallic currency, which, were it not for the objections he had urged, he should himself be disposed to prefer.

There were only, then, two choices—one, a currency regulated by a national bank, and the other a currency created by issues of bills from the various State banks. In his opinion, there were causes, sufficiently obvious, which would cause a failure of any attempt to establish a national currency by means of the State banks. Among these causes, were their locality, the want of a controlling power to prevent over-issues, and a consequent depreciation of value; and other very many evils must result from the power and nature of banks and the currency itself. One evil had been mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky. The liability of these notes to be counterfeited was a great evil, and there was no mode of providing an effectual restraint against it. How would it be possible for an individual residing in Louisiana to know the genuineness of a note issued in Massachusetts or in Maine? He could scarcely know that such a bank existed, much less the genuineness of a note issued by it. This was a great evil.

Another evil was to be looked for in over-issues, and the rise and depreciation of property which must always follow fluctuations in the issues, creating general embarrassment and distress. One effect must be produced in the State of Mississippi, which had been already alluded to by his colleague, [Mr. POINDRESTER.] It would render the whole valley of the Mississippi entirely dependent on the city of New York, or some other of the cities on the Atlantic coast. Funds are now obtained by the cotton growers in that State through the United States Bank. How would it be when that bank should be out of existence, and no other was established in its place. All the transactions must be carried on by bills of exchange drawn on New York, or through the medium of the bills of the State banks. If it is to be by bills of exchange, there must be funds in the city of New York to the amount of one or two millions, on which drafts can be made. The Southern States must leave to that amount in New York, in order to regulate the exchange. In purchasing any amount of bills, such premiums would be exacted of the buyer as the lenity of the holder would permit him to ask. On the other hand, if resort be had to the bills of the local banks, the brokers in New York could fix their own rate of exchange. When you offered the local bills, the brokers would tell you that they were asking such and such discount, and you would have no alternative but to agree to the terms which they required. The brokers would thus have the power to fix the rate of exchange, and it would be absurd to expect much from them.

For these reasons, he was inclined to prefer the old system—a national bank. He was opposed to the agency of the State banks, which would jeopardize the public currency. It would be out of their power to answer the public demands in great exigencies, and to make and continue a sound currency. Their locality would be an insurmountable obstacle to such a result. He had thought it necessary to throw out these views, on rising to state that he should vote for the reference of the subject.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, rose and said, that the sudden arrival of the debate on these resolutions, reminded him that, shortly after the resolutions were introduced, he had made an effort to say a few words upon one branch of the question raised by them, and to which the honorable Senator from Mississippi had professed, mainly, in his first speech, to direct his attention. He then failed to get the floor, and had abandoned all idea of addressing the Senate upon the subject. He said, however, as the subject had been revived, he would like still to make a few remarks, but that, in doing so, he might not interfere with the privileges of the gentleman who had the floor upon the special order of the day, he would move to lay the resolutions upon the table until to-morrow. However, (said Mr. K., turning to Mr. WILKINS,) on this point I would consult the wishes of the honorable gentleman himself.

Mr. WILKINS having expressed his willingness that Mr. K. should proceed, Mr. K. continued:

I do not sufficiently disagree, Mr. President, with several gentlemen who have addressed the Senate upon these resolutions, (either directly or incidentally,) to feel myself called on to pay any particular attention to their remarks. He should, he said, himself vote for the resolution, but he dissented from some of the reasons given by gentlemen for their support of it; and he deemed it of the first importance in the present condition of the country, that we should not only act advisedly, but endeavor to give reasons for our acts, that would be respected by the community to which they were addressed.

Mr. K. said he would mainly direct the few remarks he intended to make, to the observations of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, on the low prices of our articles of export, and the causes of their depression. This was a subject in which the South was particularly interested, and, for that reason, the honorable Senator from Mississippi had given it particular notice.

I do not profess, Mr. President, said Mr. K., to be very intimately acquainted with the nature of commercial operations. I have bestowed but few thoughts, in the course of my life, to this subject; and am, perhaps, still less familiar with the usual influences of a deranged and fluctuating currency upon the commercial interests of the country. But, sir, said he, with my unlearned notions upon these subjects, the views of some gentlemen have been so exceedingly wild, or, at least, to me, so unsatisfactory, that I hope I may not be charged with presumption, or even with affording evidence of a degree of confidence in my own opinions which I do not feel, if I should attempt, very briefly, to explain why it is that I differ so widely in my views, with other gentlemen who have preceded me in the discussion.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi had contended, if he understood him, that the present low price of cotton was to be attributed to the derangement of the currency, and the inequality and depression of exchanges, which produced a want of fair relation between the home and foreign market; all of which was to be attributed to the removal of the deposits. Here Mr. K. turned to Mr. P. and said, that he had taken no notes, and being suddenly called up in the debate, he might, possibly, not recollect accurately some of the positions of the honorable Senator, and he hoped if he should misstate his arguments, that he (Mr. P.) would take the liberty of correcting him. Mr. P. bowing assent, Mr. K. proceeded.

Sir, said Mr. K., that the home price of an article of export, in which the speculator usually deals for cash, and ships to a foreign market, which, being the market of its greatest consumption, confessedly regulates its price in all parts of the world where it is produced; or, (to take the other branch of the proposition,) that the relation between the home price of an article of export, and the price of the same article in such foreign market, should be materially influenced by the derangement of the currency, the fluctuations of the currency, the inequality in domestic exchanges, or (what seems most relied on) the want of confidence and the want of credit in this country, seemed to him to be doing violence to all just reasoning upon the subject, and to be marked with a total disregard of the most obvious laws of trade, and the plainest principles of commerce.

Sir, said Mr. K., what renders this assumption the more extraordinary, is the admission, on all hands, that the country has never been so full of capital, as it is at this time. Yes, said Mr. K., all accounts I have seen recently from the Atlantic cities, concur in proving that there has rarely been such an accumulation of private deposits in the banks of the Atlantic cities, and especially New York, as there was at the date of the last accounts. Of money and currency in the country then, there was a plethoric abundance, and that, too, not alone belonging to the banking institutions, and subject to their control, but belonging to individuals, and which, by a law common to speculating men, they would always invest wherever they could honorably expect a profitable return. But, notwithstanding this admitted abundance of capital in the country, it is said, "there is a want of confidence, and a want of credit," and "hence the low prices of our articles of export." Sir, said Mr. K., you might as well say "hence the low condition of the Western waters," during the Fall of 1833. What, said Mr. K., has a want of confidence, or a want of credit, in this country, to do with the matter? The capital is now idle in the hands of individuals, and the capitalist, who has money unemployed, wants neither confidence nor credit. He has money, and always wishes to employ it profitably, when invited by a market that offers a large profit. Why, said Mr. K., so far from the position of gentlemen being true, it may be safely assumed, that, if every dollar of currency were, "by one fell swoop," stricken from the face of the earth within the limits of the planting States—yes, from the Potomac to the Sabine—unless it were driven beyond the confines of the commercial world, and its circulation forcibly prevented, the influence of such a local disaster to the currency on the price of cotton in the planting States, would be merely temporary. What, said Mr. K., plenty of capital in the country at the command of individuals, unemployed, and a tempting foreign market before them, offering, it is said, large profits, and yet the capital will not circulate in the purchase of it! Why, said Mr. K., you might as well expect to stop the flow and circulation of the blood to the heart of the animal, during the continuance of respiration, as to stop the flow and circulation of currency to those points where it can be most profitably employed.

But an attempt has been made, said Mr. K., to account for the fall of cotton by the loss on exchanges. To attempt any thing like a lucid exposition of the nature and operation of exchanges, said Mr. K., would require both detail and time; and he was disposed to save himself the trouble of the one, and the Senate the consumption of the other. But a few remarks would dispose of this part of the subject. The gentleman from Mississippi had said (if he understood him) that, as one of the effects of the removal of the deposits, foreign exchanges had fallen, and domestic exchanges had risen; or rather that the premium on foreign bills had fallen, and the discounts on inland bills had risen, which, thus explained, seemed to assert a depression in both species of exchange, as the effect in both cases was to reduce the proceeds of the bill in the hands of the seller.

If, continued Mr. K., the honorable Senator intended to assert that domestic exchange has been unusually high or unequal during the Fall of 1833, he must insist that the honorable Senator was—unintentionally, of course—mistaken in point of fact. Mr. K. stated that he lived in a central city, about equidistant between this and New Orleans; and mentioned some facts, and referred generally to the exchange tables, as found in the Southern papers, to prove that, from the city of his residence, exchange, North and South, had rarely, if ever, been lower than since the removal of the deposits. What it was at New York or New Orleans, he knew not. But if it were as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, when last up, greatly against New Orleans, he could only say, what the Senator and all others must readily perceive, that the effect was in direct hostility to the proposition which this fact was brought forward to sustain. If Louisiana bank bills were ten or twelve per cent. discount in New York, as had been stated, and exchange were so heavily against New Orleans, the inevitable effect must be to transfer capital from New York to New Orleans, for the purchase of cotton. When speculators, with $1,000 in New York, could place $1,100 in New Orleans, for the purchase of cotton, they would purchase cotton no where else, and such a state of its currency would shortly make New Orleans the greatest exporting and importing city in the Union.

But, said Mr. K., a practical answer to all this theory is readily found in the relation between the prices of cotton in the different ports of the Union. The quotations in the different seaports would show no unusual inequality in price. And he would ask gentlemen why it was, that if cotton were low in New Orleans, from the difficulty of supplying funds from New York to purchase, why did it not bear a better price in New York, the place from which the money is said to be supplied? These are both exporting and importing cities, and there seems no unusual want of relation of prices between the city supplying and the city supplied with capital to purchase this article of export. And this alone, would prove that nothing could be lost to the producer by the inequality of domestic exchanges. But, said Mr. K., I will make a more unanswerable inquiry still—why is it, said he, that cotton does not bear a better price in Texas, Mexico, and South America? He hoped there had been no removal of the deposits there.

But, Mr. K. said, the shortest way to dispose of this whole charge of loss on account of the depression of exchanges, would be (for the sake of argument) to admit the facts as charged, and we would instantly see such a want of agreement between the alleged cause and the alleged effects, as clearly to show that there was no proper connexion between them. He had seen in the public prints, that some who had agreed with the views of the gentleman from Mississippi, insisted on a loss to the producer of 2½ or 3 per cent. on this account. For no one, he believed, contended for a loss to the producer of the whole amount of the depression of exchange, or attempted to impute the entire decline in foreign exchange to the measures of the administration. But, to be liberal in our admissions, for the sake of argument, said Mr. K., let us say 5 per cent. He presumed the Senator from Mississippi would not contend for more. What would this amount to? In estimating cotton at 10 cents per pound, it would amount to ½ cent per pound. How shall we account for the balance of the loss? It is alleged that the loss is from 3 to 5 cents per pound.

But, said Mr. K., I must say a word on foreign exchange, though the loss on that is included in the admission just made, for the sake of argument. It is said, I think, that the planter loses the premium on foreign exchange, which formerly added to the price of his productions. [Here Mr. POINDEXTER begged leave to explain. He said, that, by the depression of foreign exchanges, cotton would not now be used as a remittance to the same extent as formerly, as the depression destroyed the competition among that class of purchasers who purchased cotton for remittance instead of exchange.] Mr. K. resumed. He said, with the explanation, he perfectly understood the argument of the honorable Senator, and thought it easily answered. No one had shown how the condition of our own money market had exerted any agency in depressing foreign exchange. It is never dealt in as an article of speculation; it is only needed for the payment of our foreign debt; and the price and competition depend upon the demand; and the demand is regulated by the state of trade between the two countries. It is admitted, then, said Mr. K., on all hands, even in the complaining memorials upon your table, that the balance of trade is largely in our favor. This was a state of things long desired by us, and the Senator might as well expect the laws of gravity to be disturbed, and the waters of the Mississippi to turn up stream, and continue in that direction, as for exchange to be against us when the balance of trade is in our favor. The premium of exchange, he said, should not be expected to resist the balance of trade.

So much, then, for the home prices of our articles of export in connexion with the measures of the administration. We are, however, confounded by another proposition, brought in aid of the first, and though no attempt is made to explain it, for an obvious reason, yet it asserts a most disastrous state of things; and, unless it can be explained by others—like all other inexplicable phenomena—charged with mischief, it will be put down of course to the account of the administration. I allude to the alleged want of proper relation between the home and foreign markets.

Now, said Mr. K., the relation between the home price of an article of export, and the foreign price of the same article, (which, being the market of its greatest consumption, confessedly regulates its price in all parts of the world, wherever produced,) depends upon a variety of commercial incidents, but mainly and principally upon the confidence of the dealer in the stability of the foreign market. And it is a law of trade, that a rising foreign market will usually be anticipated by the dealer, provided he have a reasonable confidence in the continuance of the causes of the advance. And, for a like reason, a falling foreign market will be anticipated by the dealer, provided he have a continued confidence in his belief of the causes of the decline. Practical men reason in these matters just as they reason in the every-day transactions of life. They use the plain logical proposition, that what has happened once, will most likely, under the same circumstances, and during the continuance of the same causes, happen again. Hence they say, that "if cotton fluctuated in price, either on the rise or decline, a given amount during the lapse of thirty days previous to the dates of the last European quotations, and we know, and feel confident in the continuance of the causes of the fluctuation, it is safe to conclude that the fluctuation has been in an equal ratio for the thirty days which it has required to receive the accounts."

Let us illustrate by a few practical references—we should never resort to theory when we have the lights of experience to guide us. What, then, was the relation between the home and foreign markets for cotton in the year 1825? Ask the speculator of that year, or get information from more infallible sources, and it would (if he mistook not) be found, that, during a portion of that year, the home price was nearly equal to, quite equal to, and perhaps, for a short period, even beyond the last European quotations. What was the cause of this? Why, in that year, the dealers both in Europe and America, had become fully convinced that the crop then in market was an unusually short one; that the supply would fall far short of the usual demand. The whole commercial world was fully satisfied of this fact. And, without recollecting that the high price of an article of consumption will greatly diminish the consumption itself, the belief was general, and much encouraged by speculators, that the price would continue to advance indefinitely, until it should be checked by the distribution of the new crop. But consumption was checked, the speculating bubble burst, and the sequel was known. Cotton went down at a few leaps from 32 or 33 cents to 7 or 8! Oh! said Mr. K., what a glorious year this would have been for the removal of the deposits! The President, with all his alleged usurped power, and unrighteous popularity, aided by all his "collar men," and his "collar presses," could not have stood up a moment against the torrent of discontent which the disappointment and distresses of that year produced! It would all have been attributed to the removal of the deposits.

This relation then, said Mr. K., between the home and foreign market, in 1825, was owing to the universal belief in the causes on which the maintenance of prices was based. But what is the fact in 1833-4? Why, said Mr. K., such has been the want of confidence among American speculators, in the maintenance of prices at which cotton opened in the fall of 1833, that thousands of experienced dealers have not touched a lock of the article. And those who ventured, at the higher prices of the opening market, had so little confidence in the maintenance of prices, that there has been a precipitate rush by holders to the European markets, which has swelled the exportations, for the last quarter of 1833, far beyond those of the corresponding quarter of the previous year. This hasty glut of the market would, of itself, have produced some decline.

But, said Mr. K., what has been the reason of this want of confidence with the American dealers in 1833, which has made them cautious of approaching the European quotations at the opening of the market, and which has made them anticipate the decline, and endeavor to keep ahead of it, after the decline commenced? The reasons are well known. In the first place, they had the experience of 1825 before them. They knew that cotton was at a price very far beyond its natural price—that is, the price at which the article can reasonably and profitably be made by the planter; and that the high price itself would greatly diminish the consumption. And, secondly, they believed that the assumption upon which the market opened, and upon which these high prices were maintained, was, in point of fact, untrue. These high prices at the opening of the market, were based on the supposition that the crop was unusually short. This was doubted by most dealers in this country, and the event has shown that their doubts were well founded. The crop has turned out to be fully equal to the last year's crop, and probably larger. And no speculating dreamer has ever supposed, at any part of the season, that, if the crop should turn out to be as abundant as it is now ascertained to be, that prices could be maintained beyond the present quotations. American dealers, then, have not had confidence in the stability of the foreign market during the present season. And when the decline commenced, they knew the causes, had confidence in their continuance, and endeavored prudently to anticipate the decline. And this brings us to a practical answer to the whole complaint. Ask the unfortunate speculator of the present season, who, somehow or other, in despite of the measures of the administration, and of the removal of the deposits, unluckily for himself, has obtained the requisite cash or credit, and, tempted by these high Liverpool prices, with a hope of making an easy fortune, has embarked in large exporting speculations. Ask him, I say, if he has realized "from 3 to 5 cents per pound" more than the usual profit? He will answer you, with a sigh, sir, "I am ruined by my speculations." Why, sir, said Mr. K., it may be safely assumed, that if all the treasure that ever was extracted from the mines of Golconda and Potosi, were heaped up in one common mass before the merchants of this country, with privilege to borrow ad libitum on good security, the effect of such a privilege would have no sensible effect on the cotton market of this country.

Do you expect men, sir, to give prices for exports beyond those prices at which they are daily ruined? Sir, dealers have no other inducement to make investments on speculation, than the hope of realizing a profitable return. This practical view of the operations of the present season, it is hoped, is a full and conclusive answer to all complaints of an unfair and losing relation between the home and foreign market, unless indeed you expect exporters to speculate against all the maxims of human prudence.

But, said Mr. K., I have said more than I intended when I arose, and will only say a few words on the relief proposed by the resolution, and the question of reference. Mr. K. said he would vote for the specific inquiry proposed in the resolution, because it proposed to relieve a want created by the action of Congress,* and he thought it therefore peculiarly fit that Congress should relieve it. This, he said, was a large item in the wants of the merchants, and contributed largely to the public distress. The wants of the merchants, said he, are ordinary and extraordinary. Their ordinary wants, as borrowers in this country, are always heavy, which arises out of our abominable paper banking system. Merchants do not trade upon solid capital, but trade upon their credit; that is, upon the chances of borrowing: always expecting to make up any deficiencies between their investments and returns, by further loans from the banks. The directors of banks are generally ready to mistake the wants of sinking merchants for the wants of currency, and by pouring out floods of their paper trash, when not needed for circulation, ease only the merchants for a time, but occasion reactions that carry in their sweep, wide-spread ruin to all other portions of the community. But, said Mr. K., I find myself likely to digress. I do not intend to discuss the banking system; only to state it as an incident to account for the great extent of the ordinary wants of our merchants. The extraordinary wants of the merchants during the present season, consist, 1st. In deficiencies occasioned by a falling market. The returns of the speculator do not repay his investments. He is, therefore, in debt, and wishes to borrow the deficiency; and this deficiency constitutes one of his extraordinary wants. 2dly. The want which this resolution proposes to relieve, and which constitutes the heaviest item in the class of extraordinary wants. This want has been occasioned, not by the acts of the Executive, but by the action of Congress. The importing merchants have given the usual credit to their customers, and Government does not extend the usual credits to them. To these extraordinary wants, perhaps a few others might be added, but it is unnecessary to notice them.

The above positions, if true, will prove that the wants of the merchants are precisely what they would have been independent of the measures of the administration. But what I intend to admit is, that these measures have, for the present, cut off, or choked up, many of the sources from which these wants have been too liberally supplied. There is a panic in the community, which, for the present, destroys all confidence in our domestic trade and exchanges. The fixed property, and all property for domestic use and consumption, have depreciated, partly as an incident to a falling market upon exports, but largely owing to the shock upon our monetary system. Again, a large curtailment in the usual means of supply, may be found in the withdrawal from circulation of the amount of the Government deposits. These may be considered as taken from circulation, and withdrawn from the uses to which they have heretofore been appropriated. The Bank of the United States cannot discount upon them, because it has them not to discount upon. The State banks cannot, or will not, discount upon them, because, whilst the debate on the removal continues, the deposits do not constitute a fund upon which they can safely rely. This state of things, sir, must continue to a certain extent, at least until this uncertainty ceases, and some measure is decided on, to give stability to our monetary system, and restore confidence in the domestic trade of the country.

* Mr. Clay's own bill shortening the credits for duties on imports.

For the reasons before given, I shall vote for the specific inquiry proposed in the resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERS said that his attention had been called to a communication forwarded to him by some merchants of Baltimore, men of such standing and character as entitled them to every respect. It suggested the propriety of extending relief to another class of importing merchants: he meant those who were in the practice of paying cash duties, and who were at this time debtors to the Government, in consequence of laboring under great difficulties of providing for the payment of their debts. If, as gentlemen had said, an extension of time ought to be granted to another class of merchants, why, then, should not the same privilege be given to this? For the same difficulty exists with regard to the latter as the first: for both were much affected by the present pressure. The difficulty and embarrassment that was felt by this description of importing merchants was such, that a further credit should be allowed them. There could be no impropriety, in his opinion, in granting relief to one party as well as the other. He was not, however, disposed to make a proposition to introduce this matter in the resolution, but would merely call the attention of the Committee on Finance to it. If the resolution passed in the broad terms given to it by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER,] both classes might be included, as well as all others, by a modification of the existing law; but, if that should be objected to, he should then propose a modification of the resolution, so as to include the class of merchants to which he had called the attention of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER said he should vote for the resolution, as it merely proposed an inquiry; but no inference must be drawn from such vote, that he should ultimately support the measure. There were reasons for it, it was true, which had been stated by his colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] with his usual clearness and perspicuity, but he thought there were reasons against it also, some of which had been urged by the member from Illinois. The relief, he thought, to be afforded by such a measure, would be but partial; whereas, the distress of the country was general. The measure would benefit importing merchants, but it would not directly assist traders, manufacturers, builders, mechanics, and others classes of active men. It might prove disadvantageous to these, as the ability of the banks to discount would be lessened evidently by the suspension of payment on custom-house bonds. On the whole, he was willing that the committee should inquire, but he doubted the expediency of encouraging hopes of relief from this quarter.

Mr. W. said he would ask leave to say a few words upon a part of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] who had now addressed the Senate for the first time. He congratulated the Senate on the accession to its number of a gentleman of so much good sense and practical talent. The general scope of his observations Mr. W. thought entirely correct, but in one particular, perhaps, he might a little differ from him.

The question to which he (Mr. K.) had directed his attention was this: whether the disproportion between the home price of cotton, and the price abroad, was caused by the state of our money market, or was produced by other causes. The gentleman had argued, that this disproportion cannot be ascribed to the state of our money concerns, because other causes may have existed competent to produce the same effect. The price here, he says, and says correctly, may be too low for a just relation to the price abroad, from a fear entertained by purchasers here, that the price abroad will not hold up. It is not only, he says very justly, the present price abroad, but the probability there may be of that price sustaining itself; which governs the price here. All this is just. Want of confidence in the continuance of the foreign price may keep the article down here; but still the question is, is that the actual cause in the present case? Suppose that to have been the only cause in 1825, of a similar effect, what is the proof of the existence of any such cause now? It appears to me, said Mr. W., that if there were no fall of prices, except in the single article of cotton, there would be much weight in the gentleman's argument. But we see a fall of price in every thing, or almost every thing. We see it in stocks, in real estate, in merchandise of all sorts, and in labor itself. We find a universal cause therefore, to be at work; and it seems more just to ascribe the low price of cotton to the operation of this universal cause, thus affecting every thing else, than to seek for it some new and distant cause. When I say the low price of cotton, I mean that price which is not proportionate to the price abroad. There is another remark of the gentleman, to which Mr. W. would for a moment refer. The gentleman had suggested that the price of cotton was, and must be, as high as it ought to be; that is, at a rate fixed by fair result from the combination of the operation of demand and supply, because the country was full of capital, and, if cotton fell below its just value, there were enough ready and able to buy, and to take it out of the market. It is true, said Mr. W., there is capital enough in the country, but then the very difficulty lies in the exchange of capital—a difficulty growing out of the state of our moneyed concerns. How is capital to be exchanged for cotton? How is the real estate, or the stocks, or the ships, or the manufactured products of the North to be exchanged for cotton? Not by barter—not by exchange of commodity against commodity. It can be done only by the intervention of money, and this money is not to be had. The circulating medium is deranged. This is the precise evil. There is capital enough and property enough, but the exchanges of property and of capital are all obstructed. Money is the measure of the value of capital, and its representative also; and the exchanges of capital, in other words, all the business of commerce, is carried on by the agency of this representative. At the present moment this representative is incompetent to do its duty—it does not perform its office; and the result is, that exchanges of capital, in other words, commerce itself, is embarrassed, and must stop, precisely to the extent of this incompetency of the money system to execute its ordinary duty. I think, then, that it may be true that the country has capital enough, and that cotton is yet lower than it ought to be, in consequence of the state of the currency. I think purchasers do not buy either cotton or other articles, because they have not money to pay; and are not confident in their hopes of any such immediate change as shall enable them to command money, by the sale of their own property, or other means. In the course of this debate, said Mr. W., the subject of the interruption of domestic exchanges has been again brought forward, as the thousandth charge against the bank. It is perfectly strange to me, that it was not foreseen that this effect must necessarily take place. I think it quite unavoidable. The member from Pennsylvania had accused the bank of making profit by its dealing in exchanges, and had read from a letter of Mr. Crawford on that subject in 1817—the extracts from which that had been read, had proved nothing to the purpose for which they were quoted; but, if the whole of the letter had been read, it would have proved the reverse of the doctrine that was contended for. Mr. Crawford's idea was this: that it was the duty of the bank to make these exchanges, without charge, when there was no difference in the exchanges created by the operations of commerce; and nothing else. What! was the bank to have no compensation for the risk it incurred in sending these bills of exchange from place to place, backwards and forwards? Mr. Crawford never entertained such an idea, nor did the bank ever subscribe to such a duty.

The gentleman from Georgia would see that when an alteration in the course of trade takes place, there is then a difference in the exchange, according to the balance of trade one way or the other. Large quantities of specie could not be transported to where it might be required, under two per cent. including freight, insurance, &c.; and if the balance of trade had to be adjusted by specie, there was then, naturally, a difference of exchange; but the coming in of a great institution, like the Bank of the United States, with a large capital, had produced a beneficial effect in regulating the exchanges. Mr. W. said that he had no doubt that the honorable Senator would find that in no country had the cost of exchange been so small as in this, since the year 1820.

But as to the charge against the bank, of its refusing to buy domestic bills, Mr. W. had already said this was inevitable, and just what has been very often predicted. Gentlemen had argued this question as if the United States Bank could sell these bills without paying any regard to the operations of trade. How could it carry on its purchases of domestic bills, without the aid of the revenues, or any thing else, between portions of the country where remittances are all wanted one way? It could not do it. And the course of trade with the bank is not backwards and forwards from the North to the South—it is not that course of exchanges which meets another. The trade of the country goes in a circle.

It was probably known to all practical men, that the amount of bills drawn at New Orleans on New York, was three, or four, or five times as great as the amount drawn at New York on New Orleans. Now, (said he,) how can this be carried on by the mere capital assigned to the New Orleans branch? It is quite impossible. The ability to do much of this arose from the circumstance that the bank was to remit the revenue. This gave it means. All things show, that the bank stopped the purchase of bills, at the West and Southwest, from necessity, in consequence of disconnecting the mercantile operations of the bank from the transmission and remittances of the revenue. Some part of this business, doubtless, the deposit banks can do; that they can do it all, and do it equally well, is not to be expected. It is certain the Bank of the United States cannot now do it.

Look at the millions and millions upon millions of purchases that were made there during the cotton season, and see how it is possible for the bank, with the capital assigned to the branches, to carry on their purchases with bills. They cannot supply it by one-fourth part—the purchases being so large in that direction. The necessary withdrawal of the deposits would compel the bank to stop the purchase of domestic bills precisely where that stoppage fell most heavily upon the community—precisely where the exchanges of the bank were most used, and have been for the last fifteen years.

If any intelligent and candid man will look at the facts, he cannot resist the conviction that the internal exchanges have been conducted by the bank at a very cheap rate. Many millions a year have been bought and sold at an average rate of some fraction of one per cent. The convenience of this had been felt every where, but especially in the West, the Southwest, and the South. And the loss of this convenience will not fail to be felt, and felt severely in the same quarters. The money in circulation in all these great productive quarters of the country, will be, as has been justly said, below par in the great cities of the Centre and the North, and to that extent, exactly, will there be a depreciation in the value of their products.

There are yet other topics, sir, entitled to be considered, connected with this important subject of exchange, but I omit them for the present.

Mr. SILSBEE expressed his approbation of the terms of the resolution. He was of opinion, it would have the effect of relieving the importing merchants, and, consequently, others connected with them, and would eventually relieve the whole community from their present distresses.

Revenue Bonds.

Mr. WRIGHT said he rose not to discuss the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, but to say a few words in relation to the subject before the Senate. He considered the resolution, extensive as it was proposed to be made in its terms, by the amendments which had been offered, as a proposition merely and solely to extend the time for the payment of the revenue bonds. He was unaware that any measure could be devised by Congress which would have the direct effect of extending general relief, and he supposed it to be admitted on all sides that the action upon the collection of the revenue was the only action within the power of Congress, as applied to this subject. Entertaining these impressions, it had been his intention formerly, and when such a motion would have been in order, to have proposed an amendment which would have made the resolution one of simple inquiry into the expediency of extending the time for the payment of the revenue bonds, upon the terms proposed in the original resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] without any allegation as to distress, or any preamble whatever. That was now beyond his power, but such a motion was not material to his purpose.

He begged to be allowed to trouble the Senate with a few remarks, expressing his views as to the policy and effect of the resolution, considered in this limited sense. It would be necessary for him to speak of the causes of the distress at present prevailing in the commercial cities, in consequence of a pressure upon the money market, and he would take this occasion to say that he concurred fully in the remark made by the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] that what had been said here, in highly-colored and strong language, had been one powerful operating cause to produce that distress. But there was another and a principal cause growing out of the late changes in the tariff laws. He would give his authority upon this subject, as he felt bound to do when he made assertions of fact to this body. He had conversed freely and fully with the intelligent committee of merchants from the city of New York who had lately visited this city as the bearers of a memorial from a portion of their fellow-citizens, which he had had the honor to lay before the Senate upon a former day. That committee all agreed that, by the changes made in the tariff act of 1832, by the introduction of cash duties, and short credits, the increased demand for money in the city of New York alone, since the 3d of March last, the time when that act took effect, and down to the time of the conversation, five days ago, did not amount to less than ten millions of dollars. They said that the credits under the former laws were eight, ten, and twelve months, and that, in their estimation, the fair average might be assumed to be ten months; while, under the act of 1832, now in operation, the credits were three and six months, and the average was 4½ months, and that about one-quarter of the whole revenue collected at the port of New York under the last-mentioned law, perhaps a little less than a quarter, was to be paid in cash. What, then, he would ask, had been the practical effect of this change in the mode of collecting the revenue from March last until the present time? The bonds taken under the old law had been regularly and constantly falling due, as they would have done had the law not been changed, while the cash duties have been called for as the importations were made; and the new bonds, taken under the new law, have been also falling due since the expiration of the first three months of the year, commencing with March. Double payments of revenue have, therefore, as yet, been required, and will continue to be required till the year expires, on the 3d of March next. It may now be calculated that eleven-twelfths of the bonds taken under the old law are paid, and the remainder must be paid in a little more than twenty days. The double operation has been entirely performed, with the single exception of the old bonds, which will fall due between this time and the 3d of March next.

Any gentleman acquainted with the city of New York could not fail to see that this, of itself, was a most powerful cause for the pressure now existing upon the money market in that city, and especially upon the importing merchants. But what purpose did the Senate propose to accomplish, at this time, by the extension of the time of payment of the revenue bonds? To what bonds is the time of payment to be thus extended? Surely we cannot pass an act which will relieve the merchants from the payment of the bonds taken under the old law, for eleven-twelfths of those bonds are already paid; and the remaining twelfth will become due, and must be paid within less than thirty days, and before any law can be passed and sent out to relieve the payments. We, then, can only extend the time of payment upon the new bonds taken under the present system. What will be the effect of this measure? It will undoubtedly, as has been remarked by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] furnish temporary relief, as it will relieve the merchants, for a certain period, from raising money to pay any bonds at all, and therefore relieve them from raising money regularly to meet the payment of those bonds, which their present condition obliges them to do. But, if the extension be not made perpetual—if it be merely temporary—when Government shall again draw in the terms of credit, the double portion of bonds must again fall due together, and the same interruption must take place which has been caused by the late changes of the law. The state of things now existing, shows conclusively, that men will not take sufficient forecast: the merchants knew what the changes in the law were, but time has shown that they did not prepare themselves to meet the crisis. They feel it now, when it comes upon them, and so they will again, if the temporary extension be adopted. The relief will be useless, unless the present policy of short credits is to be permanently abandoned, and he was not ready to say that this should be done. He was, therefore, of the opinion, that no relief could be held out to those who now had credits, unless an entire change was to be made in the present tariff; and if that was to be done, he was unable to answer the remarks which had been made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. CHAMBERS] upon the propriety also of extending the lenity to those who were compelled to pay cash duties. He was unable to say what claim that merchant, who now receives a credit of three or six months, has upon the Government for further time, superior to the claim of him who does not now receive a credit at all, but of whom payment is demanded in cash. And are we to abandon the cash duties? But suppose both these extensions were given, would substantial relief be afforded to the community thereby? It seemed to him not.

He entirely agreed with the Senator from Illinois, in regard to affording relief to one class of the community in preference to another; and considered the argument he had urged as strong and unanswerable. The measure proposed would furnish temporary relief to the importing merchants, and to them only; and would it not, in the same degree, deprive other classes of business men of those accommodations, which they might otherwise obtain? The banks in which these bonds were deposited, and it mattered not whether it was the United States Bank or the State banks, extended their discounts in proportion to the means thus afforded them, and the payment of the bonds was depended upon to afford them the means to meet the calls which might be made upon them. You extend the time for the payment of the bonds, and you disappoint them of these means, and their accommodations must be restricted, according to the new condition in which you place them. What you yield to one class of men, therefore, by the extension, you will take from another, by the diminished accommodations of the banks. He (Mr. W.) felt himself bound to say, that, considering the resolution in this limited sense, as merely designed to institute an inquiry into the expediency of extending the time for the payment of the revenue bonds, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against it. If he could see, as the range of debate might seem to intimate, that the inquiry was intended to connect itself with the re-charter of the present, or the charter of a new bank, or to any other permanent and substantial mode of relief, being independent of the collection of the revenue, he should not, in that sense, be opposed to it; but he did not understand that to be its character.

In conclusion, he would make a single observation, in reply to the remarks which had been made by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER.] That honorable gentleman had told the Senate, this morning, that the New Yorkers were endeavoring to destroy the Bank of the United States, in order that they might obtain the control of the currency and exchanges of the country. It was but yesterday, that a story was spread throughout the whole country, that the opposition to the Bank of the United States, from his State, proceeded solely from a desire to change the location of that institution to the city of New York. He (Mr. W.) was glad to find, that that selfish object applied to his constituents was surrendered. And in reference to this new allegation made by the Senator, it was enough for him to say, that the business of the exchanges did not affect him; that he had neither profit nor loss to expect from it; and that, if the representations which gentlemen were pressing upon him daily, as to the extreme distress and suffering of his constituents, were well founded, the honorable Senator would at least allow, that they had some patriotism to endure these sufferings, that they might hereafter control the exchanges of the country. The gentleman was mistaken. The opposition to the bank in New York did not proceed from either of these causes; that opposition had a much deeper foundation, and higher objects; and he would only say, before he sat down, that he regretted that the firm convictions of his own mind, as to this truth, could not be communicated to every member of the Senate.

Mr. MANGUM rose and said, that it was not his design to go into the discussion of the subject. He was of the opinion, that the resolution, at best, contemplated a relief which could only be temporary. It therefore held out expectations which must prove delusive. With a view to test the sense of the Senate, he would now move to lay the resolution on the table, with a view that it should not be taken up again. He concluded with such motion.

Mr. CLAY rose—

The CHAIR [Mr. KING, of Alabama] said that it was a motion which did not admit of debate, and the Senator from Kentucky was not in order.

Mr. CLAY said that he did not require to be told when he was in, or out of, order. Whenever he was out of order, he should be ready to submit to a rebuke from the Chair. But he had now risen to ask the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion in order that he might make one or two remarks.

Mr. MANGUM. Certainly: I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLAY then commenced some observations in reply; when, at the suggestion of Mr. CHAMBERS, he yielded the floor, and the Senate adjourned till Monday.

NEW JERSEY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SOUTHARD rose to present the resolutions adopted by the citizens of Morris and Burlington counties, two among the largest counties in the State of New Jersey, the population of which amounted to about one-sixth of the whole population of the State. They were resolutions passed upon notice, after a public call in both counties, signed by citizens without regard to party opinions or party feelings; and, in the same spirit of independence of all party considerations, the meeting was held. It would be recollected by the Senate, said Mr. S., that he had, a short time since, presented his views respecting the power exercised by the Executive over the public money. These views he had expressed after calm and long deliberation, and with a strong conviction that they were not only founded in truth, but that they were entirely in conformity to the opinions of the people of the State of New Jersey. The day after he had thus given to the Senate the conclusions of his own mind, he received instructions from the legislature of New Jersey, which were introduced into that body in the morning, and all the rules of the legislature being waived for the purpose of facilitating their immediate passage, were passed, sealed, and despatched, on the same day, to his colleague and himself. He had received these resolutions with that respect which he always felt, and ever must feel, towards the men who represented the people of New Jersey. But he had believed then, and he was of the same opinion still, that the legislature, in adopting the resolutions which had been forwarded to him, had grossly erred in their representation of the public voice, and he had now in his hand two of the evidences of their error. The counties of Morris and of Burlington were both represented in the State legislature by persons who had voted for the passage of these resolutions, instructing him to vote against the restoration of the deposits, and now the people of those counties had instructed him not to obey these instructions, declaring that they did not represent the opinions of the people. He had looked with great anxiety to see if the instructions issued by the legislature of New Jersey, would be sustained by the people, and he had received these evidences that they would not be sustained, with no ordinary feeling of gratification. The county of Morris, which has received its population principally from the eastern part of the State, contained an industrious, hardy, and independent race of men, inferior to none in the knowledge and exercise of the mechanic arts and in agriculture. The citizens of Burlington county derived their ancestry from William Penn, and were as orderly, quiet, and industrious a population as any part of the country could produce. They represented the feelings, the opinions, and the principles of those from whom they had descended. They came to this country to lay broad and deep the foundations of civil and religious liberty. There was not, in their whole history, a single instance in which they had departed from the great and sound principles which they brought with them. There was one remarkable fact in the history of this people, that they were a covenanted community, over whom no crowned head could exercise control. It became necessary, in the course of their progress, to make some pecuniary concessions to the Government, but they bound the crown hand and foot, that it should not touch the colonial treasure. Through all the colonial history the crown was not permitted to usurp any power over the public treasure, and this principle the descendants of these people were determined to assert and sustain to the end.

Mr. S. said he had thought it proper to make these observations, in consequence of the position in which he stood, instructed on the one hand by the resolutions of the legislature, and, on the other, directed by the people themselves to disregard the instructions of their representatives. It was proper for him to make these remarks, also, for other reasons. Insinuations had been borne hither, in anticipation of these resolutions of the people—that they had been produced by his art or agency. If any one had made such assertion, it was an assertion stamped with falsehood. The first intimation which he had received of them came to him from the secretaries, after the meeting had been held. The citizens of his State were not men to receive dictation and opinions from party leaders, on one side or on the other. He believed that they understood their own rights fully. They were citizens engaged in farming, in mechanical operations, and in manufactures, and were as totally unconnected as men could be, resident on the seaboard, with active commerce, and were exempt from the consequences of its fluctuations; and when they came here to tell him the fact, that there had been a usurpation of power, a violation of law on the part of the Executive, and that even they, in their retired situation, were by these acts plunged into embarrassment and distress, they told him what he humbly believed; and he rejoiced that they concurred in his opinion. Instructed, then, as he had been, by the legislature of the State, to vote for what he conceived to be Executive usurpation, and charged by those who elected that legislature to oppose such usurpation, he had a consolatory reflection in the conviction, that the course he had pursued would be sustained by a majority of the people.

Mr. S. then moved that the resolutions be read and printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and so remained for several hours; when the doors were opened—

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. McKEAN presented the memorial of a meeting of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, (brought on by a committee of gentlemen appointed by the meeting,) complaining of their great pecuniary embarrassments, and the disordered state of the currency of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their immediate restoration to that institution.

Mr. McKEAN, on presenting the memorial, said, that a committee composed of gentlemen of the first respectability and intelligence, from Philadelphia, now in attendance at the seat of Government, had a few moments since charged him with a memorial to be presented to the Senate, signed by more than ten thousand citizens of that vicinity, deeply complaining of pecuniary distress and derangement of the currency, which they attributed to the recent removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying Congress to interfere for their relief. I have, said Mr. McK., been honored with an interview from a portion of this committee, and have listened to their statements; and however I may differ from them as to the true cause of present embarrassments, and the proper mode of redress, I can no longer doubt the reality and extent of suffering in that quarter. Mr. McK. then moved that the memorial, together with a letter which he had received from the committee, be read by the Secretary, and that both be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. CLAY said he hoped the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania comprehended not only the printing of the memorial, together with the letter of the committee, but the names of the memorialists.

Mr. McKEAN replied that he had not intended to move for the printing of the names, but he would accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, as a modification of his motion.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and said, that it would ill become him to add any thing to what had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with the view of drawing the attention of the Senate to this new and authentic evidence of the state of things throughout the country; coming, as this did, from so many and such respectable sources. But he thought it was his duty, as representing a commercial State, and having daily correspondence with those whom he represented, to state, that, so far from any mitigation of the public embarrassment, his information tended to prove the greatly increased and greatly increasing state of public alarm. Every morning's mail, this morning's mail, had brought intelligence of new and serious disasters in the commercial world. We had now reached a period of four months since the system had been changed; and we had advanced some weeks beyond the time when it was announced here that there would be no effort, on the part of the Executive Government, to provide a remedy for the distress which had resulted from that change. He asked gentlemen around him, if they could see any omens of returning calm, and quiet, and confidence, in the country? Were the people satisfied with the experiment, so far as it had been tried, or did they cease to pour in their complaints on the evil consequences of the experiment? He wished to address these questions to gentlemen who had become sponsors for the administration; to those gentlemen in this House who, he believed, possessed the power of saving the country. He would most respectfully and most earnestly ask them, whether they could see any way of escape from the pressure which was now upon the country, and from that greater degree of distress and embarrassment which was to be apprehended, and from which observing men see no rescue but a change of the system which has been adopted by the Executive. He prayed that gentlemen on the other side would take the subject into their earnest consideration; they had the power: and the prosperity of the country depended on their exercise of it. The situation of the country demanded the prompt action of Congress. He supplicated all who saw, with him, the extent of the public distress, to examine the evidence of the fact to be found in the hundred thousand signatures to the memorials on our table, and to adopt some change under the present system, or some change in the system itself.

The motion was to refer the memorial to the Committee on Finance. That committee would consider the subject, and might feel it to be their duty to make a full report. But it was not sufficient to present a report merely echoing the sound of distress. The cry of the country was for relief, for action, for legislative measures. Mr. W. was willing to go forward, to take up the state of the country as we may find it, and to see what kind and extent of relief could be given.

If the scheme which he might think best, should not be found agreeable to others, he was willing to take the next best which might be presented. Gentlemen were coming here from all parts of the country to convey the complaints of the people, and he besought the Senate to take up the subject, and determine what remedy could be applied. All the memorials on this subject had been referred to the Committee on Finance, and that committee may report on the whole of them, and as to the extent of the prevailing distress; but such report would be useless. They might report what appeared to them to be a proper remedy, but that might be useless, because their views on that subject were already before the country. It was the duty of Congress to adopt some measure of relief, and the country would not be satisfied unless that duty was promptly performed.

The motion to print and refer the memorial was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

North Carolina Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

NORTH CAROLINA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MANGUM presented the resolutions and proceedings of a meeting of a large and respectable body of the citizens of the county of Burke, in the State of North Carolina, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and deranged state of the currency of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, praying for some mode of relief, and recommending the immediate restoration of the deposits to that institution.

It was perhaps proper, Mr. MANGUM said, on presenting these proceedings and resolutions, to apprise the Senate that they spoke the voice of the immediate friends of the Chief Magistrate of the United States. In no part of the southern country was the phalanx which gave so strong an impulse to the popularity of the Executive, so unbroken, or so firm in its attachment, as was to be found in the district from whence these proceedings came; and yet he learned that in that country the sense of its population was universal in condemnation of those measures which had called forth the sense of the meeting. It was stated in these resolutions, that the money of the United States Bank was entirely driven out of circulation in that section of the country, either in consequence of its being hoarded by those who, having no immediate use for it, deemed it the safest money to keep, or by being absorbed for purposes of exchange, while that whole country was flooded with the trash of this district: even the smallest debts could not be paid but in coin. Sir, (said Mr. M.,) these resolutions speak the grave, calm, and deliberate tone of the best friends of the Executive, who emphatically say that they cannot submit to be ruined, to gratify the whims or caprices of any man. The flame (said he) is fast rising on the borders of the chieftain's own State: the sentiment is universal, and the indignation deep, at the violence of the determination by which their rights have been invaded, and the reckless disregard of public sentiment with which the injury has been persisted in. Mr. M. said, we were witnessing the opening of new scenes in the history of our country, where millions, instead of listening to the humble petitions of their fellow-citizens, were looking at the will of one man. In other words, the destinies of the country are held by one man, sustained by an organized party. The voice of distress, of wailing, and of complaint, never came from these organized partisans; but a spontaneous burst of indignation was heard throughout the country, which, he trusted, would go far to restore the ancient order of things.

Sir, (said Mr. M.,) these proceedings come in a small and unpretending form, when compared with the voluminous paper containing so many signatures, just presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKEAN,] but they speak the voice of men who are the original friends of the Chief Magistrate—men, who, walking on their native mountains, unused to the screws of party, know how to express their calm and deliberate convictions, in a language becoming freemen.

Mr. MANGUM then moved that the proceedings be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN called for the reading of the document, and it was read.

Mr. BENTON wished to make one inquiry. He presumed the proceedings were simultaneously presented to both Houses of Congress, and he would inquire whether the gentleman contemplated their being printed in each House. At all events, it did not appear to him that there was any necessity for printing the signatures twice.

Mr. MANGUM replied, that his motion was simply for the printing and reference of the proceedings. The motion to which the Senator from Missouri referred was in reference to the memorial presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [McKean.]

VOL. X.—34

Mr. BROWN asked for the reading of the paper, and the paper was accordingly read.

Mr. MANGUM then sent a letter to the table, which he desired might be read.

The letter having been read—

Mr. BROWN rose and said, that, although he had not been apprized, but a few moments before, that this preamble and resolutions were to be presented to the Senate, he felt it to be his imperative duty, as one of the Representatives of the State of North Carolina on this floor, in consequence of the tone of this preamble and these resolutions, and of the remarks of his colleague, to take the present occasion to explain some of his views in reference to this subject. He was one of those who, in his representative capacity, felt every disposition to respect public opinion, whenever that opinion could be properly ascertained. Whenever he should be brought to feel a settled conviction that the opinion of the people of North Carolina was in opposition to the course which he had felt it to be his duty to take on great political measures, and whenever that opinion should be fairly presented to him, he would be either prepared to obey it, or to relinquish the seat which he had the honor to hold on this floor. If he did not adopt one of these alternatives, he should consider that he was acting in opposition to the sacred principles of our republican institutions, and following the practice of those who, while they were issuing denunciations of Executive usurpations of power, were themselves acting in opposition to the expression of opinion of their own constituents; and were thus violating the great principles of republican Government. But he could not consent to take the opinions of these petitioners, respectable as he admitted them to be, as the sense of the people of North Carolina. It was true that some of the signers of this paper had been supporters of the present Executive, but it was equally true that others of them were his decided opponents. From the tone of the resolutions, and the character of the newspapers selected for their publication, he inferred, indeed, that the greater number had been always in opposition to General Jackson. What were those papers? The National Intelligencer—the United States Telegraph—the Richmond Whig. He admitted that some of the signers of the paper were once among the friends of the Executive, but this document came to the Senate in a very questionable shape. In regard to the great question which was agitating the country from one end of it to the other, his own opinion had been firmly and deliberately made up. From a view of all the circumstances he was satisfied that the agitation and embarrassment which prevailed resulted from the conduct of the bank itself, and the conduct of that political party, the existence of which seemed to depend on that of the bank. He should deem himself recreant to all republican principles, and to his own feelings, did he not place himself in zealous and determined opposition to such a course. What had been the course of the bank? When about eight millions were drawn from the bank—a small sum in comparison to its capital—every effort was immediately put in operation to produce distress and embarrassment in the country. While the bank thus put the screws down hard upon the people, politicians, men in high places, newspapers, the whole squadron of paid agents and organs, spread an alarm that the country was to be plunged into ruin by the removal of the deposits. Was not that conduct alone calculated to produce the distress which was foretold? Would it not alarm the capitalists of the country, the men who had any superfluous money, and prevent them from loaning to others? Unquestionably. Believing, as he himself did, that the freedom and independence of the people, and the maintenance of the constitution, depended on the issue of this contest, he would not consent for himself, and the State he represented, that they should be influenced by the cry of alarm which had been sent abroad. The public distress was a fertile theme for declamation; but could it be doubted that politicians feed on this distress; that it is the fund from which they draw their arguments; and they speculate on it to the greatest advantage. Let the condition of the bank be as unjustifiable as it could be, these gentlemen were uniformly sceptical; and, be the action of the Executive as unexceptionable as it might, they could find nothing to justify.

There was another view which he was desirous to present. He should be opposed now to the restoration of the deposits, because the inevitable result of such a measure would be the re-chartering of the United States Bank. It was true that it had been denied by many gentlemen that there was any connexion between the two questions. But what did they hear? Were they not told that it was impossible for the Government to carry on its financial operations without a fiscal agent; and that, without such agency, the whole of our revenue system would be involved in ruin? There were many who contended that the questions were distinct, and, while they were insisting on the restoration of the deposits, declared that they had no desire to touch the question of chartering the bank; but it was evident, that, while affecting to hate the traitor, they cherished the treason. If the bank possessed all this power to cripple the commerce of the country, to shackle industry, and injure our markets, it was an establishment repugnant to the constitution, and one which might ultimately seize the reins of Government. If it possessed all this tremendous power in time of peace, what if, in the moment of war, it should take upon itself the power to control all the State banks? It was his settled opinion, that if, in a great war of national rights, the stockholders of the United States Bank should choose to array themselves against the Government, as was the case with some of the owners of capital in the last war, they could arrest all the operations of the country, stop the progress of resistance, and compel the Government to conclude a treaty—a disgraceful treaty. Could he sanction the institution, when it was admitted to possess such a power? Although he placed a high value on the honor of a seat on this floor, if he were constrained to hold it only as the advocate of such an institution, the seat would lose all its value in his estimation, and he would surrender it without regret.

What did the Senate already begin to see? In Pennsylvania, where the bank was situated, public opinion was rising up against it. The honest and indignant voice of the people was denouncing it? It had been tried by a jury of the vicinage, tried by its own State, and there was no doubt that the public judgment would be recorded against it. Entertaining these views, and without desiring to throw any imputation on other gentlemen, he had found himself impelled to offer them to the Senate. He could not doubt that his colleague, in presenting his remarks on offering the resolutions, had honestly obeyed the convictions of his mind; and, while he accorded this tribute of justice to him, he hoped to receive for himself an equal charity.

One word further. He protested against the influence of this bank being exerted in his State. He denied that the State was in any way dependent on the institution. There was never a greater degree of prosperity among the people than at this time. Its population consisted of industrious farmers, mechanics, and planters, and over these he denied that the bank had any control. They had their own resources, drawn from their industry, by means of which they carried on their own operations. No national bank could reach them. They were entirely beyond its influence and control.

It had been stated, in a letter presented by his colleague to the Senate, and which had been read, that some of the notes of the State Bank had been at 8 per cent. discount, in the western parts of North Carolina. That bank was in as good credit as any bank in the Union. It was a specie-paying bank, and all that he should say, was that, if its notes were at a discount of 8 per cent. in the State, it was a greater discount than was asked in New York, or any where else. In New York, he believed, the discount was only two per cent.; and it was strange, indeed, if it was two per cent. in New York, and eight per cent. at home. He had noticed in a recent paper, that commissioners had been appointed to receive subscriptions of stock for a new bank, and they were receiving the notes of the State bank for stock, because it was a specie-paying bank. There was a difficulty in selecting a bank in the State for the public deposits, until there had been an action of the legislature on the subject. His colleague had said, that the flame was extending in the mountain region; that this was one of the strong holds of the administration, but that the flame was spreading and threatening a general conflagration. Now he himself had no doubt that North Carolina would always sustain the administration; that the opinions of the people, republican as they were, were decidedly against domestic foes as well as foreign enemies, and would support the Government against both. He had no doubt that these mountain men—mostly the descendants of that gallant band which so valiantly maintained the honor of their country at King's mountain, would, on this occasion, exhibit a firmness and courage which would not dishonor the achievement of that day.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] had adverted to the subject of the rates of exchange, and the prices of North Carolina money in the Northern market. He had understood the gentleman to say, that North Carolina money was at a discount of only two per cent. He (Mr. W.) had the Philadelphia price current before him, by which it was shown that North Carolina money was at a discount of five per cent.; Kentucky money at from five to eight per cent.; Alabama from eight to twelve per cent.; Louisiana and Mississippi eight to twelve per cent. In these several States, at any time during the last year, the discount was as follows: North Carolina one and a half to two per cent., now risen to five; South Carolina one and a half to two per cent.; Alabama from four to six, now risen to from eight to twelve. I think, sir, said Mr. W., that this is a sure indication of the state of the currency of the country.

One word more. The gentleman repeated the charges he had heretofore made against the Bank of the United States, and he (Mr. W.) called for the proof. He wanted to know what evidence the gentleman had that the bank had done every thing to put the screws down hard on the community, and to produce the prevailing distress, notwithstanding the withdrawal, by the Government, of six or eight millions from its vaults, and which the gentleman did not seem to consider very material. Would the gentleman from North Carolina only please to tell him what the bank had done to merit his censure. He surely did not mean to say, that he had gathered any thing against the bank from the general complaints of the community. If the bank had not discounted as far as its means would permit, the gentleman would have good cause to censure it; but this could not be charged against the bank, for, as far as he knew, it had not curtailed its discounts beyond the amount that had been withdrawn from it by the Government. He saw by a statement in a morning's paper, that the branch in New York had discounted liberally, beyond the amount that had been withdrawn from it. This did not look like putting the screws on the public, like doing every thing in its power to produce a scene of ruin and distress. He thought it exceedingly important, that if the bank had done any thing to render it liable to such censure, that the facts should be made known to the public. He should not object to any general statements which gentlemen might think proper to make, but he felt it his duty to ask for the facts sustaining them.

North Carolina Resolutions.

Mr. BIBB said, he was one of those who repelled the idea that he was any way influenced, as to the course he pursued on that floor, by a desire to re-charter the Bank of the United States. He was no bank man—never had been—he was not only hostile to the Bank of the United States, but to all banks—to State banks as well as to the Bank of the United States. If, however, he were compelled to choose between two evils, he would always choose the least. Let the Bank of the United States be called a hydra, or a gorgon, if gentlemen pleased, but he would rather have one tyrant than many—rather one serpent to contend with, than hundreds, whose stings were the more to be dreaded because less to be guarded against. I go, sir, said Mr. B., against the whole banking system, and that man who can devise a plan by which we can gradually return to a currency, founded on the only true basis, which, while the change is effectual, the pressure will be so slight, that all business transactions shall be accomplished without being deranged or embarrassed by the process, will deserve the thanks of the country, and meet with my hearty concurrence. That, however, was not the question which he viewed as presented to the Senate; not at all; but it was sometimes convenient for gentlemen who could not answer the true question, to seize upon unfounded accusations against the bank, for the purpose of drawing a veil over the weakness of their cause; and hiding from view the deranged state of the currency, and the pecuniary embarrassments under which the country was laboring. No portentous conjunction in the planetary system had caused the great and unprecedented state of calamity which was admitted to exist. The produce of land and labor, for the last season, had been most abundant. Commercial enterprise had never been more successful. There had been nothing in the natural elements that could have produced the wide scene of desolation and distress that had been felt from one end of the country to the other. We must, then, Mr. B. said, look elsewhere; we must look to other causes; to the political elements, whose baneful influence had been so deeply felt. Petitions were found on the table from all parts of the Union—from men of all parties, attesting the fact, that distress, alarm, and want of confidence prevail to an unparalleled extent. The fact no longer admitted of a doubt. Sir, there is a deep and all-pervading distress, which, like a cold and blighting mildew, has spread its baleful influence. Sir, it is so, or gentlemen must be inattentive to the sources of information before them—it is so, or men who seek to live by their industry do not speak the language of truth; and those only who are quartered on the Treasury, are the true barometers by which public sentiment can be ascertained, and public measures appreciated.

Sir, to my mind, the question of the constitutionality of the bank, or the re-charter of that institution, is not now presented. The true question is, how we are to give that immediate relief to the wants of the people, which the urgency of the case demands; and, in considering this question, we must also consider the relations between the bank and the nation. The contract between the bank and the Government was made by both Houses of Congress, together with the President of the United States; it has been approved by the people, and sanctioned by the Supreme Court. How can we get rid of this contract? Do gentlemen mean to say, that because the charter of the bank is unconstitutional, that they are at liberty to repeal it, and violate a solemn contract?—that on the ground that the nature of the obligation was not understood at the time it was entered into, that they are relieved from the performance of its conditions? Sir, I do not understand, that an individual, after solemnly executing a deed, can come into court and stultify himself—to allege that he was a fool, idiot, or madman, when he signed the instrument, and therefore it was void. Are we, of the present Congress, to stultify the Congress that made the bank, and President Jackson to stultify President Madison, who signed the charter? I go upon the principle that the contract was solemnly and deliberately entered into, and that the rights secured by it to the bank deserve to be fulfilled, because the bank paid for them by a large bonus, and performed certain valuable services in consideration of them. Thus, sir, they purchased the rights secured to them by the charter; and I, for one, will not be willing to tarnish the faith of the nation, by withholding them on the mere ground that our predecessors made an unconstitutional contract. It was plainly written on the face of the charter; and any gentleman who took the trouble to read it, would find that citizens and foreigners were invited to come in and subscribe their money to the stock of the bank, in consideration of the privileges granted to it. The bank was to pay a bonus of a million and a half of dollars, and to perform certain important services, while the Government promised, among other things, that the bills of the bank should be received in payment of duties, and the revenues of the Government be deposited in the bank, until the 3d of March, 1836, unless otherwise directed by Congress.

Until that time, he (Mr. B.) should insist, as far as he could, that the faith of this Government, solemnly pledged to the civilized world, to citizens of the United States, should not be tarnished, sold, and degraded, for the pitiful sum to which its capital amounted. Sir, thirty millions of dollars doubled, nay, quadrupled, sinks into insignificance when compared with the faith of the nation—a jewel of all price, which should not be sold, with his approbation. On this position he would take his stand—he would, with all his energies, continue to uphold the public faith, which hitherto stood unrivalled, without blot or stain, or suspicion. With respect to what the bank had done, he meant not to enter into that part of the subject. He would merely refer to one important clause in the charter, which gentlemen had wholly overlooked. By referring to that instrument, gentlemen would see at once that the bank must look to the state of its deposits, both public and private, when regulating its discounts. The moment that the Secretary withdrew the public deposits, that moment the eighth article of the charter made it imperative on the bank to call in its circulation, and the necessary consequence of this was to put a limitation on her power to discount, and to compel her to curtail. Now, sir, when the bank was under the necessity of looking to the state of her deposits, she would have violated this part of her charter had she extended her discounts beyond the limitation, and a scire facias would have issued. Sir, this bank is not at liberty to flood the country with its circulation. They must look to their charter, and go not beyond the limits prescribed. He could not believe that the directors of the bank were so vindictive, so ferocious, as to find a terrible pleasure in the distresses of their fellow-citizens. He knew the gentlemen who were directors in his section of the country, and that their sympathies were as easily excited as those of other men. The great danger in his opinion was, that all banks would go too far—that their sympathies, being easily excited, they would be more apt to make loans than to withhold them. He could not charge the bank with the ferocious, hostile intention to produce ruin and distress in the country, to subvert its own purposes. The bank had done all in its power, consistent with the limitations of the eighth section of its charter; all that it could have done, in the present disturbed state of the country, to prevent the evils that have befallen it. Sir, I beg leave to make an explanation, rendered necessary by some remarks which fell from an honorable gentleman the other day. He had been charged with having voted for the Bank of the United States. This was a mistake; the Mr. Bibb who voted for the bank was not the Mr. BROWN then present—but was a cousin of his, and representing another State. He had opposed the bank from republican principles—he had been a republican all his life, but he had been equally opposed to the tumult of a democracy, and the calm of a despotism. He was for a settled Government, having organs chosen to represent the people, who should be as effectual a check against Executive usurpation, (from which danger had always come, and was always to be apprehended,) as against popular tumult.

So long as he held these views, he would continue to oppose the measures of hostility which had been waged against the bank, and would use all his exertions to have the national faith towards it preserved inviolate.

Mr. BROWN wished to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had referred to the rate of exchange, to show the value of North Carolina and other notes at Philadelphia. I (said Mr. B.) had remarked, that North Carolina notes of the State Bank were at two or three per cent. in the Northern cities, and had inferred that they could not have depreciated down to eight per cent. in their own State, when they were at two per cent. at so remote a distance. It seemed that North Carolina notes were reported at only five per cent. discount in Philadelphia, which was not so much as the alleged discount in the western part of North Carolina.* But he considered the Philadelphia market to be an unsafe guide, as it was under the control of brokers, who might be connected with the bank; and nothing could be more easy than for a combination of traders, who wished to depreciate the price of notes for a few weeks, to do so. But they were not so omnipotent as to be able to do this for any length of time. There were no notes in better credit than those of the North Carolina State Bank, which was a specie-paying bank. The banks in the State were in the possession of public confidence; their charters were on the point of expiring, except one, which had been lately re-chartered by the legislature, and they were in the daily fulfilment of their obligations. The gentleman from Massachusetts had stated, that he (Mr. B.) had made grave charges against the bank, and asked him for the proof. He thought that there was strong proof before the world. What was its conduct when the public deposits were at first removed? Did it not immediately curtail its discounts, to an amount far beyond that which had been withdrawn? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] had, some days since, read a paper, to show that bills of exchange were sold on better terms by some of the State banks of Pennsylvania than by the United States Bank; showing the disposition on the part of the United States Bank to embarrass the domestic exchange. That was some proof. What other proof was there? Its rapid and great curtailments of its accommodations every where, except, perhaps, in New York, where it might have pursued a different policy. There was yet an amount of ten millions of specie in its vaults, yet it continued to reduce its discounts. The great danger was in the secret operations of the bank. If all its schemes could be developed, and the public could have a knowledge of all its secret machinery, which was employed in spreading distress through the community, they would discover that, like the electric stroke, it was not seen until it had fulfilled its fatal mission.

Mr. MANGUM said a few words in reply, in a low tone. He reciprocated the tribute which his colleague tendered to him. As to the rate of exchange in New York, he stated the fact, that, within a few days, an intelligent merchant of Baltimore, of unquestionable veracity, had told him that a gentleman of North Carolina, who had occasion to remit the small sum of fifty dollars to New York, sent the amount in notes of the Cape Fear Bank—several brokers were applied to, to buy the notes, and they would not take them at less than eight or nine per cent. discount. At length a gentleman agreed, as the sum was insignificant, to take them at seven and a half. Yet that paper was as good as the paper of any bank in the United States. It had weathered all storms, and retained its credit unimpeached. He wished further to remark, that he repelled, as an improper question in this debate, any consideration as to the propriety or impropriety of re-chartering the bank. That was not the question before the Senate, nor should it be made the question with his consent. He understood the first object to be, adopting the eloquent language of the Senator from Kentucky, to replace the constitution on the pillars from which it had been thrown. It should be the first object to restore the credit and character of the country. It was not a question of bank or no bank. Whenever that question should be presented, he should determine for himself as to the course he should steer. The Senate ought now to look to the subject before them; to perform their duty at all hazards; the duty they owed to the constitution and the country, and to repair the violated majesty of our constitution and our broken faith.

Mr. FORSYTH rose, when,

On motion of Mr. PRESTON, who announced the sudden death of Mr. BOULBIX, of the House of Representatives, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. CHAMBERS presented the memorial of about 3,000 citizens of Baltimore, unfavorable to the removal of the deposits, and ascribing to that cause the existing embarrassments. He moved that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHAMBERS, on presenting the above memorial, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I am charged by the highly respectable committee appointed by the citizens of Baltimore, to present the memorial of those citizens upon the all absorbing subject of the depression of business, the distress for money, and the derangement of the currency.

The peculiar circumstances of this morning's session, and the expectation of receiving an annunciation from the House on a most melancholy occasion, must prevent me from saying much that I should else have felt bound to say. I cannot, however, refrain from giving a brief history of the memorial and of those who have signed it, as communicated by the committee from whom it was received by me.

A call was made in the morning papers for a meeting to be held on the day the call was published. A very numerous meeting was held, and a memorial agreed upon, which was left at the Exchange for the signatures of those who chose to subscribe to it. No expresses were employed to run through the city, or procure the names of minors, apprentices, and others, having no interest in or connexion with the business affairs of the place.

Most of the signatures were made by persons who, obeying the dictates of deliberate judgment, expressed by their subscription their approbation of its contents.

The persons who have signed it are from that most numerous and useful class of every community, which comprises men of business and active occupation, "merchants,

* Mr. Brown deems it his duty to state, that since the debate which occurred in the Senate on this subject, he has seen the "Morning Courier and New York Enquirer," dated on the 8th inst., and that the rate of discount in the city of New York, as given in that paper, on the notes of the several banks of North Carolina, is from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent. only.

traders, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers." They are divided by no party line, they are moved by no desire to elevate the political fortunes or prospects of one man, or to depress those of another. Some of them supported the present Chief Magistrate, and others opposed him. They are divided by no line which designates the friends of the United States Bank from those whose pecuniary interests are connected more intimately with the local banks. Four of the directors of the bank selected by the Executive to collect the moneys of the Government, are amongst its subscribers. In short, the memorialists are of that order of society which constitutes its wealth and its strength—the defence and protection of the nation in war, and its source of prosperity in peace.

Such men, to the number of near three thousand, now spread before you a narration of their condition—of the condition of their community. They tell you "that at no period in their history was that condition more prosperous, or their prospects more encouraging." But the unwise measure of the Executive has darkened this bright picture. "Evils are now heavily pressing upon the country, produced alone" by the removal of the depositories. "Distrust and apprehension have suddenly seized upon the moneyed institutions and private capitalists; a great shock has been given to confidence between man and man; loans are called in; discounts reduced; capital is hoarded—while credit is forced to sustain itself by yielding to usurious exactions."

Sir, the memorialists know that Government was instituted and is sustained to secure to them and to their fellow-citizens the pursuit of happiness; to preserve their commercial prosperity, and perpetuate the means of advancing their progress in the attainment of the comforts derived from a safe employment of their skill and industry.

They have illustrated the truth of the remark which is expressed in the memorable declaration of the rights of man; they have exhibited that "patient sufferance" which a community will usually evince while "evils are tolerable." They now come to those, whose sympathies and whose interests should be allied to theirs. They "have appealed to our justice and consanguinity;" "have conjured us by the ties of our common kindred." Shall it be said, "that we too have been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity?" Sir, I hope better things, and I will hope too, although it seems to be against hope, that if the two Houses of Congress yield assent to their application, they will not have occasion to say of another department of this Government, "he has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good." Sir, it would be a fearful responsibility, which in the present distressed condition of all the great interests of this country, no man, alive to the obligations due to a suffering community, would allow himself to assume.

Mr. President: It is mockery and insult to say to such men, speaking their own experience, that they are utterly mistaken—that they know neither their condition nor the causes which have produced it, nor the means of alleviating it. It is fit to be instructed by their more intimate acquaintance with transactions to which all their energies have been directed, with which all their prospects are connected, and to all the details of which they have looked with an acuteness and anxiety, an intelligence and vigilance, that suffers nothing to elude their observation.

That a total misconception of results, practical results, to follow the late unfortunate experiment of the Executive, existed at the time it was determined on, I have no doubt. That it was ever intended or desired to bring over the whole face of this fair country, blooming in all the beauty and pride of wealth and social and commercial abundance and prosperity, the gloomy sounds and shadows which now break every where on our eyes and our ears, to convert the smiles of gladness and comfort into the agonies of poverty and ruin, is what I cannot believe.

Such, however, are the consequences that have followed, in point of fact. Then, why not retrace this false step? Is magnanimity a virtue fit only for individual adoption? Has a nation no duty to correct error and redress wrong? Is continued perseverance in evil such a national virtue as to enlist advocates to recommend it?

Mr. President: The evidences are becoming so numerous and so decisive, that nothing but the discipline of party, the emoluments or the expectation of office, or that censurable pride of opinion which indisposes a man to retract acknowledged heresy, now prevents the whole mass of the community from a universal expression of its wish to have this fatal policy of the Executive abandoned. Men will obey the impulses of their judgments, when their interests, their dearest interests, run parallel with their convictions. This mistaken policy, if not arrested, must continue to multiply its mischiefs. They will be more acutely felt, and more exactly traced to their true cause. The farmer who receives the return of his crop, the only means of his sustenance, when he finds, as he does find, that from every bushel of his wheat he has lost his twenty-five cents, and from every bushel of his corn his fifteen cents, and reflects that this is his contribution—exact, not voluntarily offered—to sustain a policy, which, however destructive, the pride or the obstinacy of his rulers will not allow to be changed; when the planter comes to know and to feel, what is precisely true, that although the foreign market justifies a better price for his tobacco than at any period of the last four years, he yet loses, for the same reason, the sum of three dollars on every hundred weight of this article; sir, when these facts come to be the experience of the farmer and the planter, think you they will submit in silence? No, sir, they will unite, with one vote, in condemnation of the measures and the men to whose course they trace their disappointments and their ruin; they will swell the chorus which is now raised by the merchants, whose operations are suspended, and whose ships are rotting in the harbor; the manufacturer, who turns from his loom the industrious workman, whose wages he is no longer able to pay; the mechanic, who is no longer able to procure either materials or workmen to produce, or purchasers to take the fruits of his skill and industry; and the honest laboring man, who, at the close of a day of toil and fatigue, either finds his employer unable to pay his scanty wages, or finds those wages reduced to such restricted limits that they will not sustain his family with bread. It is to prevent such a state of things that these memorialists now ask the intervention of Congress; and I move you, sir, that their memorial be read and printed, with the names attached to it.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed, with the signatures.

DEATH OF Mr. BOULDIN.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Honorable THOMAS TYLER BOULDIN, late a Representative from the State of Virginia—and that his funeral would take place to-morrow at half past 11 o'clock.

Mr. RIVES rose and said—

Mr. President: The Senate were yesterday apprized by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] in the momentary absence of my colleague and myself, of the melancholy event which has just been communicated to us by the House of Representatives, and which has deprived the State of Virginia of one of her most distinguished Representatives in the legislature of the Union. The event, sir, in all its circumstances and associations, was one of the most solemn and affecting character—well calculated to admonish us, in the midst of our busy careers, "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" I now rise, Mr. President, to ask, at the hands of the Senate, the accustomed marks of respect to the memory of our deceased associate, and which are so eminently due to the high character he maintained in all the relations both of public and of private life. I beg leave therefore, to offer for the adoption of the Senate the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the Honorable THOMAS TYLER BOULDIN, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, at the hour of 11 o'clock, A. M., to-morrow: and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

This resolution having been unanimously agreed to—
On motion of Mr. RIVES,

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet at half past ten o'clock, A. M., for the purpose of joining the House of Representatives in attending the obsequies of the late Honorable THOMAS T. BOULDIN.

On motion of Mr. RIVES,
The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

No business was transacted in the Senate to-day, the Senate being engaged in attending the funeral obsequies of the late THOMAS T. BOULDIN, a member of the House of Representatives.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

NORTH CAROLINA RESOLUTIONS.

After the transaction of morning business—

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to print and refer the resolutions adopted at a meeting in North Carolina, which he presented to the Senate on Tuesday.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to say, that when, on the other day, he had risen, it was for the purpose of remonstrating against the practice which had recently crept into the proceedings of the Senate, leading to a great consumption of time, without the production of any proportionate advantage, of introducing petitions with long speeches. He did not know that the practice was contrary to the rules of order of the Senate, but he thought it was a subject which deserved the attention of the Senate. After the awful lesson which had been received a few days since, they ought to bear in mind the importance of time, not only with a reference to the other world, but also in relation to this world; and that the presentation of petitions should only be accompanied by the usual motions for their reading, printing, and reference.

According to the practice now introduced, gentlemen make speeches, which invite investigation, to show that the individuals were respectable, and the proceedings were adopted without reference to party. These statements led to replies, concerning the respectability of the parties, and to deny the allegations that the proceedings were not tinged with any party feeling. As to the greater number of the petitions, they were obviously of a party character. The object of the petitioners proved this to be the fact. It was said that these meetings were called without distinction of party. All persons, of whatever party, who thought that the President had taken a wrong step, were called together, to express their opinions to that effect. They were not called together to investigate the matter calmly and dispassionately; but they who were predetermined to condemn the measure of the President, were called together, as it was said, without distinction of party. There was also another fact: while some of the signers of these petitions were represented as the old, tried, and staunch friends, yet it appeared that, resolutions were unanimously adopted, containing expressions of the utmost harshness, such as could never have emanated from men who had ever entertained any feeling of respect for the President. It was not his object to apply his observations to any particular petition. The people were every where engaged in doing, in their primary assemblies, precisely what their Representatives were doing on the floor of Congress. The few who were endeavoring to lead the public opinion, through the Union, as well as here, aiming at the same object, and that, not to express public opinion, but to direct it, to induce the public opinion to take the particular course which the party leaders desired.

As to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, he did not know whether it was intended to include the printing of the letter which a few days ago was read at the table; but, with or without that document, it amounted to the same thing. A unanimous assent had been given to the resolutions, and they were of the strongest reprobatory character. The individual who had taken the lead at the late meeting, was a disappointed member of Congress. He was an individual of excellent character, well known, and of honorable feelings, but these feelings had been embittered by recent defeat. The letter which had been read showed conclusively that attempts had been made to produce a spirit in the mountains, which would be followed up in North Carolina, as it would be in other States, with a view to produce, if not the reality, at least the appearance of distress. He saw nothing beneficial which could result from this course. The Senate had often seen memorials presented here, condemning the measures of the administration, and had been told that these petitions were the unerring indices of public opinion, but this voice had never found its way to the ballot box. It was found to be nothing more than the voice of a feeble minority, struggling to become the majority. This had been the case heretofore, and this would be found to be the case hereafter. When on this question the voice of the people should be thrown from the ballot box, it would again be found sustaining the course which the Executive had pursued.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he agreed with the honorable gentleman from Georgia, that it was not usual, in cases of ordinary petitions, to occupy a great portion of the time of the Senate, either in discussing the merits of the petition itself, or to inquire into the character and connexions of those whose names it bears. But certainly said (Mr. W.) I differ entirely and widely from the gentleman, in supposing that, considering the present state of the subject which occupies both Houses of Congress, and what was more, the undivided attention of the whole country, there was the least degree of impropriety in paying more than the usual attention to the petitions on the one and on the other side of the question. The right of petition is a great constitutional right; it is not a mere form; it is a right of the utmost importance, so far as it is exercised in regard to public measures; and a mode, the most authentic and efficient that we know of, to express the opinions of the people to those who rule them. Well, the gentleman had insisted that the exercise of this right, on a public question, necessarily draws after it the propriety of inquiring from whom the petition comes—from persons of what respectability—of what aggregate numbers, and under what influence they were believed to be acting; for the purpose of acquainting ourselves, thoroughly, with the character of petitions on both sides, and with the persons whose names are attached to them as memorialists, that we may judge justly of their weight.

All this is necessary to be known, in order to arrive at a fair expression of public opinion. The gentleman has said, that in the meetings held on the subject, there was no discussion, but simply an expression of opinion. Be it so, they are component parts of the will of the people. The gentleman had observed, that although this meeting, as well as others, professed to be called together without distinction of party, they immediately took a particular character: and that it was composed of persons who disapproved of the act of the Executive. The gentleman thinks there is a political stimulus at the bottom of all this proceeding. He (Mr. W.) thought it far otherwise—thought that the politics of the country, so far as was meant thereby the political advancement of one man, or one set of men, was very little connected with this matter. Look at the three thousand carpenters, house joiners, masons, painters, and other citizens, who have laid their case on our table this morning, from New York; every one of whom, in signing his name, had added his place of abode, his business, and his occupation. Was it, said Mr. W., to be imagined that all these men had been actuated only by a political motive to advance one man, or one set of men, and to disappoint others? Have we seen such a course pursued heretofore? Has such a state of things existed when a political question merely has agitated the public mind? Never. Nothing in the history of public opinion has been presented to equal what has been passing before the two Houses of Congress during the last six weeks. Why should all this have happened? What has caused this burst, the outpouring from so many of the people—in so many ways—to both Houses of Congress? When men of known character and reputation—that from the first have been the friends of the administration—have now come forward and expressed their disapprobation of this measure, can it be said that they did it for a political motive? Are their own assertions not to be received as true? For one, he must say, that the state of the country ought to be attentively considered, in consequence of the numerous petitions that had been presented to the Senate; and Mr. W. thought that the Senate were not bound to inquire who had sent them, and under what circumstances they had been produced. Let the people speak, and let us hear their speech. Let us understand, only, whether what we listen to is the voice of those who are interested in upholding, all and singular, the acts of the Executive, or whether it be the true voice of the people—the voice of that great majority who have no interest in the Government, except that it should be a wise and good Government. Throw open the doors wide, to all petitions—receive all, canvass all, compare all, and wherever the great preponderance is, there let it be considered that we have ascertained the public will.

Mr. W. had not been so fortunate, when this memorial was under debate on Tuesday, as to learn from the honorable member from North Carolina [Mr. Brown] what the facts were upon which he founded his heavy charges against the conduct of the bank. But, Mr. W. said he had since sought to inform himself, from such means as were at hand, as to the condition of the bank, with a view of ascertaining how far it was justly liable to an accusation of unnecessarily withholding discounts, and thereby continuing the public pressure.

On the first of this month, it appeared, the condition of the bank was this:

The amount of its loans, fifty five-millions, within a fraction.

Its notes and bills in circulation nineteen millions.

Amount of money in bank on deposit, ten millions, within a fraction.

Specie on hand, ten millions and a half.

The amount, then, for which the bank is liable at any time to be called on, is twenty-nine millions, being the amount of its bills in circulation and of the deposits in the bank.

To meet this demand, it holds ten and a half millions of specie; that is to say, it has an amount of cash in its vaults a little more than equal to one-third of its existing liabilities.

It was very possible that, under other circumstances, some enlargement of the circulation might be made on this amount of specie, though Mr. W. had understood the Bank of England did not feel justified in going far beyond this proposition.

The Bank of England (said Mr. W.) is on the most friendly terms with Government; it has recently received a renewal of its charter, its notes are payable in one place only, and they are made, moreover, by statute, a lawful tender in the payment of all debts, except by the bank itself. Yet, under all these favorable circumstances, it appears, from the evidence taken in the House of Commons, to be a general rule with the bank to keep on hand bullion to the amount of one-third of the circulation and deposits. Thus, on the 1st of December last, the liabilities of the Bank of England were—

Notes in circulation,	-	-	18,659,000
Deposites,	-	-	12,415,000
Total,	-	-	£31,074,000

And the assets, or means of payment, were—

Securities	-	-	23,160,000
Bullion,	-	-	10,134,000

Total, - - - £33,294,000

This shows, as I have stated, (said Mr. W.,) that the specie on hand is equal to about one-third of all the liabilities of the bank. I am enabled to present this state of the Bank of England in December, in consequence of a rule, I believe, incorporated into the new charter of that bank, by which the bank publishes periodically, say monthly or quarterly, its actual state; that is to say, it publishes an account of its circulation and deposits, constituting its liabilities; and of its securities and bullion, constituting its assets, or means of payment. And I have no doubt, that much good results from these periodical publications, inasmuch as they give the commercial world an opportunity of being always well informed of the true amount of the actual currency of the country. But, in reasoning upon the ability of the Bank of the United States to extend its loans, under present circumstances, we are to remember that it has twenty-four branches, spreading over a vast country, some of them nearly two thousand miles apart, and that, although not bound to do so by law, it has been in the habit of receiving, at one branch, the bills of all other branches as cash. Under ordinary circumstances, as experience has proved, this was practicable without great inconvenience. But in the altered state of things, greater caution is evidently made necessary. The Government is opposed to the bank. Every thing done by the Executive, and by the Treasury, for the last six months, has been calculated to shake its credit. Other banks have been placed in an attitude of opposition to it. Runs have been made, in one instance at least, on its distant branches; and, consequently, it has become necessary to give new strength to these branches. These twenty-four distant branches are like so many fortresses, all of which must be doubly manned, now that all are threatened, and some actually attacked. I will not say, that, under such circumstances, the bank could not safely discount farther, I only say it is not clear to me that it could, and I have confidence that the directors, knowing what is expected of them by the community, will do their utmost to relieve distress.

There is another circumstance worthy of consideration. It is this: There is in circulation five or six millions of bank checks, or drafts. These are all payable on demand, like notes and bills, and heretofore have answered all the purposes of notes and bills. But intimations are daily thrown out, that orders will be issued from the Treasury forbidding the receipt of these drafts or checks at the custom-houses and land offices. Should this be executed, it is expected, I suppose, that these drafts will be thrown upon the bank, to be redeemed in specie. But, Mr. President, (said Mr. W.,) the great consideration remains yet to be mentioned. The debt due to the bank is fifty-five millions of dollars, and its charter will expire in two years and twenty days. Now, sir, would it be at all prudent to run up these fifty-five millions to seventy-five, or to make any other considerable advance on the existing amount of discounts, considering how soon all is to be called in? Indeed, is it not high time to commence the process of collection and reduction? Could any thing but the unexampled condition of the country, justify the bank in holding its amount of loans as high as it now is? Is the collection of fifty-five millions a thing which can be done suddenly? Others may take a different view of the subject, but, for one, I confess, that unless there be reasonable ground to expect a continuance of the charter for some time, longer or shorter, I think any such further extent of the loan would be a measure of most questionable propriety. No doubt, if the bank might expect to be continued, even for a short period, and especially if its relations to the Government were restored, by causing it to become, hereafter, as it has been heretofore, the depository of the public moneys, it might safely augment its discounts, and effectually relieve the public distress. A law that should continue the bank, even for a short time, and that should re-establish its relations with the Government, which are now broken off by the removal of the deposits, would quiet the country immediately, and afford such relief as, I have no doubt, that the business of the now opening year might yet go on, and the policy which threatens to bembur the business of the whole country for the next twelvemonth, avoided.

The present is a moment of spasm and agony. The whole social and political system is violently convulsed. This, if no relief come, must be succeeded by a lethargy, which will strike dead the commerce, manufactures, and labors of the community. This, I think, sir, is the real prospect before us.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he must have been very unfortunate in his remarks to the Senate, as he found that he had been greatly misunderstood by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He had never objected to pay all possible attention and respect to the memorials which were presented here. For that purpose they had their seats on this floor. But the point of his remarks was directed against the speeches which were made on the presentation of petitions. The proper course would be to refer these petitions at once to the proper committee, and it would be their business to ascertain the character, political and personal, intellectual and moral, of those who had signed them; to sift the arguments contained in the petitions, and to form their judgments whether these petitions did or did not exhibit a fair expression of the public will. To the full exercise of public opinion, he would make no objection. But why were the Senate to go in advance of the committee, and to make all these inquiries in the open Senate? Were we to take for granted all the assertions of honorable Senators? Were we to adopt all their theories without examination, and to be persuaded, on this floor, that, when the legislature of a State send here resolutions, they did not know what was the opinion of their constituents, and we were directed to receive the petition of a meeting of citizens as evidence of the fact? Were they to hear all this, and not go into any discussion of the subject? Such discussion would more properly come up after there had been a report from a committee. It was certainly of importance that gentlemen should know what was the true opinion of those who sent them here. There could be no possible objection to the printing of these petitions. The perpetual ding-dong of one tone into the public ear, whether in the presenting of the miserable petition of some half dozen individuals, or a legislative expression of public opinion, could have but one effect, and that was to increase the public agitation. For what purpose was all this done? Would it remove the public distress? Would it stand in the place of legislative action? The destinies of the country were in our hands; he meant, in the hands of the two branches of the legislature. Why did they not come to a decision? The gentleman from Massachusetts had remarked on the present agitation of the country, and the numbness which might be expected to follow. All who had spoken on one side had agreed that there was a remedy which could be applied; but no one had come forward to make a specific proposition on the subject. But the distresses would not be reduced, the public agitations would be increased, and would lead to important results.

The gentleman had said that these petitions could not be considered properly as party movements for political effect. It was quite the reverse. What was the form in which public meetings were called, when patriotic and pure views only incited men, and the only object was the general good? How were the calls made in such cases? The citizens were requested to meet for the purpose of discussing with calmness the matter to be presented. It embraced every body who had a judgment to form and to express, and when men were thus called together to discuss and decide matters, there was something to go upon. But what was the case now? All who were opposed to the act of the President were called to meet together, and record their opinion. And any one who might go to these meetings, without a predetermination formed, would not be welcome there; he would have no business at the meeting, and if he attempted to give his sentiments, it would be regarded as outraging the courtesy of those who had called the meeting.

The gentlemen from Massachusetts had asked for the evidence that the bank had unjustifiably withheld relief from the country. The whole question turned on the meaning of the word unjustifiably. The gentleman from Massachusetts had said that if the bank should only have its charter renewed for a short time, and the good understanding between the Government and the bank could be restored, it would then have the means to relieve the country. That was as much as to say, that when it had obtained its object, it would give the necessary relief, but not until then. The question was, had the bank a right to withhold relief under the hope that the public distress would become so great as to coerce the Government to recharter it. That was the true question. But the bank had done more than refuse relief. It had shown a disposition not even to inquire into the fact of the existence of this distress. When there was a meeting of the different banks in Philadelphia for the purpose of investigating the fact, the Bank of the United States refused to become a party to the investigation. It stood still. It merely exerted its vis inertiae. But the consequences had not been so great as was anticipated. There was at least one section of the country on which distress had not fallen. In the southern States they were in that happy situation in which the eastern States were some fifteen or sixteen years ago. The southern banks were all above the reach of the United States Bank: their credit could neither be diminished nor increased by its action. He had before him a price current. There was a bank in the town in which he resided, the Bank of Augusta, which commenced on a capital of 600,000 dollars. It had permission to double its capital. The new stock was therefore disposed of by public auction in December last, when it brought 20 per cent. on the whole amount of the stock, being a clear profit of 120,000 dollars on the 600,000. In the last price current this stock stood at 120 per cent. [He then read the prices of various stocks of banks, ice companies, &c., at the South, to show that they were all above par.] It was clear, therefore, that, in the South, there was abundance of specie and no pressure. There was one other fact to which he would call the attention of the Senate. The staple commodity of the South had risen in value. Cotton had brought a halfpenny per pound higher than it was previously selling at, and this was in advance of the rise which had just taken place on the article in the Liverpool market.

He concluded with making an apology for having suffered himself to follow the bad example he had risen to condemn. It was agreed, on all hands, that public opinion must settle this great question, and who was there that did not see that the sooner this opinion was had, and the decision made, the better for the country.

Mr. CLAY observed, that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] had risen, as he had informed the Senate, merely to remonstrate against discussion on such trifling occasions as those of presenting petitions from the people, unfolding their distresses and invoking relief from Congress. I (said Mr. C.) rise to protest against the gentleman's remonstrance, and to say, that I shall not avail myself of the gratuitous admonition which he has given. I am well aware that discussion is not very grateful to the ears of presumptuous power, when the wisdom of its measures is questioned, and that it prefers a state of perfect submission and of entire quiescence and acquiescence, leaving to it the exclusive care of public affairs. But, I hope an independent Senate will never be wanting to speak out boldly and fearlessly its sentiments to the country on the interests of the people.

The supporters of the administration have exhibited a remarkable figure in the Senate. They commenced by ascribing the general distress to the bank, or, rather, to go further back, they began by a confidential denial of the existence of any distress. The honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] whom I am sorry not to see in his place, told us that up to the last of November, after the branch in Pittsburg had called in half a million of dollars, no suffering was felt; and yet he attributed the subsequent distress which arose in that community to that call. Now I should imagine, that, if it occasioned any distress, it would have been felt during the process of the call. It was then that the pressure must have been experienced, if the mere fact of the curtailment had been its only cause; but, no, says the gentleman; none was then felt: when he left his constituents, all were prosperous and contented. Why, sir, if the period of their sufferings is to be fixed at the time of the gentleman's separation from his neighbors, he had better hasten back to them and let us see whether, in the pleasure of again meeting them, he can restore their prosperity and happiness.

At length the evidence of deep, wide-spread, alarming distress, is poured in upon us, in such a mass, and so convincing, that no one is hardly enough any longer to convert the fact. But the friends of the administration, unwilling to own what the whole country feels and knows to be the true cause, the usurpation of the Executive, are perpetually taxing their ingenuity to find out some other. The Senator from Pennsylvania says, that the debate in this Senate has produced the existing state of things; that this debate has agitated the country, occasioned the scarcity of money, checked the operations of business, and led to the afflicting bankruptcies which have unfortunately occurred. The gentleman goes even further: he ascribes all these terrible consequences to a speech which I had the honor of addressing to the Senate some weeks ago. Well, sir, if one speech be competent to produce such extensive scenes of distress, and to excite a panic so general, another may be able to bring relief and tranquillity. And I hope the gentleman will hasten to complete the speech, one-half of which he made some days ago, and by it restore to a suffering people the confidence, the sound currency, and the prosperity, of which they have been deprived.

From the distress which is so generally felt, the gentleman from Georgia felicitates himself that the South is yet exempt; that the town of Augusta is particularly easy and prosperous; and that cotton has recently experienced the great advance of a half cent per pound. It may be true that some small portions of the Union are yet unaffected. But how long can they preserve their enviable exemption? How long can any part of the country remain uninfluenced by a total derangement of the currency, and a prostration of public confidence? And is it kind in the honorable gentleman, because his particular town of Augusta does not yet feel the mischief, which sooner or later must sweep over the whole land, to oppose investigation into the causes of the adoption of obvious and appropriate remedies?

Since gentlemen have been compelled reluctantly to admit the prevalence of distress, there is one cause of it, ever ready, which they are constantly assigning: The bank, the bank, the bank! How really stands the matter? The President, in his famous manifesto of September, avowed, that one of the objects was to compel the bank to wind up its affairs. The Secretary of the Treasury repeats the same purpose in his report to Congress. The bank (say they) had but a little more than two years to run, before the expiration of its charter, and it ought to begin to wind up; that is, to curtail its discounts and business. The Executive does more: by its measures, it compels the bank to call in its resources. In this state of things, the bank, from the necessity of its position, begins to wind up; and as soon as it commences the operation, as soon as it adopts the very course which the President and Secretary declare to have been their object, an outcry is raised against the bank. And gentlemen see, in the very effect which the Executive measure was designed to produce, in the fulfilment of its avowed object, that the bank is aiming at a re-charter.

If any one will take the trouble to look into the case, he will find that the process of winding up, on which the President seems so firmly resolved, must necessarily produce great, extensive, and not very temporary distress. The bank has out on loan fifty-five millions of dollars. If that sum be called in by the 4th of March, 1836, a period of little more than two years, the curtailment must be, if it were distributed equally throughout the whole time, at the rate of upwards of two millions per month. But, as the bank has, after its charter has expired, two years longer to close its business, let us suppose that the curtailment should be performed in four years instead of two, and equally distributed. This would require upwards of a million per month. Can the country, without suffering, bear a reduction of upwards of two, or even one million per month?

This banking system is so connected and interwoven together, that, when one bank, or a system of banks, of large and extended business, calls in, all must call in. As, in the opposite case, when one freely puts out, all may. They move together, whether in expansion or contraction of accommodations. When a call is made for a considerable sum, payment is effected, in part at least, in the notes of other banks; and these notes become a credit in the possession of the collecting bank, for which it may demand specie; and the debtor banks must reduce the discounts to their customers to obtain the requisite supply of specie. If, on the contrary, large issues are made, these issues form a basis on which other banks may operate and extend their business.

The President resorts to a high-handed measure; violates, as we believe, the constitution; tramples upon the laws; wrests from us the custody and control of the public treasure and the general currency. The people petition and remonstrate, and fill the city with their committees, sent here to expose their grievances, and to solicit speedy and effectual redress. Under these circumstances, the gentleman from Georgia rose in his place, and told us that all discussion, in presenting these petitions, is unprofitable; and, remonstrating against it, he expresses the hope that, hereafter, the business may be silently transacted. I tell the gentleman from Georgia, and he may tell the President, that, when the constitution has been outraged, the liberties of the country brought in danger, and the highest interests of the people put in jeopardy, the Senate will not be silent—Congress will not be silent—the people will not be silent. Until I am prepared to bow my neck to the yoke of despotism, for one, I will remonstrate, protest, and loudly proclaim the danger impending over us. I have no doubt that discussion is painful, and provokingly impertinent, to the tenant of yonder White House—that he would prefer dead silence and universal submission; but I trust that these miserable petitions, as the Senator from Georgia denominates them, will continue to come in; that the country will become sensible to the reality of the existing dangers; that discussion, in every form and on every occasion, will take place; and that, finally, the constitution and the laws will resume their accustomed authority.

North Carolina Resolutions.

The gentleman professes to perceive, in these miserable petitions, party purposes, and the objects of party only. He believes that the sole design of the vast movements of which we every day hear, is to displace those in power and introduce others. Why, sir, would the thousands, and tens of thousands, that are every day and every where assembling, and expressing their grievances, in unexaggerated language, meet for such a purpose only? Would the men of business quit their work-shops, their counting-rooms, their offices, and many of them, at great personal inconvenience, repair to the seat of the General Government, for any such object? Would they come here to present their miserable petitions? No election of President, of members of Congress, or of members of the State legislatures, is just at hand. Most of those elections are as far removed, in point of time, as they well can be. That of Chief Magistrate is three years distant.

If we did not know that, in many instances, the people, without distinction of party, met and united in these petitions, or, without assembling together, subscribed them, we might be perfectly sure that nothing but severe and pervasive distress, actually felt, and still greater anticipated, could occasion the general excitement of which we have daily proofs.

And what are the remedies proposed by those in possession of the Government? None, none. Idle, and visionary, and chimerical schemes, are indeed sometimes thrown out, but even they are not seriously proposed. A member, not now in his seat, [Mr. RIVINS,] had suggested one of these schemes, which is to banish all paper from circulation, and to resort exclusively to hard money. A more wild and impracticable project never entered the head of man. It would be a gross imposition upon the community, (of course I do not mean any thing disrespectful to the honorable Senator,) to attempt such a mad purpose. Congress has no power to accomplish it. How can it effect the destruction of, or reach the State banks? What authority has it to put them down? How utterly unavailing would be the measure of refusing to receive their notes in payment of duties? They would still be used in all the business of society, and, choking up all the channels of circulation, would finally force themselves, as they did in 1815 and 1816, into the general treasury, as the only means left to the people to pay their contributions to Government.

Hard money! Why, sir, let us glance at some of the obvious effects of a resort to the precious metals as the only medium of circulation. The whole currency of the United States may be stated at about 120,000,000 of dollars, ninety in convertible paper and thirty in specie, either in the vaults of the bank, or in the hands of the people. This sum of one hundred and twenty millions is the representative of the property of the country, and constitutes the means of transacting its business. It represents the value, determines the price, and is the instrument of effecting alienations of the property of the country. What would be the immediate effect on property of the sudden withdrawal of the paper currency of the country, that is to say, three-fourths of its actual currency? Property would sink down to one-fourth of its present value. It would sink lower. For we know that, when property is generally falling, the fears of men are in advance of the actual depression, and carry them to a point much below what it ought to be. As, in the opposite case, when it is rising, their hopes carry them ahead of the actual rise, and the spirit of speculation prompts them to give more than its actual value.

What would be the effects upon debts? Every man, if three-fourths of the currency were stricken down, would have to pay four dollars for every one he owed. A single example will illustrate the state of things. Suppose a man to be now worth $40,000 and to owe $10,000. He could, in the present state of things, pay off his debt, and have a residuum of $30,000. But in the contingency supposed, it would take his whole property, and probably more, to pay his debt, and he would be left destitute.

Nor is such a project desirable, if it were practicable, and Congress possessed power to adopt and enforce it. The introduction of bank notes, convertible into the precious metals, at the will of the holder, is a great facility in the transaction of the business and commerce of mankind. Some common standard of value exists in all forms of human society. It supersedes, even in the savage state, the practice of simple barter. The substitution of the precious metals for the ruder objects employed in the first stages of commercial operations, was not a greater improvement than that of substituting a sound, safe, and convertible paper currency for the direct employment of a metallic medium. Such paper, well regulated, entitled to and possessing the confidence of the public, saves labor, economizes time, and avoids risk. Compared to a cumbersome metallic currency, it is what sails or the power of steam are to oars in navigation, or railroads and McAdamized roads are to natural and unimproved highways in travelling. A metallic currency indeed! Who believes it possible? Who thinks that society can be thrown back, from its present advanced state, centuries? Why, let us look at its effect upon a single operation. How are the three millions of dollars annually received for the public lands to be collected in specie? Are they to be waggoned across the mountains to the remote land offices of the West, and waggoned back again?

No, sir, you may put down the bank, and refuse to charter any other United States bank; and what then? Hundreds of other banks, beyond your control, will spring up, like mushrooms, in every direction, in spite of you. Acting without concert, irresponsible to you, each will seek, by all sorts of means, to throw out its paper, until, sooner or later, and I fear the time will not be very long, the country will be overspread with a spurious circulation, and a general explosion must inevitably ensue. Already, in anticipation of the downfall of the bank, numerous projects of local banks are under consideration in the State legislatures. In Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, and, ultimately, no doubt, in all the States, these projects are, or will be, proposed. One in the State of Indiana has passed, or is likely to pass, for, I believe, several millions; and I have seen with regret that one in Kentucky, for the moderate sum of five millions, is favorably considered.

What ought Congress to do? Let us first vindicate the authority of the constitution and laws, rebuke usurpation, and assert the independence and just powers of the legislative department. This is our first duty. Until this is done, until the balances of the constitution are restored, all legislation will be vain and nugatory. Let us again separate the purse and the sword. Whilst they are united in the hands of one man, of what avail is our action? When, and not until, this paramount duty is performed, let us take up for consideration the subject of a bank. Gentlemen tell us that the question now pending is, bank or no bank. It is no such thing. It is constitution or no constitution; the predominance of the laws or the uncontrolled will of one man. When the constitution and the laws shall again resume their just sway, the question will not even then be bank or no bank. That is a question long since settled—settled by experience, by the necessity of the case, and in the judgment of those who are denouncing the existing bank. They know that a United States bank must exist. And the question is not a bank or no bank, but the location of the bank. It is a question between Pennsylvania and New York—Philadelphia and the city of New York—Chestnut street and Wall street.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WAISER,] it is true, declares that he is opposed to any bank of the United States. But he is only one gentleman; he may not be here when the question comes up; he may be otherwise provided for; he may review and alter his judgment. I understand that, in the State of New York, by common consent, a sort of statute of limitations exists against all political opinions of two years' duration. Bank or no bank! There is no such question now or hereafter likely to arise. All feel and own that a United States bank is indispensable. And I have but little doubt that the very spot is now in view, if the ground be not actually laid off, on which a magnificent banking-house is contemplated in Wall street. Why, what did the President tell the New York committee of merchants which lately visited him? That the Government, (not Congress, but the Government,) in his sense of the term, that he was determined to try the experiment of the league banks, and, if that failed, he would try some other. And what other, that failing, but the Wall street bank? What did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KANE] tell us the other day? Substantially, that it was not the bank that was objected to, but the president of the bank: not the vessel, but the commander. There can be very little doubt, that, if the corporation had turned out its able, experienced, and faithful president, and put in some Executive favorite, as another corporation did, we should perceive less opposition to the bank. The Senator from Illinois prefers the fifty bark canoes, lashed together with the grape-vine. By-the-by, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS*] found out that the grape-vine had three ends to it—one more than I ever knew any other cord or ligament to possess. The Senator from Illinois prefers being one of the crew in the squadron under the auspices of Admiral Taney. Admiral TAWNEY!† (said Mr. C.) Why, sir, the very sound of the name is enough to repress every martial emotion, and to dampen all chivalrous ardor. If good currency, good reasons, or any thing else good, can issue from such a source, I shall be agreeably disappointed. No, sir; I will not embark with the gentleman under such a commander. Give me, in preference, the old commodore—the able, zealous, faithful, long-tried commodore, and the star-spangled banner waving at the mast head of Old Ironsides. The name of BIDDLE is patriotic, revolutionary—and implies gallantry, and honor, and probity.

Mr. President, I have most unexpectedly been drawn into this debate. I rose, simply to protest, most solemnly, against the remonstrance of the gentleman from Georgia, who would stifle the voice of distress, and the accents of despair, as they are transmitted to us from the people, by cutting off all discussion. I repeat that, although the freedom of the press has been recently assailed by the Executive, the liberty of speech yet remains; and, whilst I continue to retain a seat in this body, I shall freely use it, all remonstrances notwithstanding, in exposing Executive encroachments and abuses, and in warning the people of the dangers which threaten their highest interests.

Mr. BROWN said it was not his intention to take any further part in the discussion, more than to reply to some of the observations which had fallen from gentlemen on the opposite side of the question.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who had just addressed the Senate, had contended that this was not a question of bank or no bank, charter or no charter, but a question of "law or no law," and yet the honorable gentleman seemed to have a sort of happy facility of urging upon the attention of the Senate arguments tending to establish the necessity of a re-charter of the bank, whenever the question of the removal of the deposits was in any way brought to their consideration. Had he not just spoken, in terms of extreme ridicule, of the policy of employing the State banks as the fiscal agents of the Government? Had he not endeavored to exhibit, in the most striking light, the public benefits which he ascribes to the bank? Yet the honorable Senator protests against making up any such issue, and disclaims all connexion between the two subjects.

The gentleman had said, that in the State of New York a sort of law or statute of limitations is in existence, well known among the opposing political parties there, which prevents them from looking back to the opinions of each other beyond a period of two years. Mr. B. was not aware whether there was or was not such a law or usage among the parties in that State, or elsewhere; but, if it did exist, he thought that some other gentlemen might well avail themselves of that statute of limitations, and none could interpose it with more propriety, against too curious a research into their former opinions, than those who had formerly maintained, with great ability, in the halls of Congress, that the Government had no constitutional power to establish a national bank, and who now contend for the existence of such a power. He believed that the Senator from Kentucky would be found to be among the number of those who would profit by such a plea in bar.

The gentleman, in commenting on an expression made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS,] that he had heard no complaints of distress when he left home among his constituents, but that quiet and tranquillity prevailed, had remarked that, if the presence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania could remove the complaints and distress which now prevail among his constituents he hoped he would return to them, and restore that quiet and contentment, which they had lately enjoyed. Now it appeared to him (Mr. B.) that no persons were so competent to restore quiet, as those who had contributed to raise the storm. If he mistook not, the honorable gentleman was among the first to open the discussion of this subject. At that time, but little complaint of pecuniary distress was heard. If he remembered right, he had heard him say, that public confidence had in a great degree been destroyed by the course of the Executive, that the country was in a state of alarm, and that men considered their rights more unsafe than formerly. Was not language of this kind calculated to produce a storm—calculated to produce that very destruction of confidence, and general distrust, which it is alleged now exists? He would again repeat, that none were so fit to calm the whirlwind as those who had contributed to raise the storm.

The Senator had said, that the discussion of this subject was not acceptable to the ears of the Executive officer of the Government; that the language of truth is always heard with dissatisfaction and displeasure by those in power. He (Mr. B.) would take the occasion to say, that no Executive who had ever presided over the affairs of this republic, had been more assailed by the public press, in speeches, and in every other mode. There could be no just complaint made, of an abridgment of the liberty of speech, or of the freedom of the press. We saw here, daily, a practical proof that both existed to the greatest extent; and long may they continue so to exist. But from whom (said Mr. B.) have we heard the taunt, that discussion was sought to be avoided by the friends of the administration? From those who are sustaining the course of a bank which has violated its charter by committing the management of some of its most important pecuniary transactions to a smaller number of directors than is prescribed by that charter; which has outraged the rights of the people of the United States, by expelling, in effect, from any share in its proceedings, the directors appointed by the Government, and whose duty it is to guard the public interests which they represent in that institution—a bank which, he believed, had exerted its great and dangerous powers to inflict injury and distress upon the country, that it might drive the people and their Government into submission to its demands. It did appear to him, that the charge which had been made against the friends of the administration came with an ill grace from those on this floor who were sustaining the course of such an institution. From that quarter, he thought, inquiry and discussion might well be deprecated.

The honorable gentleman seemed to have a very great antipathy to the name of the Secretary of the Treasury, and had expressed his decided preference for that of Mr. Biddle, president of the Bank of the United States. This proved what he had often heard remarked—that there is “magic in a name.” The gentleman had said, that he had no idea of embarking under such a commander as the Secretary of the Treasury, with his fleet of forty or fifty State banks, but preferred embarking under the commander of that vessel who had gained for us national honor, national glory, and in whose name there was something martial. Allow me, said Mr. B., to remind the honorable gentleman of the achievements of that fleet of State banks, to which allusion has been made, during the late war. Where, he would ask, was the national bank, and its commander, at that period? That very fleet of State banks was that which had carried us in triumph through the late contest with Great Britain. It was true, that their paper became depreciated, but it was undeniably true, that the peculiar condition of our country at that time, together with the course pursued by the Government, had mainly produced that result. Commerce with foreign nations had almost perished. The Government went to war without the means to carry it on, and the State banks were, in a great degree, relied on to furnish them. The Government stimulated them to make loans to it, to an extent greatly beyond their ability; the certain consequence of which was a depreciation of their paper.

If the country had been then differently situated; if it had been in the enjoyment of a rich and prosperous commerce with the rest of the world; if the immense revenues had been then annually pouring into our Treasury, which have since filled it; if they had been sustained by the deposits of the immense sums of public revenue which the national bank had so long enjoyed, they, too, might have sustained their credit. If the national bank had been then in existence, circumstanced as the country was, commerce almost destroyed, the Government receiving but a small amount of revenue annually, and, consequently, unable to strengthen it by large deposits, and borrowing large sums from it, as it did from the State banks, without any immediate means of repaying even a part of the sum borrowed, it cannot be reasonably doubted but that the national bank would have been driven to a suspension of specie payments, and its paper, consequently, greatly depreciated.

Mr. B. was opposed, on general principles, to the banking system, in any form, as he believed it to be at variance with the spirit and character of our institutions; but he was much more opposed to a national bank, which had shown that it had the power, with an immense capital, and when possessed of the Government deposits, to wield an almost irresistible influence over the affairs of the country, for good or evil purposes, as it might choose. He would, before he sat down, say a few words in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who had called for the proofs that the bank had, by its conduct, contributed to add to the distress which at this time prevails in some parts of the country. He (Mr. B.) doubted whether any proofs, however strong, would remove the scepticism which seemed to prevail among gentlemen on this subject. He would refer to a paper which he held in his hand, which he had been assured by an honorable member of the Senate had been prepared by a most respectable and intelligent gentleman. [Here Mr. B. read the statement referred to, showing that the Bank of the United States in Philadelphia charged a higher premium on bills of exchange on most of the great commercial cities, than the Girard Bank.] It was by thus endeavoring to affect injuriously, and embarrass the domestic exchanges of the country, by asking unusual premiums, in different parts of the United States, that a most serious blow had been inflicted on the prosperity of those engaged in trading and commercial pursuits. What, he would ask, was the irresistible inference from this state of things? No one could doubt the ability of the bank to extend these accommodations on terms as good as the State banks, and the fact of its not having done so, in the city of Philadelphia, was conclusive proof, to his mind, that it was intended to thwart and embarrass the commercial portion of the country, and which must necessarily extend its influence to the agricultural interests.

Mr. B. said, that one of the causes which had, in his opinion, mainly contributed to the distress which prevails in the commercial cities, was to be found in the hostile attitude occupied by the United States Bank in relation to the State institutions. He would beg leave to read a part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to show the course and tendency of that hostility. Mr. B. then read from the report of the Secretary (speaking of the operations of the bank in the fall of last year) as follows: “Thus, upwards of six millions were withdrawn from the business of the country, by the Bank of the United States, in the course of two months. This, of itself, must have produced a pressure on the money market, affecting all commercial transactions. But the curtailment in the bank accommodations of the community was much larger. The policy adopted by the Bank of the United States compelled the State banks to take the same course in self-defence; and the Bank of the United States appears to have resorted to the expedient of drawing from the State banks the balances due, in specie, and to have hoarded up the article in its vaults.”

By this course of operations, on the part of the bank, it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that in the short space of two months, it increased the amount of its specie six hundred and thirty-nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-four dollars and thirteen cents; which sum, the Secretary expresses the belief, in his report, was drawn chiefly from the State banks. It was these movements against the State banks that had, doubtless, placed them on their guard, and which rendered it necessary that they should place themselves in a defensive position. Hence, as the Bank of the United States curtailed its discounts in most of the commercial cities, they were compelled to do so likewise, to a great extent; or, by the attacks which they might reasonably expect from the Bank of the United States, be driven to suspend specie payments—a consummation, no doubt, not altogether undesired by that bank, as it might in that way demonstrate its alleged superior claims to manage the fiscal concerns of the Government. It was, to his mind, clear, that whatever real cause there was for the pressure, that it was to be traced, in a great degree, to the unnecessarily large curtailments made at the period referred to, and afterwards, by the bank, and the spirit of hostility which it but too plainly manifested towards the State banks in most of the principal cities, which compelled them, instead of affording relief to the community, to curtail their business, and thus increase the distress—a measure, the necessity for which originated in the improper course pursued by the Bank of the United States.

North Carolina Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

It had been said that the bank had increased its accommodations in New York. He believed this relief had not been given until a short time since, when the state of public sentiment, becoming indignant at the conduct of the bank, had rendered it perhaps politic to relieve the distresses which he must believe it had had a very great agency in producing.

Mr. WRIGHT said he felt no disposition to engage in the debate, arising as this had, but he felt bound to say a few words in reference to the question before the Senate, and then answer a few remarks which he deemed personal to himself. The memorial which was the subject of remark came from the constituents of the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANUM] who presented it, and we heard from him that the memorial had nothing to do with the continuance of the public deposits in the Bank of the United States, or the recharter of that institution. That subject was not mentioned in the memorial itself; yet the debate which sprung up to-day, makes it applicable to the recharter of the bank, and the removal of the deposits. What had we heard from the Senator from Massachusetts? He told us that the bank had out fifty-four millions; and that, if it is to wind up its affairs in two years, it cannot extend or continue its discounts; yet he shows that the bank has ample means, while he alleges that the community cannot bear the pressure to be occasioned by the bank calling in its loans. This much has been reiterated by the Senator from Kentucky. Let us take these and compare them together. Does the bank need the public deposits? No, sir: because the bank has more loans out than the community can pay in four years. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to weigh this deeply, and then say, whether this is not a question whether the bank's charter shall be renewed. Why does the bank want the deposits when it has to wind up in four years—when, even if it had them, it could not, consistently with the duty of winding up, extend its discounts? It is because its friends seek to make it a pretext for the renewal of the charter. I stated a few days ago that the distresses of the country had been produced by the measures of the bank, and in answer to the assertion that this distress had been caused by the removal of the deposits, further stated, that the bank had curtailed to the amount of $9,600,000, while it had four millions of dollars in its vaults. This statement was incorrectly reported, and I now desire to be understood as saying, that, up to December last, the curtail had reached over nine millions, while the withdrawals of the public money amounted to only about half that sum. We have been told that the Government manifest a hostility to the bank, and that an assault was made on it on the delivery of the first message of the President. Now, sir, it will be found, on examination, that, in December, 1830, the outstanding debt of the bank amounted to forty millions of dollars, and in May, 1832, we find that debt amounted to more than seventy millions. Now, was this large increase of its outstanding debt a preparation for winding up its affairs? Why, sir, by the very showing of the gentleman from Massachusetts, its debt was larger since, than when the first message of the President, in relation to it, was received. Is not this an important fact? Sir, if the bank is to wind up, that extension of its discounts is to be called in, and the pressure occasioned thereby is to be attributed to the bank itself. I speak here against the bank, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts speaks in its favor. [Here Mr. WENSTEN dissented.] Well, sir, if the gentleman disclaims it, I will admit I am incorrect. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had made statements in the course of the remarks just delivered, that he hoped he (Mr. W.) would never imitate. He has made allusions to my State, and to its political matters generally, representing me as the organ or tool of a political party. Sir, I speak the sentiments of no one; and the opinions I deliver on this floor are my own. The gentleman represented me as speaking the sentiments of the Government; but, sir, I never assumed such a position: and, if the refutation of the charge when first made was not sufficient, it is not necessary for me again to repeat it.

The honorable Senator had also spoken of the statute of limitations in the State of New York as to political opinions. Of this I know nothing, and it can have no influence with me. He had given here, (Mr. W. said,) his honest convictions in reference to that most dangerous institution, the Bank of the United States. He believed it to be a dangerous institution, and would continue so to believe, although the honorable Senator had intimated that he might hereafter be found on the other side. Experience might have taught the gentleman what he had not yet learned; but he would tell the Senator that, if ever he changed his opinions, he hoped in Heaven not to find it necessary to detail, in justification, his private transactions with a moneyed institution. But, again, he had been told that he was deceived by those with whom he acted—that their opposition was not to a bank, but to the location of it. If ever he could learn that the gentleman from Kentucky understood the opinions of his constituents better than himself, (and, to understand them better, the gentleman must be better informed than the evidence of the last two or three years would warrant him to believe,) he would then be willing to go to him to learn them.

Mr. CLAY disclaimed having made use of the word tool. He had used no such expression; nor did he say that the constituents of the gentleman from New York wanted the bank in Wall street. As to the gentleman's disavowal of any knowledge of the views of the Executive, it must pass for what it is worth. Any one who knew the position which the gentleman occupied in relation to the occupants of power, could scarcely disbelieve that he had spoken their sentiments. He had asserted that the opinions he had given were his own, but there seemed to be a peculiar facility in the conformation of his opinions to those of the Executive.

He (Mr. C.) had said, that the question was between Chestnut street and Wall street; and he believed that if the gentleman would review his own opinions, he would be satisfied that they came to the same point. It would be found impossible to get along with thirty or forty State banks, without the aid of a national bank. Would the member from New York tell him—he said nothing at all about the gentleman's constituents—that the project of a bank in New York had not been again and again discussed in his State? The resolutions which had been presented here were not so much against a bank as against the bank, under the command, as the gentleman from Illinois had said, of Commodore Biddle. As to the gentleman's opinion, whether he should ever change it, or not, was a matter of perfect indifference; but the gentleman had said he had never heard of the New York statute of limitations, by which old opinions were not to be inquired into. Now he had heard of this statute five hundred times since he had been on this floor, and he believed every other Senator had, although the Senator from New York said he had never heard of it.

In reference to his change of opinion on the subject of the Bank of the United States, Mr. C. said he was glad it had been again touched upon. It had been frequently adverted to, and he would now notice it. About twenty-three years ago, this question was agitated. In 1811 he was without any war experience, or any great experience of his own, and there were then not more than fifty banks in existence in the country, and he did then entertain the opinion, and he did express that opinion, in a speech, against the creation of a bank, which very speech gentlemen were now circulating in a garbled form, wherever they thought its circulation would further their views. He had then believed the bank to be unconstitutional. What he now said, was not for the purpose of gaining applause or praise; but during a political life of thirty years, this was the only question of public importance on which he had changed his opinion. And what were the circumstances which had wrought this change? The experience of the war, and of the operations of these very banks, which the gentleman said had so triumphantly borne us through difficulties, had compelled him to review and revise his opinions. What was the fact? The Government issued paper bearing an interest of six per cent., which it pledged the faith of the country to redeem. For this paper, guaranteed by the honor and faith of the Government, there was obtained, for every one hundred dollars, eighty dollars from these banks, which suspended their specie payments. The experience of the war, therefore, had shown the necessity for the bank. The country could not get along without it. He had, then, changed his opinion on the subject, and he had never attempted to disguise the fact that he had changed it, in consequence of the experience which he had obtained. He had doubts if experience could have the effect of changing any opinions of the gentleman from New York, or the gentleman from North Carolina. He had changed his opinion with Madison and other men, as wise certainly as either of the members from New York or from North Carolina. Did he skulk on this occasion? He held at that time a situation in the House which would have permitted him to lock up his opinion in his own breast. He was then the presiding officer of the House of Representatives. The question was not to continue a bank, because there was none in existence, but to create one; and he had then come forward, as honest men ought to come forward, and expressed his change of opinion, at the time when Mr. Madison, who was then President, and other distinguished men, changed their course. He could point to Senators here and there, who had then changed, as well as to prominent citizens throughout the country: whole legislative bodies changed. A gentleman who now held a high judicial station in Virginia, and who could not, consistently with his own views of the constitution, vote for the bank, was so convinced of its necessity, that, as he had recently admitted in a pamphlet, he went out of the House that he might not oppose it. He himself had changed, because the good of his country required that he should change his opinions; and, as he had said, the experience of the war had shown that the bank was indispensably necessary.

He felt regret that any disclosure which he had made of his own relations with the bank, should have given pain to the Senator from New York. In reference to his own affairs, the gentleman might make such disclosures as he thought proper, but probably any disclosures concerning the condition of some of his political friends at Albany, at this moment, would not be very pleasant. In reference to himself, it was well known to his friend from Mississippi and others, that, at a public tavern in Virginia, the President had made certain statements relative to his (Mr. C.'s) situation with the bank, which had been circulated through all the newspapers on that side, and which he had found it necessary to meet with a flat contradiction. The gentleman from New York would probably have been gratified, if he (Mr. C.) had not, in his place, contradicted these calumnies. As to the gentleman from New York, he had intended no personal allusions; and expressions had been imputed to him which he had never used. He had said that the country could not get along without a national bank, and so he said still. And no matter who made the disclaimer, and when and where it was made, it was also his opinion, that the question now was between a bank in Chestnut street or a bank in Wall street, an independent and efficient agent for the collection and disbursement of the revenue, or a political bank to subserve the views and purposes of aspirants after office.

Mr. WEBSTER said he felt that he and others had a right to complain of the manner in which the honorable member from New York (Mr. WRIGHT) had alluded to them. He has referred to us, (said Mr. WEBSTER,) as "those who have taken the side of the bank." Now, sir, I have not taken the side of the bank. I do not admit the question to be rightly stated, when it is represented as if, on one side of it, there was nothing but the interest of the bank. I am not the advocate of the bank, nor will I admit that the interest of the bank forms the great subject before us.

The gentleman disclaims all intention of any imputation, by the use of these words, and, therefore, I notice them only, to repeat again, that I protest against giving to this all-important subject the character of a mere controversy between the act of the Executive, on one hand, and the interest of the bank on the other. I pay no more regard to that interest, than to see that justice is done, and the faith of the Government fulfilled towards it. The great question respects the currency of the country, and the public distress, which the interference with the public revenue has produced—a question of vast moment and universal bearing. The alarming shock which has been given to the public prosperity, by the act of the Secretary, is the subject about which I concern myself, and some remedy for that enormous mischief is the object at which I aim.

Sir, the honorable member charged the bank, the other day, with unnecessary curtailment of its discounts; and his proof was, that, on the first day of December last, it had drawn in several millions, three or four perhaps, more than the amount of deposits which, at that time, had been withdrawn from its vaults. This argument of his, he thinks, has been either misrepresented, or not fairly answered. It is true, sir, that when the gentleman formerly urged this argument, I did not reply to it, because I thought he had said other things to which it was more necessary to reply. It did not then, and does not now, strike me that there is force in this argument. The bank was informed that the deposits would be removed on or after the first day of October. It was not told how suddenly or how gradually—it was only told they would be removed. The amount, at that time, was nine millions. Now, sir, was it not the plain duty of the bank to prepare itself at once to give up the whole? The whole was demandable, and the bank was informed the whole would be demanded. What could it do, but make itself ready to pay the whole? Nay, further, the gentleman well knows, that, besides the sums actually drawn out, drafts were made on the bank for large sums, payable at sight, and these drafts placed in the hands of State banks, to be presented whenever they chose. The bank, therefore, was most clearly compelled to prepare itself to answer, at once, all the demands which the Government had the power of making upon it. If it had not done this, it would have acted a most inconsiderate part.

One other consideration has escaped the notice of the honorable member from New York. The bank had a large amount of moneys in deposit, belonging to individuals. The very first effect of the pressure, caused by withdrawing the public deposits, was a very rapid reduction of the amount of these private deposits, because, when money begins to grow scarce, the first to be used is that which lies on deposit, to the credit of individuals, in the bank. This sudden reduction in the amount of private deposits, being so much subtracted from the means of the bank, was another cause which obliged the bank to restrain its discounts.

I pass, Mr. President, to the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BROWN.] He accuses the bank of having broken up the internal exchanges of the country. The bank has ceased, in a great measure, to purchase domestic bills. This is the charge. It is true, in point of fact; and was not this precisely what was to be expected! If the honorable member will recur to the Debates of 1832, he will find it stated, over and over again, that one effect of discontinuing, or refusing to re-charter the bank, would necessarily be, this very interruption in the course of the domestic exchanges. The whole evil was then fairly and fully presented to the honorable gentleman. The removal of the deposits has now hastened that evil. It has driven the bank to the necessity of ceasing to buy bills, somewhat sooner than it must have been brought to the same point, by the approaching expiration of its charter. I had occasion, the other day, to remark, what I will now only repeat, that the ability of the bank to buy inland bills at a cheap rate, has depended, heretofore, essentially on its chartered privilege of possessing and transmitting the public revenue; and that the withdrawing of these deposits, as well as the approaching expiration of its charter, takes away this ability.

The honorable member denounces the directors for demanding greater premiums for drafts on distant places, than formerly, and greater than other banks. He has read a price current from Philadelphia, to prove that while the Girard Bank, one of the deposit banks, sells drafts for one half of one per cent., the Bank of the United States demands one and a half per cent.; that is, three times as much, for drafts on the same places. And the honorable member ascribes this to mere inordinate desire of great profit, on the part of the bank.

Sir, a little reflection will show the gentleman the error of all this. He must certainly see that no such thing as two prices, so widely different, can possibly exist, for the same thing, in the same place, at the same time. Who will buy of the United States Bank, if he can buy, on the other side of the street, at one-third the rate which that bank charges him? Supposing the prices demanded by the two banks to be as stated, it would either follow that the Bank of the United States could find no purchasers, or else that the Girard Bank, though it mentioned a nominal price, really had no exchange to sell. The latter is probably true, or nearly so. Having a portion of the revenues to transmit, the Girard Bank may doubtless be able to buy inland bills, to a limited extent. And as the experiment, as it is called, is now on trial, which is to determine whether these State banks can perform the public services heretofore rendered by the Bank of the United States, and perform them as cheaply as that bank did, it is probably true that, when it can draw at all, the Girard Bank draws at a low rate—at a rate as low, or nearly so, as that heretofore usual with the Bank of the United States. But its ability is limited. It cannot supply the whole demand. Purchasers, therefore, must go to the Bank of the United States, or other State banks; and the pressure of the times having made money scarce, and the Bank of the United States not being able to draw as usual, having lost the deposits, and now no longer having the transmission of the revenues, the rate of exchange has necessarily risen. And it will doubtless continue to rise. The deposit banks, as is already most manifest, cannot do the business of the internal exchanges, as the Bank of the United States has hitherto done it. To a certain limited extent—to the extent, that is to say, of their own means, aided by the public deposits, the deposit banks may be able to buy and sell domestic bills—and they may be willing to appear to do this business at the former rates; but it is already apparent, that for very obvious reasons, they cannot operate over the whole subject, so as to keep down all the exchanges. Now this is precisely what the Bank of the United States could do—and did do—and is precisely what the Government has deprived it of the power of doing any longer.

The gentleman from North Carolina again asserts that the Bank of the United States has endeavored to break down the State banks. What is his proof? On what facts does he rely for this assertion? The State banks themselves do not think so. They do not see the Executive destroying a monster, whose power and whose existence is dangerous to them. No such thing. On the contrary, they see it prostrating an institution friendly, both in its nature and its conduct, to them. Do they not petition for its re-charter? Do they not supplicate Congress to restore the public moneys to their former and their proper place in its vaults? Is it not notorious that, with the exception of those banks which have been made deposit banks, the general and prevailing desire of well-conducted State institutions is, that the deposits should be restored, and the Bank of the United States continued?

Allow me, now, sir, to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER,] and I will not longer detain the Senate.

The gentleman insists that this question is made a political question. Sir, let us understand one another. If he means to say that these petitioners desire the President and Congress to adopt some public political measure to relieve the country, he is certainly right. In this sense, the question is a political question. An evil has occurred in our political system demanding remedy, and the remedy, like the evil, must be political. But, if the gentleman means that all these memorials and petitions, all this excitement in Congress and out of it, and all these cries of distress, have in view, wholly or mainly, a change of men, he is greatly and dangerously mistaken. He will so find, I think, and that shortly. Sir, the people demand relief. They demand it of those who are competent to give it. They ask it of the Executive and of Congress. They will be as thankful to receive it through the instrumentality of the gentleman himself, or those who act with him, as from any other hand. Let those who have the power, reinstate the people in that prosperity which they enjoyed six months ago; let them restore confidence, let them revive business, let them relieve distress, and they will quiet the country, and receive the grateful thanks of millions.

The gentleman, sir, considers me as having admitted that the bank possesses the power to relieve the country, and that it would relieve it, if it were promised that its charter should be continued, and the deposits returned. Not so, sir; not at all so. What I said was, that a restoration of the deposits, and a continuance of its charter, even for a short time, would give the bank this power. Without these, or at least one of them, it has not the power. The power is to be derived from something which must be first done by Congress. Deprived of the deposits, an object of attack and denunciation by the Executive Government, exposed at so many points, and actually assaulted at some of them, with an existing debt so large, and so soon to be collected, and so near to the end of its existence, I do not see, clearly, that the bank can relieve the country by a new extent of discounts. If it can, as I have already often said, I trust it will; but that it can do it with safety, is a proposition not plain to my understanding; and if the directors say they cannot do it, I shall believe them sincere, and I believe them to be the proper judges also. They have every just motive, certainly, to go to the very utmost extent of the ability of the bank to mitigate the sufferings of the community—and to that extent, I most ardently wish they may proceed. Let them do their utmost, and show that they do their utmost, and the country will not be deceived, notwithstanding all the efforts which may be made to mislead or prejudice the minds of the people.

Mr. FORSYTH was desirous, he said, that there should be no mistake as to what he intended to state. When he adverted to the political aspect of the question, he meant that aspect which looked to a change in the public councils. He did not think that the gentlemen who now took the opposite side of the question had any particular party purpose to answer by bringing any particular individual into power. The President had taken a stand on this question, and had acted with that firmness for which he had been distinguished, and with reference to the principles on which his friends had sustained him. The party who had supported him for the last four or five years, wished that the principles which had governed his action might also govern the conduct of his successor. Gentlemen on the other side wished that this political action should be changed. How could that be effected, but by changing the individuals in the Executive government? This was his view of the position of gentlemen, and he wished it to be distinctly understood. He knew that in the United States there were many persons who were anxiously desirous to sustain the present Executive, and who deeply regretted the existence of the present agitation, because it threw them into a position which they did not desire to occupy. But they who were disposed to go against the Executive, were willing to make use of this occasion to accomplish their views. They therefore took their stand by the bank. He did not mean to say that any gentleman here intended to be the instrument of the bank, but the bank had made them its instruments. By its influence the President had been assailed for his course; and the bank was to be the lever by which his opponents were to be lifted into power. Now, it was the sober conviction of his own mind, that a bank might be so constituted, as, under proper restrictions, to be a useful institution to the country. Gentlemen on the other side said that they would be glad if he and his friends would take the lead in submitting a plan. He presumed that by the phrase "his friends," was meant the administration. In that view, it was beyond his power to comply with the request. He had no power in the Senate—he had none with the Executive. Here, he was in a minority, and was voted down on all occasions; the gentlemen knew by whom. And his voice only reached the Executive from this floor; and it was the only place from which the voice of any Senator ought to reach the Executive.

A word to the gentleman from Kentucky. That gentleman, seeing that a bank was necessary, seemed to have in his imagination's eye a bank in Wall street. As far as his (Mr. F.'s) preference went, he would prefer the bank in Chestnut street to a bank in Wall street—and, if it should ever be required in that sense, his vote should be given to retain the bank where Congress had placed it. But he believed that the gentleman from Kentucky must be mistaken on this point, and there was no change of that kind contemplated. If the two Houses chose to re-charter the United States Bank, let it be done. The aspect of affairs called for action. It was the uncertainty in which the country was placed which had produced all the existing evil. What would be the course of the bank when this uncertainty was removed? It must then proceed in the fulfilment of its duties. Should it be re-chartered, public confidence would be restored, and things would return into their accustomed channel. If not, it was not probable, the inducement to the contrary being removed, that the bank would hesitate to relieve the public distress. All inducement to the bank to press upon the country would be done away. Congress, therefore, were called on, not for discussion, but for decision.

If it be the opinion of Congress that the Executive has unconstitutionally exercised authority, let it be so recorded, that the constitution may be vindicated, and the policy of the Executive may be changed. It was decision, not discussion, which was required. Gentlemen had said that power was always adverse to discussion. What was now under discussion? Merely a question as to the propriety of printing a petition, and because he had deprecated a discussion of two days on this question, gentlemen had charged him, almost to upbraiding, with desiring to shut out the light. The gentleman from Kentucky had his resolutions before the Senate; there was something there for discussion to lay hold of—something there to decide. But what was the aspect of things this morning when he entered the Senate? There were three separate questions pending, and as many gentlemen were entitled to the floor, all on subjects which were based on the deposits. Was there any sufficient reason to upbraid him for complaining of a discussion upon every incidental question? He had no objection to discussion, but he wished that, instead of talking on every petition which was presented, the Senate would speak, and let its voice be heard on the principal question; and, when the Senate and the House should have spoken, the bank would be relieved from its uncertainty. A remark had been made on his use of the word "miserable," in reference to the petitions which had been presented. He did not characterize all the petitions as "miserable;" but he cared not on what side they were obtained, they were miserable petitions, got up by miserable means and for miserable objects, which were originated in pot-houses. And was not that the case with many of the petitions? People met together in a tavern, and got up a call for a meeting, at which the President was denounced as a tyrant, and charged with trampling down the laws, and violating the constitution. Such petitions were miserable petitions, and such was the character they should always receive from him.

Mr. F. concluded with a few remarks on the name of Taney, which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. PRESTON said the whole character of the discussion was anomalous, not only that general character of it of which the gentleman from Georgia had spoken, but it was strange and novel in all its minutest traits. It presented a strange state of things. The gentleman from Georgia (said Mr. P.) demands that the discussion be closed. Heretofore, we have found gentlemen who believe themselves in a minority, eager to protract discussion; anxious for an opportunity of effecting conversions; or disposed to postpone the closing scene of a vote against them. And more especially, in the ordinary course of things, would such motives prevail, when that minority included such men as the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. This effort to shut out discussion (said Mr. P.) is very extraordinary. Is it that gentlemen see rising all around them a state of things that will speak to us in a language more commanding, and more terrible, than any which can be used here. The urgency of gentlemen to take the vote is in proportion to the number of petitions that crowd into the Senate, and load the desk of its presiding officer. There are indications in every direction that may well make gentlemen anxious to close this discussion. Every wind, from every quarter, brings to us cries of distress and indignation. The voice from the seacoast is re-echoed from the distant mountains of North Carolina, and, from day to day, is louder and deeper upon our ears.

Gentlemen deprecate the agitation which is likely to arise from a practical discussion. The physical condition and the moral character of the people of this country, render impossible that species of agitation which results from heated and stormy passions. It is desirable to know how the late conduct of the Executive affects the public interests—to hear from the people themselves, whether they are prosperous, as some gentlemen declare, or laboring under intolerable pressure, as others assert. The practical operation of the measures under discussion, can be truly ascertained only from those on whom they operate.

Mr. P. said, that when he reflected on the quarter from which the paper that provokes this discussion came, he could not regard it as a "miserable petition," as a production of "pot-house politicians." When the citizens of that remote and quiet region come together from their distant habitations, to join in the expression of their opinions on public measures, their proceedings cannot be characterized as "miserable petitions." That is not the region of "pot-houses." From the dense crowds of your populous cities you may have the "miserable petitions" of "pot-house politicians." But when we hear even a still small voice from those high places, it is not to be disregarded.

There is, too, a peculiar reason why the people of that part of North Carolina should feel somewhat more keenly, and, perhaps, think more accurately, on subjects connected with the money market, than other inhabitants of the interior. They are in the midst of the gold region, and deal more largely with exchanges and remittances than mere agriculturists.

But, (said Mr. P.,) gentlemen say that the South feels no pressure; and would seem to infer that, therefore, the South has no right to be heard upon this matter. When has it been heard of, that a crush of the trade or circulation of the commercial cities did not ultimately pervade, with its disastrous influences, every portion of the country! The South and the interior may not, at this moment, participate in the calamities of the great towns, but their distress is contagious, and is extending itself towards us. The premonitory symptoms are already seen in the South. The present rate of exchange is more than a cent a pound off the price of cotton. The storm has burst upon the seacoast, and is rolling on to the South and West. It becomes us to prepare for it in time, and arrest its progress if we can.

But, suppose the South is neither suffering nor likely to suffer: how, then, are we to regard this southern memorial, which is the immediate subject before us? Here are men—by their admission, exempt from all pressure—not goaded by a sense of personal suffering—Jackson men—men from the midst of the mountains—men who have no motive but to assert the truth, and no interest but to vindicate the laws—these men are calling for a restoration of the deposits. Their call, in this view of the matter, is entitled to great weight.

Mr. P. said that his principal object in rising was to vindicate his position, and that of those who are with him, on the question of the deposits, from the assertion that it rests upon the bank. Gentlemen insist that we are bank men. We, sir, (said Mr. P.,) are neither bank men nor President men. We are not bound to any man or any corporation, but stand upon the laws and the constitution, ready to resent and resist all attacks upon them, come from whatever quarter they may. The question, sir, is not bank or no bank; that may come up hereafter. But the question is, whether we shall permit the constitution to be violated, charters to be invaded, and laws to be set at naught. Mr. P. said, he would not take the position which gentlemen were endeavoring to assign him, of advocating the recharter of the bank, in advocating the restoration of the deposits. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Forsyth] is in favor of rechartering the bank, and against the restoration of the deposits; so is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Wilkins.] How, then, can the gentlemen assert that the questions are identical with us, although distinct with them. There is a strange confusion of ideas on this subject. Gentlemen find it difficult to understand that we can resist the aggressions of lawless power, without being identified with their victim. Suppose the bank to be that horrid monster which it is represented to be—that it has been guilty of violating its charter—of interfering with elections—of corrupting the press—of debauching the morals of the people—if it be guilty of all this—let it be arraigned—tried—convicted—and executed according to law.

The law has provided for the case. But will not gentlemen see the difference between an execution and a murder? If a man be in prison for a crime, though there be no doubt of his guilt, he who stabs him, untried and uncondemned, is an assassin. Can he defend himself in a court of justice, or at the bar of public opinion, by saying that the victim was a wretch, and deserved death? Will he be held guiltless who anticipates the doom of the law, who arrogates to himself the rights of the judge, and who, under the instigation of his own passions, (in the language of the President,) "drives the knife to the hilt" into the heart of his victim.

It is said that we are bank men. It is useless to pretend to be ignorant of what every body knows, that there is a contest going on, involving the strongest personal passions, and many of the by-standers have taken sides. In the heat of the conflict, a partisan may naturally suppose that a foul blow ward off indicates a partisan of the party defended. Sir, said Mr. P., I should deeply deplore that the Senate should permit itself to become a party in such a contest. If the chief Executive, urged by unbridled passions, should descend from the proud elevation on which his country has placed him, to play the gladiator in the dust of the arena, I (said Mr. P.) will not be present at the exhibition. I would turn away my head from such a spectacle; I would not feel myself called upon to be a partisan in the contest—to hurrah either for the Emperor or his antagonist. But this (said Mr. P.) he would feel to be his duty: if the President, in the reckless precipitancy of his descent to the conflict, should trample upon the laws and the constitution which fence in his high station, I would endeavor to repair the damage he has done in his haste.

In the year 1836, said Mr. P., the bank was to expire by the limitation of its charter. It was in that year to die a natural death. Since the veto of the President, the public mind, at all events in the South, contemplated that event as inevitable, and acquiesced in it, not without some anxiety to be sure, as to the consequences which might result from it—but still, with a strong hope that as it gradually wound up its business, its place would be gradually and safely occupied by other agents, either existing and expanding with the occasion for wider action, or devised by the deliberate wisdom of Congress. And thus it was supposed that its various functions, whether as the fiscal agent of the Government, as the regulator of domestic exchanges, or as the general controller of the circulating medium, would be distributed and arranged so as to produce no general shock.

More than four years yet remained for the completion of this dangerous and delicate process—and all the wisdom of the country was attentively regarding its successive stages. But how is it now? The Executive, impatient of delay, and scorning the counsel of Congress, confident in his own unassisted wisdom, rushes upon his experiment—and the country is filled with disasters and dismay. He seizes the reins from the hands to which the constitution has confided them, and dashes through the whole circle of the moneyed system, scattering terror and destruction. Overwhelmed and confounded by this sudden and violent proceeding, the whole commercial interest of the country is exclaiming, What is to be done? Mr. P. said he called upon gentlemen to answer the question, What is to be done? Do we not see that many eyes are already turned towards the bank as the only means of safety—that there is a growing belief that safety can be found alone under the protection of the Bank of the United States? The President, and those who sustain him, have done more towards effecting the recharter of that bank, than all the arguments ever delivered in Congress. They are creating an inevitable necessity for it. In the derangement of the circulating medium—in the breaking up of the public credit—in the destruction of property—in the confusion of exchanges—in the general anarchy of all the moneyed concerns of the country—reasons and motives are found for the re-establishment of the bank. Let gentlemen reflect well whether they are not the real bank men, and not men who seek the restoration of order. What produced the charter of 1816? What drove the staunch republicans of that day—Madison, Crawford, Clay—from their rooted hostility to the bank? The utter confusion of the finances and the currency—the overwhelming necessity of affording relief to the community, of giving security and permanency to its vast interests, and of giving consistency to the Government fiat. In what do the circumstances in which the President has placed us differ from those of that day? Those who create the necessity for a bank are bank men, and not those whom they may drive to acquiesce in it. But the present period is even more fraught with danger than 1816. The circumstances of the times produced that state of things, but the act of the Executive has produced this. And it adds to our calamities that they spring from usurpation. Every body looks to the Executive for redress, as if to his hands alone was confided the safety of the country. Deputation after deputation from the Eastern cities have passed by the Capitol to lay their “miserable petitions” at the foot of the throne, supplicating Executive mercy. Congress is superseded. The currency, the trade, the property, the money of the country, are in the hands of the President.

Mr. P. said, it is admitted, on all sides, that the Executive has instituted a plan of banking, intended to take the place of the bank established by Congress, which, with some confidence in Executive wisdom, we are assured will “supply a currency equal to, if not better, than that supplied by the bank.” Will gentlemen put the question to the Nation, whether it will have a bank from Congress, responsible to its charter, or a bank from the Executive, responsible to the President? Is he less a bank man who takes a bank made for him by the President, than he who desires to have some agency in making it for himself? But who supposes that the Executive scheme will succeed? It will not succeed—it has failed already. God forbid that it should succeed—that we should be bound by his success, to acquiesce in his assumption of unauthorized power.

But if the plan fails, what then? The President has declared “My experiment shall be made.” His experiment! an experiment of the Executive branch of the Government, upon all the great interests of society—an experiment upon the trade, the agriculture, the money of the country—an experiment upon the Treasury! Is this constitutional republic but a great laboratory for political alchemists to make experiments in, and, when one has failed, to go on and try another? The financial system of this country is not a matter to be experimented upon. It requires the profoundest deliberation of all the departments of the Government, that when a plan is adopted, it may have whatever human foresight can give it of perfection, and such a degree of permanence, that the great interests of society may repose upon it with some degree of confidence.

Mr. P. said, that it was but fair, in parliamentary discussion, to permit gentlemen to assume their own ground to stand upon, and not to insist upon their taking a position which they reject. It is more easy than fair to impugn motives, but it is still easier to retort such an attack. If gentlemen are disposed to drive us upon what they consider an odious connexion with the bank, do they not perceive that, by the same mode of warfare, we might drive them back upon Executive influence? Mr. P. said he was but illustrating the unfairness of pushing gentlemen from their selected ground. But when we, who disavow the connexion, are called bank men, it is obvious we might designate our opponents as President men, thorough-going-right-or-wrong men, sustaining the Executive at all hazards. Sir, said Mr. P., I make no such imputations. I meet gentlemen on the grounds they take, and combat, as well as I may, the reasons by which they defend themselves. I put myself on the law and the constitution. I have, for the present, nothing to do with the question of bank or no bank.

Mr. BROWN said, that, standing in the peculiar position he did, in relation to the question before the Senate—the memorial under consideration coming from his own State—he must beg the indulgence of the Senate, while he said a few words in reply to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PIERCE], who has just taken his seat. The gentleman had shown, if he did not intend to vote for a re-charter of the bank, that he, at least, could argue for it; for very much of the argument which he had offered to the Senate, in his opinion, went to prove the necessity of that measure. The honorable gentleman had spoken of the general indignation, which, he said, was rising up in the whole South, against what he had termed a violation of the law, and the chartered rights of the bank. Mr. B. said that this was not the first time that the whole South had been invoked: it had been called on a former occasion, but the whole South did not come.

Gentlemen might “call spirits from the vasty deep,” but would they come? The State of North Carolina had stood then, on what she believed constitutional ground; he believed she would again stand on proper constitutional ground, and resist the dangerous power of the bank. The honorable gentleman had strongly intimidated, that President-making was the object which the friends of the administration had in view, in relation to this question, while the party opposed, looked only to the support of the law and the constitution. Mr. B. expressed his admiration for such disinterested patriotism, and such an entire exemption from selfish or political motives on the other side. He would ask, was there any one so blind as not to perceive, if the deposits were restored to the Bank of the United States, that it would place it in such a position as would almost ensure its recharter? And, if rechartered, who could doubt, that it would bring in on its strong shoulders, the next incumbent of the Presidential chair?

Mr. B. concluded by expressing the belief that the voice of the western part of North Carolina would not be heard in the tones of disapprobation of the Executive, as had been predicted, but in that spirit of manly and elevated freedom which would rebuke the bank, for the siege which it had laid to the capital of this republic, and for the attempt which it was making to compel the Government to surrender to its demands.

Mr. WILKINS rose, not for the purpose of going into the discussion, or of replying to the references personal to himself, but merely to remind the Senate that he had been, for some days, entitled to the floor, to conclude the remarks he had commenced on the special order. Should the Senate adjourn over to-morrow, he gave notice that he should, on Monday, at one o'clock, call for the special order.

Mr. CLAY rose and said that he could not withhold his congratulations from the gentleman from Georgia on the success which had to-day attended his efforts to cut short the discussion, and, in order to give him another day to repeat the experiment, he would move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was changed to a motion that, when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday; which was agreed to.

Mr. FORSYTH then begged leave to say a single word in answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, as he found it would be unpleasant to himself to go away without uttering what was in his heart. He hoped that the gentleman from South Carolina had understood him on one question. He believed that the wisdom of the measure which had been adopted by the Executive in removing the deposits, would depend on whether the bank should be re-chartered or not. The people had sustained the Executive against the bank. He was against both the President and the bank. He wished for a bank, but not for the present bank. If the bank was to be re-chartered, the deposits would of course be restored, and things would go on as before. But, supposing that the bank should not be re-chartered, as he believed that it would not be, at least by the votes of the present Congress, for the next two years, what then would result? The experiment which gentlemen say is now so deadly in its operation, must then be made; and the only question was, whether it should be made now, or two years hence? He was not willing that it should be made either now, or in two years, but he should submit to the popular will.

Mr. PRESTON explained, that he entirely deprecated the experiment being made by the Executive authority alone.

Mr. FORSYTH resumed. It was perfectly immaterial by whom the experiment was made. The distress must come, let it be made when, and by whom, it might. The gentleman from South Carolina, entertaining the views he did, had a right to take that ground. But gentlemen who did not think that the President had violated the constitution, stood in a different position. He was glad to hear the gentleman from South Carolina express his willingness that the people should come to the Senate. In his speech on the deposits, that gentleman had asked, What right had the people to rebuke the Senate? And now, the gentleman was willing to be enlightened by the people. He (Mr. F.) had no objection to this.

During an experience of twenty years, he had never seen any votes changed by discussion. In private conversation, the opinions of gentlemen influenced each other. But, in discussions, gentlemen talked for the people, and not for each other.

If they enlarged the discussion, they postponed the relief which was required; and if the object of gentlemen was relief, they must decide. If it was the object to increase the public agitation, discuss, delay. As far as he was personally concerned, he was indifferent as to the course to be pursued. The voice from the mountains, of which they had heard so much would be responded to by another voice from the mountains, as the voice from the seaboard had already been answered by another voice from the seaboard. The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to have been mistaken in a fact, as to the committees having passed the doors of the Capitol to go to the Executive. They had sent their memorials here, and they were on our table. If the President had refused relief, let Congress act, and relieve the agony of the suffering patient. The President stood committed to the public on this question, which he had deliberately examined, and on which he had decided, that an experiment was to be made to effect a change of the system. Yet it was to him that these committees applied. What could they have expected, but an indignant reply, which they could use for the purpose of increasing the public agitation and distress. The only relief was to be had from Congress. If Congress were disposed to relieve, they must decide; if they were against relief, they would continue to discuss.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

PORTSMOUTH (N. H.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and distress prevailing in that section of the Union, which the memorialists attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying that they may be restored to that institution, or that Congress would make such other legislative provisions for the relief of the country, as its wisdom might devise. Mr. B. said, that, while up, it might be proper for him to observe, that the signers of this memorial were men of integrity, character, and respectability—merchants, ship-owners, and men of business, whose names carried as much weight as those of any body of men in the country.

He moved that the memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed, with names attached.

Mr. HILL said he had not had the privilege of a sight of the original memorial from Portsmouth; but a member of the House, who had a copy of it, had kindly shown that to him. Of two hundred and fifty petitioners, so far as can be ascertained by gentlemen personally acquainted, there is not a solitary friend of the administration upon it. In relation to this memorial, he would ask leave to read extracts from a letter he had recently received from that town:

"On Saturday I perceived, by a notice stuck up at the brick market, that the federalists of this town were about to memorialize Congress upon the subject of the public deposits. Although this invitation was given to all, without distinction of party, yet I feel persuaded that you will not find the name of a single friend of the administration. If they have told you that there is any unusual pressure in this town, it is not true. There is no man here that feels embarrassed for the want of money, save those who have unwarrantably extended their business upon a borrowed capital. Every thing here commands a high price. The agriculturists feel no pressure. They are reaping richly of the blessings of a wise and judicious administration, and of the bounties of a kind Providence. The merchants here might do the same, if it were not for the corrupt and corrupting, and shameful management of the banks. I say banks, because the most of the local banks in this town sympathize strongly in politics with Mr. Bidle's bank and its branches.

"I will venture to assert, and pledge my veracity upon the assertion, that the branch bank in this place has in her vaults at least fifty thousand dollars in specie, and at least thirty thousand dollars in local bills. If the fact be so, it would enable that bank alone to discount over a hundred thousand dollars. How much has been discounted at that bank I have not the means of knowing.

"This bank, also, refuses to send home the bills of the Commercial Bank, although the cashier has been repeatedly requested so to do, and receive the specie for them."

Mr. H. continued: Sir, the number of petitioners attached to the Portsmouth memorial, is less than one-half the number of votes that have sometimes been cast by the opposition party in that town. For some time past, it will be seen that the discount of the Portsmouth branch has averaged about $400,000. On the first of January it was $395,033—it was reduced in that month, when it was necessary to prepare for a petition, to $362,378—making a contraction of more than a thousand dollars in a day. The Portsmouth petitioners probably owe the Bank at least three-fourths of the whole debt. There are but few debts due out of that town; and of the bank's debtors the names of some of these few are on the petition. Sir, said Mr. H., very few persons at Portsmouth, or elsewhere in New Hampshire, would think of moving in favor of the bank, except those who act in this matter from party motives; for the bank has been a blighting curse to the men of business of that place. There are, sir, on this petition, several names of persons who failed in business four and five years ago, and whose names are on bad paper at the branch bank, five, ten, twenty, and up to sixty thousand dollars each. There are also other names on the paper of respectable gentlemen, men of reputed wealth, who are reported to have permanent accommodations at the bank, of from 5,000 to 20,000 dollars, which is employed in navigation or manufacturing establishments. The branch at Portsmouth, Mr. President, ever since 1826, has been managed for the purposes of political favoritism; since that time very few except political friends have had loans on personal security; and of the whole loss incurred, it is believed not a dollar has been lost directly by any defalcation of any friend of the administration. We have a right to presume, as well from the character of the petitioners and their small number, as from the efforts that the friends of the bank have there made, that less than one-fourth of the people of Portsmouth is in favor of the bank. Independent of political bias, which a few men entertain, the friendship to the bank is forced from the fears of those who are dependent on it. These men are generally traders, whose capital is or has been furnished by the bank. There is on the petition scarcely the name of a mechanic or artisan, who labors with his own hands. The workmen, mechanics, and mariners, and farmers of that town, are made of too stern stuff to be compelled to petition for an object like this; and the party favored by the bank has too often been defeated in its attempts to coerce those resolute, high-minded men, at this time to embark on such an undertaking. These men have long followed in the train with such men as Langdon, and Manning, and Hall, and Gardner; and it is too late in the day for the Havens, and the Ladds, and the Pierces, to lead them up to any encounter against popular rights. The public voice in the State of New Hampshire, sustains the President's opposition to the rechartering of the bank by nearly three to one. No meetings in that State have been called to express opinions on this subject; but the friends of the State and national administrations have recently had meetings in nearly every town, to elect delegates for their council and senatorial district conventions for the present year. No organized opposition has yet appeared to the prevailing party, nor is there a probability that there will be any opposition. Yet never have the primary meetings been as full or the conventions been so generally attended. More than two hundred of the two hundred and thirty-eight towns, in each convention, have been represented. The delegates, in some instances, travelled a distance of seventy miles to attend them. And it is the interesting position of the country, in relation to the Bank of the United States, that thus called out these full conventions. Without any previous concert the five council district conventions, and eleven of the twelve senatorial conventions, have passed strong resolutions against re-chartering the bank, and entirely approving the removal of the deposits. The conventions have not sent their resolutions here, but they have published them to the world. At least three to one of the people of New Hampshire are opposed to this bank; and was it not that the question is identified with the two parties—the old federal and democratic parties—there would be none but the debtors and immediate dependants on the bank favorable to a renewal of its charter. The retaining the bills of the Commercial Bank, which is the deposit bank, by the branch at Portsmouth, is proof conclusive of the predetermined hostility of the branch bank to the State banks that will not obey its commands. The manner of redeeming the notes of the interior banks in New England has become a system, bringing all to a par value. Boston being the emporium to which all these notes flow, soon after they are issued, each bank has its specie fund at Boston to redeem them. If a bank should stop payment, the fact would be known at Boston before it was known at its own place of location. The funds are in Boston for the redemption of the bills. The Commercial Bank of Portsmouth keeps its funds there. The branch at Portsmouth, instead of either sending the notes of the Commercial to the counter of that bank, at its own door, or sending them to Boston for redemption, chooses to hold on to them. Why? Because the managers of that bank know, that by so doing they can pounce upon the Commercial Bank, either at one place or the other, and thus compel the bank to provide a specie fund at both places at the same time, for this single amount of money. In 1832, I was surprised to find petitions coming in here from the banks in New Hampshire, favorable to renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States. Those banks generally had had very little to do with the United States Bank; they never had been in a prison to ask favors from it, or to be much affected in business by it. The banks in New Hampshire are generally in the hands of our political opponents. After my return home, I was made acquainted with the process of procuring these petitions. The bank attorney at the head of the branch at Portsmouth, was the agent to write to some political friend connected with each bank, urging that petitions might be forwarded. In some instances the directors of these banks having before their eyes the declaration of Mr. Biddle in 1830, that it was in the power of his bank, at almost any time, to annihilate the State banks, obeyed the command. In other cases, after a warm controversy, a majority of the directors voted the proposition down. And in some few cases, no attention was paid to the call. I have information from various parts of New England, that calls from the South have been there made to get up agitation meetings on the subject of the deposits. But little impression as yet has been made out of the commercial towns; for there is an innate hostility to the United States Bank and its management throughout the whole interior of New England. The Massachusetts legislature, opposed as it is to Gen. Jackson and the administration, has disobeyed the instructions which have been sent to Boston, and manifested the wise determination of not molesting the deposit banks in that State in the exercise of their rights. The effort on the State of New Hampshire, thus far, has resulted in obtaining in a single town about one-half of the party in opposition to the administration to put their names to a somewhat equivocal request that the deposits may be restored.

Mr. BELL observed, that it would be inexcusable in him to rise for the single purpose of replying to the remarks that had just been made. Had they come from any other quarter, he should have been surprised to hear the subject of the politics and elections in New Hampshire adverted to on that floor, and he thought the time of the Senate would be badly employed in listening to any reply he could make, even if he thought proper to make one. It was, however, necessary for him to reply to the observation made with regard to the characters of the memorialists, and he should take the present opportunity of doing so in but a very few words. He well knew most of the signers of the memorial, and there were gentlemen on this floor equally well acquainted with them, and he could safely aver, that in character, intelligence, and respectability, they were equal to any in the country;—they were the principal merchants, ship owners, and men of business of their place of residence. In the memorial were to be found the names of the presidents, cashiers, and directors of all the banks of Portsmouth, exclusive of those of the branch of the United States, and the deposit banks. It was true that the signers of the memorial were not very numerous; but it was also true that it was not the business of those who obtained the signatures, to get the names of men who could have no weight here. They did not go to pot-houses to get signatures, but went to men of business, of intelligence, and respectability. In relation to the bad treatment of individuals by the bank in Portsmouth, which had been referred to by his colleague, he, for his part, had never heard of it otherwise than in some letters published which never gained credence. Living in the immediate neighborhood, he knew that the opinion was that the conduct of the bank in question had been perfectly correct, and that its business had been conducted with great propriety and regularity.

The motion of reference was then agreed to.

PROVIDENCE (R. I.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. KNIGHT rose and presented a memorial from the town of Providence, and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

Mr. President: I have received a memorial of a number of citizens of the town of Providence and its vicinity, which I now present to the Senate. In doing this, it may not be improper to state, that it contains upwards of 1,000 signatures of the active business men of that community, of farmers, merchants, mechanics, manufacturers, and others. The memorialists state, that they have, within a few months, passed from comfort and security to a state of general distress. They now present their grievances to Congress, and point the way to their relief. In this they know not party—they are not actuated by party motives—they are composed of all parties that have divided our common country. Among them I see some of the able friends of the present Chief Magistrate—those who ask not for office, nor seek its honors or emoluments—who would not have united in this memorial, did they not know and feel the distress of their fellow-citizens. I see, also, among the most distinguished of our fellow-citizens, presidents and directors of State banks, who are fully acquainted with cause and effect, in regard to the money concerns of the country. They know the withdrawal of the deposits from the United States Bank has, in a great measure, been the cause of withdrawal of individual deposits from State banks, and crippled their discounts, without a corresponding increase of discounts by the deposit banks. The memorialists also state that a renewal of confidence between the administration and the Bank of the United States, will inspire confidence in the community, and greatly facilitate the removal of the present distresses of the country. Sir, I have said that these memorialists were of all classes of working business men, but there is one class of the community who have not joined in this memorial—the office-holders and those who share the spoils—they feel no burdens on them, and do not ask for relief.

morial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBBINS said he would take this occasion to pray the Senate to consider, for a moment, what the consequences must be, if the present state of things, now spread and spreading over the country, is to be continued. I do not speak, said Mr. R., in reference to private distress and individual ruin, prevailing and threatening to prevail to an extent beyond any example in the history of our country; and produced, too, not by the accidents of fortune, or the perils of business, or the miscalculations of folly or imprudence; but by the gratuitous and unnecessary act of their own Executive Government; for it seems that private distress and individual ruin, however extensive, are not to be regarded by that Government; but I speak in reference to the consequences of this state of things to the country itself. I hope we are not to be told that the well-being of the country is not to be regarded by that Government, whatever indifference may be manifested by it to that of individuals. We see, said Mr. R., at this moment, the whole business of the country paralyzed in all its branches, and all enterprise suspended. It is enterprise that has made, and is to make, your country prosperous, and your treasury rich; it has its rise in the facility with which exchanges are to be effected; this again has its rise in that system of credit which subsists, and can only subsist, by the confidence of the capital of the country in that system. Now that confidence is gone; it is gone by the act of the Executive. By one blow, the well-contrived but delicate structure of the national prosperity has been demolished, and now lies in ruins. I ask, what must be the consequences of this paralysis, of this suspension of enterprise, upon all the great resources of the country? Upon her foreign commerce; upon her inland trade; upon her internal improvements in the several States; upon the home market; upon her products, depending upon that market for their value; upon her land, depending for its value on the value of these products? True, we must wait the instructions of experience, to enable us to measure with accuracy the extent of those consequences, to the prejudice of those resources. We already, however, know enough to know that the effect must be disastrous to an incalculable extent. We have information, and from authentic sources, that, at the great importing cities of New York and Philadelphia, the orders for importations have been countermanded to a very great extent; that the merchants of Great Britain, of France, and the rest of Europe, who have been in the habit of making shipments to this country, for a market, have been advised by their correspondents here, not to make them; and that, if made, the consignment must be declined. There must, then, be a great falling off in the amount of our importations; there will be, by the most moderate computation, a falling off of one half; of course, there must be a corresponding falling off in the revenues from importations. If any have indulged fears of a too redundant treasury, they may now dismiss them as idle fears. If any should now indulge fears of a deficient treasury, and so deficient as to require a supply from loans, or direct taxation, I for one am not prepared to pronounce such fears to be idle. So much as to our foreign commerce. As to our inland trade, the effect must be still more disastrous. We all know that our manufactures are the foster-mother of that trade; that all its channels are supplied and filled up either directly or indirectly from that source; feeding and sustaining greater numbers of our population than any other resource, perhaps a greater number than all our other resources put together. It is the great aliment of the nation. Now, our manufacturers have been apprized by their established consignees, in all the great marts where sales are made for distribution, that they can no longer draw upon consignments in anticipation of the sales. This resource, now cut off, it is well known, is essential to the great body of our manufacturing establishments; without it they cannot get on as heretofore; all must reduce their business, many must suspend their business. Those establishments create an immense annual demand for Eastern lumber. It has become a fact of newspaper notoriety, that the usual orders for this lumber have been countermanded, if not entirely, to a very great extent. The memorial now presented, tells you that the numerous coasting vessels, heretofore employed in transporting the cotton of the South for the consumption of the North, are now out of employ. The cotton is not, and will not be ordered. The prospects of the inland trade appear to me so fearful, that I am unwilling to sketch the picture of the coming scene as my forebodings would oblige me to shade it. To those who have not taken the pains to go in advance of causes to their somewhat remote, but certain effects, and see in them the distresses of thousands and tens of thousands of our laboring population thrown out of employ, it might seem a mere fancy-piece, painted and exhibited for effect. But I am persuaded that no colors can do justice to the reality of the distress that is to come upon the country. Again: The works of internal improvement in the several States, for the greater part, are carried on with borrowed capital. When the capital of the country wants confidence, as it now does, it will make no advances. But if the capital was not a borrowed capital, who would invest his own in works which, if the present state of things is to continue, can afford no profit. These works, therefore, must come to a dead pause; and, with them, not to go on, is to go back. This is bad enough; but a worse effect will be the abatement, perhaps the extinction, of the spirit of that noble and daring and enlightened enterprise, to which the country owes the undertaking of these gigantic improvements, and which is necessary to carry them through to their completion. The stock value of these improvements always graduates itself according to the scale of the public prosperity, of which they are a powerful cause when in co-operation with other causes, but without that co-operation they are powerless as a cause of that prosperity, and valueless as stock. These improvements swell the tide of the public prosperity, but other causes must produce the tide. All those other causes are now annihilated by the present state of things. Again: As to the home market, there I apprehend the present state of things will be most to be deprecated: for there, I think, its disastrous effect will be most extensive in its range, involving the value of all the real property of the country. Till the present state of things was originated, the demand and the supply had been so balanced in the home market, that all the parties equally profited and prospered by it—the producer and the consumer, the buyer and the seller. This was the happy result of that complex system which the business and the credit of the country had assumed. And though the amount of the products rapidly augmented from year to year, the demand in its growth kept pace with the growth of the supply, holding forth the most cheering prospect of continuing and increasing prosperity. Now that balance has been destroyed, and is to remain destroyed while the present state of things remains. That demand is to be reduced to one-half, probably to less than one-half of what it has been. We know that a small excess of supply beyond the demand produces a great depression of price: what will it then be when the supply shall exceed more than twofold the demand? Every product of your land will be a drug in your market; and what will be the value of your land when its product is a drug? I venture to say, that the tax which the real property of the country will pay to the present state of things, if continued, will exceed in amount the whole civil list of the United States, and of every State in the Union, put together, and that the event will prove it.

I have now adverted (said Mr. R.) to all the great and leading resources of the country, and have endeavored to show how the present state of things, if continued, would affect them and each of them. I am persuaded that the injury to which they are exposed has not been overstated. How calamitous, then! A foreign war would be far less calamitous to the country. Our last war with Great Britain cost us something over one hundred millions of dollars, and it lasted for three years. If the present state of things is to be continued for two years, (and we are told that the Executive is determined on the experiment, at least for that length of time,) the experiment will cost the country more than two hundred millions of dollars. I am aware that gentlemen flatter themselves that the present state of things, if left to itself, will find a remedy for itself, and that it will cure its own evils. But how is this possible? Look at what has been the means of our prosperity, and then look at what is to be a substitute for those means, and say if it be possible? What were those means? We had a national currency, really national—a currency that was gold and silver, or its equivalent, all over this country; still better, a currency that was gold and silver on the Exchange in London, in Paris, and all over Europe; a currency that was gold and silver in Calcutta, and all over India; a currency that was gold and silver in Canton, and all over China; a currency that was gold and silver with all the commercial world. And this confidence in this currency was warranted and merited, by the solidity of its foundation and the prudence of its management. This currency was the chain, the golden chain, that bound indissolubly together all the parts of that system which produced the national prosperity, the facility of exchanges, the system of credit, and the confidence of the capital of the country in that system. Now what is proposed as a substitute for the means to the same end? It is admitted that a national currency is indispensable; and a currency that will command the confidence of the capital of the country. What is proposed as such a currency? Why, the local paper of local banks. The project is perfectly preposterous. It is an impossibility in the nature of things to make local paper a national currency. Local paper is a local currency, and it can be nothing more. It is a currency within the limited circle of which the local bank is the centre; but beyond that circle it is a mere commodity of merchandise, and must be so, and can be nothing else. Talk of making local paper a national currency—you might as well make the rags of which the paper is made a national currency. You admit, then, that a national currency is indispensable, and such a one as will command the confidence of the capital of the country. It is evident that local paper cannot be such a currency; and you propose no other. The conclusion, then, is inevitable, that you leave the present state of things without a remedy, or the possibility of a remedy, by its own operation. I am aware also that some gentlemen hold that the removal of the deposits could not have produced the present state of things, and that it must have been produced by other causes, or some other cause. What other cause? If we ask, they reply, by the United States Bank calling in nine millions of its loans. How is it possible this operation could have produced this state of things? By-the-by, they have called in no more than they have paid out, or are liable to pay out at any moment, and that moment uncertain. But suppose they had not paid, and were not to pay out a dollar, how is it possible that the abstraction of nine millions from the circulation of this great country could produce this state of things? Recollect that there are four hundred other banks in the country, all of whom have out loans; that there are a vast number of private bankers, all of whom have out loans; that there are thousands upon thousands of private money-lenders, all of whom have out loans; that England has a vast amount of capital in this country on loan; that all this goes to constitute the national circulation, and to swell its gross amount. Why, that nine millions, if abstracted from that total circulation, would not amount to one per cent. thereof. Can such an abstraction have produced such a state of things! No, it is impossible. Shall I here be met with this question? If the taking by the United States Bank of nine millions from the amount of the national circulation could not be the cause of this state of things, how could the taking by the Executive of nine millions from that bank be the cause? I answer: It was not the effect of the removal of the deposits on the amount of the national circulation that was the cause, but its effect on the fears of the moneyed capital of the country. Moneyed capital is, in its nature, distrustful and cautious, and apprehensive, and easily alarmed. Always acting on its own strong instinct to self-preservation, it is always upon the look-out for its own safety. It never waits to be apprized of danger by the danger itself, but sees it afar off, and guards against it accordingly; it sees the coming storm in its precursor, the troubled sky; and it sees a troubled sky when others might not discern it. Here that capital saw a blow struck at a currency by which the whole paper credit of the country was sustained, or believed to be sustained; a blow evidently aimed at the destruction of that currency; and to be followed up, by blow after blow, till it was destroyed. That capital became thence alarmed, and, acting upon the impulse of its own nature, provided for its own safety. Hence the loss of its confidence; hence the suspension of business and enterprise; hence the present state of things. For which there is one remedy, and only one, namely, the restoration of that confidence, the loss of which has induced this state of things. This is only to be done by the same means by which that confidence was originally created. What those means were we all know, and they need not be again stated. There is no other alternative for us, but either to adopt those means, or to leave things to run on as they are, without remedy, and our country to suffer without redress.

The memorial was then referred.

PENSION FUNDS IN THE U. S. BANK.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom had been referred the message of the President of the United States of the 3d inst., in relation to the Pension Funds of the United States, and the Bank of the United States, made a report thereon; and moved that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY moved that 3,000 additional copies be printed; when

Mr. POINDEXTER said, he understood that a similar report had been made in the House of Representatives; and that that body had ordered the printing of 6,000 additional copies of their report.

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that this was like voting in the dark. The Senate had not heard the report read, and therefore could not judge of the propriety of printing it. He moved to lay the motion on the table.

On taking the question, the motion of Mr. FORSYTH was lost, without a division.

Mr. FORSYTH then observed, that if the gentleman wished to print so large a number of copies of the report, without knowing what it was, they could do so, and take the responsibility.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, saw no reason for persisting in the determination to take the question on the printing of the report, especially, as there seemed some opposition to the printing of the additional number. He was desirous of giving the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] an opportunity of going on with his speech, which, in consequence of the kindness and courtesy of that gentleman, had been so long delayed. In order that the Senator from Pennsylvania might continue his speech on the special order, he renewed the motion to lay the motion for printing an additional number of copies of the report on the table.

Mr. CLAY asked if the motion was in order.

Mr. KING explained that his motion referred only to the printing of the additional number of copies; and the CHAIR having decided this motion to be in order, the question was taken, and it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tyler, Waggaman, White, Wilkins, Wright.—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Knight, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster.—17.

The resolutions from a public meeting in North Carolina, and various other items of unfinished business, were then laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the removal of the deposits, and the resolutions offered by Mr. CLAY.

Mr. WILKINS then rose and resumed his remarks, which are given entire, as follows:

Mr. President: Upon taking up, and proceeding to the direct consideration of the second resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, it must not escape observation that that resolution, the report of the Committee on Finance just presented to us, as well as the memorial of the Bank of the United States, admit, that the removal of the public deposits had been made by the Secretary of the Treasury himself. They, also, not only acknowledge the general control of that Executive officer over those deposits, but that his authority, reaching beyond the right of merely suspending the operation of the 16th section of the charter, extends to the withdrawal of the money actually upon deposit in the bank. This second resolution, therefore, unlike the first, charges no assumption of unlawful power; but, as I have always said, tenders the true and legitimate question arising out of the 16th section, and the action of the Secretary upon it. It is, Was the act of the Treasury Department expedient—justified by the existing circumstances—by the emergency? Believing this to be the proper issue, I have all along been unwilling to embarrass, or obscure it; and hence, in an early day in this debate, I voted against the amendment offered by my honorable friend from Missouri.

This 16th section, which seems to have been received without concern, when introduced into the charter as an amendment, now awakens universal attention, and its true construction becomes, at this moment, an object of deep national and political attraction. I take up this section, and in my construction of it, I assume the three positions: 1st. That the power of the Secretary of the Treasury over the public deposits, is absolute and unqualified. 2d. That the manner in which he has executed this power, is unobjectionable: and 3d. That his reasons are satisfactory and sufficient.

Upon the first position: The 16th section, when closely examined, in connexion with the history and usage of the Treasury Department, will be found not to restrict, but to be an explicit confirmation of, the unqualified power which had, without interruption, uniformly been acknowledged and exercised by the head of that Department.

That section divides itself into two paragraphs—the first declaring that the deposits of the money of the United States shall be made in the Bank of the United States and its branches, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall "at any time otherwise order and direct." Thus distinctly declaring that, upon all occasions, the funds shall not only be placed in those depositories, but shall remain there at the will of the Secretary.

The second paragraph of the section goes no further than merely to impose upon him the duty of reporting his reasons to Congress for the order, let the occasion be what it might upon which the authority was exercised. This duty of reporting "his reasons" to the legislature, does not in any manner control the unqualified power granted by the first branch of the section; nor in the slightest degree diminish its force, or restrain it as to the occasion or "time" upon which it should be exercised. It simply says, in plain language, to the Secretary, "Exercise your undoubted control over the depositories as usual: but when you do act, all that we require of you is, to give your reasons to Congress, in order to enable that body to decide whether any legislation may be necessary upon the subject." The extent of the authority is distinctly defined and determined by the first branch of the section, independently without restriction, by the language that follows. The one gives the authority, and the other imposes an incidental duty.

It is difficult to ascertain how, and for what object, this section, now become, in its construction, so interesting to the nation, had crept into the charter of the bank. I have taken some pains to examine and trace its history, and I am yet left to conjecture as to its object, or the cause of its origin. There is no reason to believe that this amendment was ever intended to change the rule, or impair that salutary control over the public finances always vested in, and exercised by, their superintendent. It is conjectural, to be sure, but I think it not improbable, that it was a provision sought by the friends of the bank, who may have been more inclined to continue under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, than to be thrown into the hands of Congress, upon whom popular influence and a combination of the State banks might be brought to bear under particular circumstances to the prejudice of the institution. The provision is not to be found in the original draught by Mr. Secretary Dallas, nor in the original bill. Upon pursuing my inquiry, I find the amendment to be in the hand-writing of a gentleman then a Representative in the House from New Hampshire, and now a distinguished Senator upon this floor; it passed with a mass of other amendments; does not appear to have attracted any attention; produced no debate, but was adopted in a way plainly manifesting that it must have been well understood to produce no new rule nor change in the practice of the Treasury Department. The section may have been designed as a benefit to the bank, but it is obvious it was a contingent one, entirely depending on the mere volition of the Secretary.

Standing upon the argument that no diminution of authority, nor change in the usage of the Treasury Department, was intended by the introduction of this 16th section into the bank charter, it is material to go back and ascertain from our political history, the extent of that authority, and the precedents arising under the exercise of it. It will be found that every page of that history not only sustains the rights claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but distinctly marks out the two channels in which run the separate and well-defined duties of those two officers, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States. Commencing with the continental ordinance of 1776, the first on the subject of the establishment of a Treasury Department, and running through the many mutations in regard to the management of the finances, you will find that it has always been the indispensable policy of the country to put under the responsible head of the Treasury, an unqualified control and superintendence over the depositories. The only law which, in definite and precise words, speaks of the disposition and the place of deposit of the public money, besides this 16th section, is the ordinance of the 30th of July, 1779, wherein one duty imposed on the "Board of Treasury" was "to deposit in proper offices all moneys arising from loans, taxes, and lotteries;" and therein it was enjoined upon "the Treasurer to receive and keep" the moneys that might be so raised. Trace the subject from our earliest day down through the administration of the Department by Robert Morris, Alexander Hamilton, Albert Gallatin, William H. Crawford, and all others, and you discover nothing but an acknowledged and uninterrupted exercise of the authority upon the principles claimed by the present Secretary. Setting out in the pursuit of this subject from another point, and passing through another channel of inquiry, the bank charters, you will find that, until the hour this amendment was made, although these bank charters were always granted upon the belief of their necessity as fiscal agents in the management of the finances of the country, yet there is not a single legislative provision, nor a line introduced, impairing the unqualified control of the Secretary of the Treasury over the public depositories. All the bank bills, beginning in December, 1781, with that of the Bank of North America, are silent on the subject, because public policy and expediency forbid legislative interference with this necessary power of the Secretary. The proposition of Mr. Dallas, in 1814, went upon the same principle; and the bill of that year passed the two Houses of Congress without a word upon the subject. In the bill of the following session, this 16th section was introduced in the way I have mentioned, partaking something of the character of an interpolation, without producing any sensation, because, to my understanding, and apparently in the consideration of Congress, it left the subject where they found it.

What construction, sir, has been put upon this 16th section, and how has its power been exercised by the predecessors of Mr. Taney in office? There is distinct evidence every where scattered through our documents, that Mr. Crawford used the power, and frequently threatened to exert it to correct the abuses of the bank, and to promote the public interests and the commercial convenience. He did not confide the use of the power to his exertions to restore specie payments—nor to a resolution passed with a view to that object on the 30th of April, 1816—nor to the money on deposit in the State banks, when the Bank of the United States went into operation—but he asserted the authority frequently, subsequent to the adjustment of all disorders in the currency of the country, and always under the 16th section of this charter. The instance prior to that period, testified by his letter of the 3d July, 1817, valuable as a precedent upon many points of the present controversy, shows distinctly the views he entertained of the weight of the influence held over the bank by this power to remove the depositories, and that he would promptly use it to correct any contemplated mischief by the bank. Mr. Secretary Ingham gave the same construction to the power.

The Committee of Investigation in 1819 was composed of Messrs. Spencer, Lowndes, McLane, Tyler, and Burwell, and they all agree in saying—

"They have not recommended the adoption of any immediate measures to correct the many evils and mischiefs they have depicted, excepting that of the bill before mentioned, because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy"—and that "remedy," upon which the members of the committee united, was the application of the power to "remove the depositories."

In the history of the present bank, you will find that the advocates for striking out the provision to appoint five government directors, all depended, for control over the bank, in the power of the Government "to withhold the public depositories." The gentleman then representing the State of Delaware in the House of Representatives, opposed to the bill on the ground that it was to be a Government bank, declares in one of his speeches: "The Hercules is in the system—in the power that the Government proposes of continuing or withholding its depositories." And the late much lamented Mr. Lowndes, in March, 1819, remarks: "The charter had given to the Government powerful means for restraining the errors and controlling the conduct of the bank"—and one is, "the withholding the public depositories." The member of the Committee of Investigation in 1819 from Virginia, [Mr. Tyler,] speaks repeatedly of the control of the Secretary of the Treasury over the depositories; of his power to select a safe depository; and, in one instance, uses the phrase, "the Secretary of the Treasury would find a place of deposite."

And Mr. McDuffie, in his report of 13th April, 1830, says: "The Secretary of the Treasury, with the sanction of Congress, would have the power to prevent the bank from using its power unjustly and oppressively, and to punish any attempt on the part of the directors to bring the pecuniary influence of the institution to bear upon the politics of the country, by withdrawing the Government depositories from the offending branches. But its power would not be lightly exercised by the Treasury, as its exercise would necessarily be subject to be reviewed by Congress; it is in its nature a salutary corrective, creating no undue dependence on the part of the bank."

The very plain and distinct admission in this report, every position of which was sustained by the advocates of the bank, goes further than I contend for in one particular; for it not only admits the power in the Government to withdraw the depositories as a punishment for any attempt at "political influence" on the part of the bank, but admits that the power may be "lightly exercised by the Treasury." And Mr. Crawford, in his letter of July 31, 1820, says, that the duty of reporting to Congress was "to prevent the exercise of the power capriciously." Thus it is, that whilst every authority and precedent admit the unequalled extent of the power, these two authorities acknowledge that the same power may be used to check political interference—may be exercised "lightly," and even "capriciously!" But, at the same time, construing the second paragraph of the sixteenth section as I do, maintain that the "duty," distinct from the "power," which obliges the Secretary to report his reasons to Congress, will always restrain his discretion and render him cautious, for the sake of his own reputation, how he exercises the power. It is for Congress to review the proceeding of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bank itself has no right to complain. It is no infringement upon their charter. They took the depositories, knowing the contingency that they were held by an uncertain tenure—the will of a Secretary.

The argument advanced by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Sumner,] as applied to the present case, is fallacious. He maintains (what I do not pretend to deny) that you cannot make a bank for commercial purposes alone: it is only as a fiscal agent, and must continue as such to the end of its charter: remove its fiscal agency, and you do what Congress has not the power to do. I admit, that upon this "fiscal agency" in the charter, alone depends its constitutionality; but that agency still exists: it is not destroyed, nor the principle in any way affected, by the removal of the depositories. Their contingent liability to be removed, was spread upon the face of the charter: and the character of fiscal agent still continues, whether the Government may have more or less of its funds in the bank.

Sir, an honorable Senator from South Carolina opened the statute book, and making a particular reference to the charter, assumed the argument that the depositories formed a part of the charter—were one of the benefits conferred for which the bonus was given, and could not be removed without a violation of the contract. I readily admit that the depositories were one of the benefits conferred by the law upon the bank; but they were, as I have already maintained, a contingent benefit, of a very frail nature, relying entirely for their value upon the will of the head of the finances. I admit, too, sir, that the charter of the bank is a contract, not to be infringed upon without a violation of the pledged faith of the Government; but I deny that these depositories ever entered into the "consideration" of that contract or imposed any obligation on the part of the Government. There was an error in referring to the sections of the charter, when the fifteenth and sixteenth were quoted as connected and running into each other, and as containing the obligation and consideration between the Government and the bank. These are contained in the fourteenth and fifteenth sections. In the former the Government engage to take the notes of the bank "in all payments to the United States," and in the latter, (the fifteenth,) in consideration thereof, the bank agrees to transfer the public money wherever required. This is very briefly stating the substance of these two consecutive sections: but the next, (the sixteenth section,) is an insulated one, substantially declaring that the depositories shall be made in the Bank of the United States, subject to be removed whenever the Secretary may direct it. No consideration is given, nor could any be asked by the Government, because there was no mutuality—the depositories being altogether contingent—subject to the will of an officer entirely independent of the bank. Further, sir: the fourteenth section provides that the bills or notes shall be "receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress." Nothing short of a law of Congress can prevent the "bills or notes" of the bank from being taken in payment of the revenue to the Government. But this detached, unconnected sixteenth section, treating the public depositories as a less important matter, and as one not entering into the consideration of the contract, leaves the power and direction with the Secretary of the Treasury—left there, too, because Congress did not wish to change the practice of the Government, nor impair the accustomed control over the depositories. If the intention of Congress was otherwise, why were not the depositories and the bills and notes placed upon the same footing? If the one entered into the contract as well as the other, why was it not also enacted, that the depositories should remain with the bank, "unless otherwise directed by act of Congress!" Let me observe, too, in the conclusion of this part of my argument, that the Secretary was not even bound, in the first instance, to place the depositories in the bank. Mr. Crawford, upon the organization of the bank, in February, 1817, might have altogether refused to give them the possession of the public money, if he had believed it would be unsafe; or that, by withholding it, he could avert mischief, oppression, public inconvenience, or embarrassment. And I go further, and affirm that Congress, in the true spirit of our institutions, could not intend, and never did intend, to put the public purse, in any way, under the control of a bank, nor to enable any such institution, upon any occasion, to say, "We are to be consulted before the Government can make its own disposition of its own funds!"

These are my views of the extent of the power of the Treasury over the depositories; a power sustained by universal usage—by precedent—the opinions of our statesmen, and by the manifest construction of the law.

My next inquiry, sir, is, in what manner has that power been exercised upon the late occasion, by the Secretary of the Treasury? For the answer I might safely content myself with a reliance upon the fact, that he has walked in the footsteps of his predecessors, and pursued the precedent found in the practice of the Government.

Removal of the Deposites.

The first objection to the mode of transfer came from the honorable mover of the resolutions, and which was, that the Treasurer of the United States, and not the Secretary, should have selected the new depository for the public money. A strange and novel doctrine, subversive of every principle of the Treasury Department and of the uniform practice of the Government! Foreign to every duty of the Treasurer—an inferior officer, who never has had any thing to do with the selection or control over the place of deposit. What has he to do with the transfer? Is that high and responsible officer of the Government at the head of the Treasury, to say to him: "I have determined to remove the public deposits—to what place shall they be carried?" This would be reversing the order of the offices, and making the Treasurer the superintendent of the finances. If you confer upon him the right to select, he would have authority to change the depository. The moment the public deposits are removed from the Bank of the United States, the only place indicated by any law for their reception, the Treasurer would then, according to this doctrine, now broached for the very first time, have an uncontrolled authority over the deposits. He might restore them to the parent bank, or place them in its branches. If the Treasurer had the power to select the depository, what Secretary would ever incur the responsibility of removing the deposits? There is a particular form of warrant, known to all times, signed and issued by the Secretary, to bring money into the Treasury. The Treasurer makes no deposits—puts no money in the Treasury. The treasure is first collected for him by the head of the Department, and then it is his duty to take care that no money goes out without his warrant. He has nothing to do with the collection of the revenue into any one place—nothing to do with custom-house officers—or merchant bonds—or with the receivers of public money. The treasure is first created for him, and then it becomes the object of his care.

"The Treasury of the United States" is an expression of somewhat indefinite meaning. It does not signify locality, nor any precise and distinct sum of money accumulated in one particular place, or vault, or building. It means, more properly, a credit, a fund, on which the Government, through its appropriate officer, can draw at pleasure. That officer is the Treasurer; and that credit or fund is first created by the Secretary. From 1776 down to the present day, the Treasurer never has had any thing to do with the place of deposit. In all the debates in 1791, in 1811, in 1814, '15, and '16, and in 1819, the control of the Secretary over the deposits was not only acknowledged, but his right to select the place of deposit was admitted with equal unanimity. In going through our whole statute book you will find that the only law which, in express words, marks the distinction in the duties of those two officers in this very particular, is the old continental ordinance of 30th of July, 1779. It is so singularly applicable, that I again quote its language: "The Board of Treasury shall deposit in proper offices all moneys arising from loans, taxes, and lotteries;" and the Treasurer "shall receive and keep." This phrase, denoting the duty of the Treasurer, "he shall receive and keep," was afterwards literally incorporated with the law of 2d September, 1789, and has but one obvious meaning, that, after the Secretary has "selected the proper offices," and established the fund, the Treasurer shall then "receive" it from his hands, and "keep" it safe from all drafts not founded on appropriations by Congress.

One word, Mr. President, in answer to the argument drawn from his official bond. The penalty of that obligation is no higher than the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. A penalty that never could have been intended to cover the whole treasure of the United States! can carry with it no such impression, that his responsibility for many millions gives him the right, over the head of the Department, to select the place of deposit. Its limited amount obviously shows that it is intended solely as a security for his own personal fidelity.

The next objection by which the Secretary is assailed for his manner of removing the deposits, arises out of the much debated "contingent transfer drafts."

A recurrence to dates, sums, correspondence, and all the circumstances attending these drafts, will place the conduct of the Secretary far beyond the reach of any merited censure. I regret, sir, that in the warmth and excitement of debate, gentlemen having manifested feelings, and adopted an asperity of language, towards him, not at all justified by his official conduct. Scrutinize his correspondence and instructions in reference to those contingent drafts, and you will be convinced that he was not only guided by a view to commercial convenience, benefits, and facilities, but by a manifest spirit of justice and liberality towards the Bank of the United States. No one can read this correspondence between the Secretary and the selected deposit banks, without being struck with his ardent desire to protect the commercial community, and save it from all pecuniary disorders. The form of these transfer drafts, (a copy of which is now held in my hand,) modified and improved by Mr. Secretary Ingham, is the same as that used by the predecessors of the present Secretary. It is drawn by the Secretary, signed by the Treasurer, countersigned by the Comptroller, and recorded by the Register. It is the same form of warrant which originally transferred the public deposits into the Bank of the United States. It was the first intention of the Secretary, in his measures to execute the order of removal, to draw the public money gradually out of the Bank of the United States, as national convenience and the wants of the Government would require; and to manage this matter so gently as to produce no inconvenience or embarrassment in any quarter. But his liberal intentions were frustrated, and his amicable disposition proudly disregarded by the directors of the bank. And even then, the sums drawn out by those contingent drafts, were of no importance in amount, and were spread over three of the principal cities in the Union.

It has pleased honorable Senators, in a harsh but undeserved censure upon the Secretary, to charge upon him concealment and disingenuousness in his manner of issuing and using the drafts. One moment's review of the object for which the drafts were given, and the instructions accompanying them, must prostrate this accusation. There was no concealment; for the drafts were issued as a public official act, passed through all the bureaux of the Treasury, and were registered by the Register, whereby a public record of them was made, to which every individual in the country has access. In the correspondence of the bank with the Treasurer of the United States, a knowledge of the existence of these drafts is admitted; but the Treasury Department is taken to task for not having given the information through the customary form of communication. And further, sir, as evidence that these drafts were not the lurking and concealed instruments of distrust and confusion, stealing unexpectedly upon a confiding and unsuspecting agent, I refer to the acknowledged fact, that the bank had been busily engaged in the reduction of its loans, to the amount of millions, for three months before some of these drafts were even presented for payment! Why? For no other purpose than that of being prepared to meet transfer drafts of the deposits.

Again, sir. The cabinet paper is dated on the 18th, and published in the Globe on the 23d of September last. Of course the Bank of the United States, and the whole country, knew that the measure of removal would go into operation on the first of October. At that period, what was the state of things, and the peculiar position of the selected banks, in the city of New York more particularly? It is well known that the "branch drafts," (I will not misname them, for the judiciary have decided they are not "bank notes,") were the principal issues and circulation of the Bank of the United States—that those of other branches were rejected by the office at New York, and ranged, in the pecuniary fluctuations and exchanges of that city, at a discount of a quarter, a half, and at one per cent. In this posture of affairs, with increased means, derived from a rapid reduction of loans by the Bank of the United States, two evils were fairly apprehended immediately after the first of October. One, that the branch bank at New York (I take that as an instance) would refuse to receive, in liquidation of balances, the branch drafts of all other and distant offices. The other, that they would make a rush for specie upon the local banks. The selected deposit banks considered themselves perfectly safe; but conceived that by the first of these apprehended evils, they might be so crippled as not to be able to carry out the liberal instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, and afford those commercial facilities which he was so anxious should be extended to the community. Under these impressions, the Treasury Department, with a view in reality to the defence of the whole community, furnished these much abused and distorted contingent transfer drafts—contingent, because they were only to be used in case of the bad behaviour of the bank, in rejecting the paper of their sister branches, or in making a press for coin upon the contiguous local banks. The fair and ingenuous character of this transaction is manifest, by the Secretary's letters of instructions to the deposit banks, which I will now present to the Senate. [Here Mr. Wilkins read Mr. Taney's letters to the local banks.]

Removal of the Deposits.

[SENATE.]

Who can read these letters, and afterwards, with any justice, cast reproach upon the act itself, or the temper of mind from which it proceeded? They imperatively enforce upon the selected banks to be governed by "a disposition to adopt the most liberal course towards other moneyed institutions"—"to afford, by means of the public money, increased facilities to commerce"—"to extend their accommodations to individuals generally;" and (without doing injustice to the claims of others) "more particularly to the merchants engaged in foreign commerce." Such was the disposition of the Secretary towards other local institutions and the commercial community. But, in reference to the Bank of the United States, a spirit of amity restrained him within limits which the conduct of that institution would have justified him in transcending. In his letter of the 7th of October, to the Girard Bank, he advises them that it must be distinctly understood "with respect to the demand that might be made by the Bank of the United States on the State banks for the payment of balances due by them, in specie, he had reference only to the balances that might exist at the time of the removal of the public deposits, and not to any future balances that might arise; and that it will not be required by the Bank of the United States to receive the branch notes and drafts, unless they have been received by the deposit banks in payment of duties to the Government."

Let us, sir, proceed a little further. The 1st day of October fell on a Tuesday, and when the application was made to the branch at New York to know whether it would redeem the branch drafts, they asked delay in the answer until Saturday, and then again until Monday. During this critical interval, what was in contemplation, or what would be the result, no one could tell. The power was held in suspense over the heads of the deposit banks, and whether it would be used in an attack upon them for their coin, or in a refusal to receive the branch drafts, was an uncertainty which justified the Secretary in arming the Government depositories with those transfer drafts, to be presented only under the restrictions contained in his instructions, and upon the contingency that self-defence might render their use necessary.

The whole amount of those transfer drafts was only two million three hundred thousand dollars, spread over the three great commercial cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore. At the time they were drawn, the Secretary well knew the condition of the Bank of the United States and its branches; that they then held upwards of nine millions of the public money, and that they had in Philadelphia, and the other two cities, more coin than would have been necessary to meet the drafts. If the whole amount, therefore, had been drawn in specie, it would not have produced any embarrassment. But, sir, the case was very different. Two of the drafts were returned to the Treasury, never having been presented, each for five hundred thousand dollars, leaving but one million three hundred thousand dollars demanded and taken; a great portion of that, too, not for more than a month after the drafts had been issued, and then only demanded when the State banks were drawn upon for specie; and, finally, that sum, so unimportant to the Bank of the United States was spread over the three cities; in New York half a million, the same sum in Philadelphia, and three hundred thousand in Baltimore. Here then, sir, you have all the circumstances of this much exaggerated transaction of the transfer drafts! How different has been the conduct of the Bank of the United States in this city within a few days past! By their branch here they accumulated a demand upon the Bank of the Metropolis, a deposit bank, to an amount exceeding one hundred thousand dollars. In liquidation of it, and in the hope they might produce disorder and embarrass the arrangements of the Government, they refused to take "branch drafts"—refused a check on the parent bank in Philadelphia—demanded coin, and finally carried off from this deposit bank, fifty thousand dollars in specie.

Mr. President, I do not like retaliation by the Government; otherwise, I might, with great propriety, turn to the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the country in the case of the United States against Brewster, reported in 7th Peters, and if I had the right to advise, tell the Secretary of the Treasury to stand upon the decision of the Supreme Court, to retaliate upon the bank, to follow their own example, and to reject, in payment of debts to the United States, those illegal "branch drafts." But, sir, I have no wish to see such order of just retaliation; and there is no foundation in fact for the report that the Secretary of the Treasury means to be governed by any other spirit, or views, than those which will preserve, as far as the public interests will permit, the present condition and commercial course of the country. This discovers another instance of indulgence to this overbearing institution; for the judgment to which I refer, establishes the principle that a "branch draft" is not a "note or bill," under the 18th section of the charter, and therefore cannot, under the 14th section, fall under the denomination of those "bills and notes" made "receivable in all payments to the United States."

A word of reply, sir, may be necessary to another objection raised by an honorable Senator, to the form of these transfer drafts. It is alleged that their form and character are such, not following the provisions of the fourth section of the law of the 2d of September, 1789, that if the cashier or officer to whom they might be paid, should embezzle the money, it would be to the loss of the Government, and not that of the deposit bank.

I have in my hand one of these drafts—look at the form of it, and you have at once an answer to the objection. It has to it the signatures of all the requisite Treasury officers; and it is made payable to the order of the president or the cashier, in his official capacity. The presentation of the draft, and the receipt of the money would, therefore, be a corporate transaction, conducted by the agent, and which would certainly render his principal, the bank, responsible. If authority can be called for upon a legal principle so plain, I refer Senators to the decision, directly in point, in the case of the Mechanics' Bank against the Bank of Columbia, reported in 5 Wheaton, page 326. The fourth section in the law of '98, to which the Senator referred, and which specifies the duties of the Treasurer, and declares how his warrants shall be drawn, has reference only to warrants of disbursements—those for the payment of money out of the Treasury, under appropriations to creditors of the Government, and not to transfer drafts from one depository to another. If it were desired, under the obligation of the fifteenth section of the charter, to transfer public funds for the use of the Government from the Bank of the United States to some distant place where there is no branch, or if it were now desired to restore the public depositories, you would not resort to the fourth section of the law of '89, for the form of the transfer draft, but to the one now before us, adopted by the practice of the Government.

The same honorable Senator raised another difficulty on behalf of the disbursing officers and agents of the Government, which, he contends, must proceed from the manner and effect of the transfer of the depositories; and argues that the funds of those officers, placed in local banks, would be upon their own responsibility and risk, and not at that of the Government. In advancing this argument, the fourth section of the act of the 3d March, 1809, was overlooked. It declares that "public agents shall keep the public moneys in their hands in some incorporated bank, to be designated for that purpose by the President of the United States." Of course, if the disbursing officer depositories the public money in any bank, agreeably to the designation of the President, he complies with the law, and the funds are no longer at his hazard, but at that of the Government.

The remaining objection advanced against the manner of executing the order of removal by the Secretary, is founded upon the alleged want of authority to make, and the provisions contained in, the contracts made with the new deposite banks.

At this moment I shall confine myself to the first branch of this objection—the other being mere matter of detail; and offer very briefly the answer which the laws and policy of the Government so plainly present.

The sixth section of the act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1820, relied upon by gentlemen, which prohibits contracts from being made by the Secretary of either of the Executive Departments, has no bearing upon the present case. It refers to contracts not founded expressly or incidentally upon a law of Congress, and requiring an appropriation to carry them into effect. But the sound answer to the objection is, that the authority to make these contracts with the local banks is incidental to, and follows the right to remove the depositories. That authority arises, in the absence of an act of Congress or positive law, out of the sovereignty of the United States, and because its exercise is indispensably necessary to carry into effect a duty imposed upon one of the Departments of the Government. The power to remove the depositories would be useless and nugatory, without the implied right to make the necessary arrangements for their reception by the new and selected depositories. There are many instances and precedents in the administration of the affairs of the Government for the exercise of these incidental powers. I refer for an explicit judicial decision to be found in the report of the case in 5th Peters's Reports, pages 127, 128, &c. [Here Mr. W. read from the report of the case sustaining him in his argument.]

The removal of the public depositories was not only a rightful exercise of authority, but the mode of executing it is sanctioned by invariable usage of the Department—by the opinions of our statesmen, and by the spirit of our laws.

Expediency and public policy, which must be our guides in coming to a decision upon any great Executive measure, bear the Secretary fully out in the reasons he assigns for the transfer of the public money. I justify him, and shall assume these positions:

1st. He is sustained by the attitude of the bank in reference to the approach of the termination of its charter.

2d. The rapid and unnecessary curtailment by the bank, as early as the 1st of August, adopted on mere rumor, and without seeking any explanation or negotiation with the Treasury, hastened the action of the Secretary of that Department.

3d. The State banks are the only and proper depositories in the absence of all law and legislative provision creating or pointing out any other.

4th. The present distresses of the country are not the immediate and necessary result of the removal of the depositories, but are to be ascribed to the harsh, vindictive, and coercive measures of the Bank of the United States.

And, lastly, the depositories ought to be restored—because the crisis must be met. Again to transfer the public money would only add to the general distrust and increase the disorder and embarrassments complained of.

I shall proceed, sir, to advance my views in support of these several positions in the order in which I have arranged them. And the first is, that the Secretary was justified by the approach of the termination of the bank charter.

When the head of any of the Executive Departments is about to discharge a duty confided to him by Congress, and deeply affecting the concerns of the country, he certainly finds his justification in the law which directs his action. He must confine himself to what the face of the statute tells him, without being influenced by extraneous matter—by popular reports or current rumors. The Secretary, then, in deliberating upon the time which would be expedient for the removal of the public depositories, was bound to look only to the charter of the bank; and by that instrument it would be seen that the institution would have to close its concerns on the 4th of March, 1836, two years and five months from the time of the commencement of the transfer of the public money.

The Secretary of the Treasury had no reason to suppose that Congress would renew the charter of the bank, or extend it even for one hour. He knew that the institution had arisen out of the extraordinary emergency of the country at the close of a war. He knew that it had been created solely for the purpose of removing the financial disorders and embarrassments which then prevailed. He knew that those disorders and embarrassments had passed away, and the emergency, in his opinion, no longer existed to justify the continuance of the charter, and, therefore, he concluded there was no just ground for the expectation that it would be renewed. In looking into the charter of this bank, it will be perceived that in the very law itself, its grave-clothes are placed alongside of its swaddling-clothes. This fact is indicated by the unusual clause in a bank charter, allowing them two years "for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation," and which must have been inserted at the time by the framers of the law, under the evident intention that the existence of the bank should cease at the period specified. And this very sixteenth section itself contains in its spirit an indication of the same intention, for it gives to the Treasury a power to be exercised upon the distinct notice that the days of the bank were numbered. Thus, then, the Secretary, bound down and confined to the law which created the bank, could form no other opinion than that it must shortly close its operations, and that the Government and the country must be put in a posture to meet that event.

But, sir, if it was possible to presume that it was the official duty of the Secretary to overlook the act of Congress, and to direct his eye to public opinion—to political signs—to every speck of popular sentiment which appeared upon the political horizon—upon what conclusion would he have fallen? Every thing indicated to him that the bank must come to a close? A bill had been introduced into Congress for the renewal of its charter, and had been lost. The same Chief Magistrate by whose veto that measure had been defeated, was subsequently re-elected by the people. And here I will take occasion to observe, that I do not put the common construction upon that political event—and in the inference I draw from it, I differ in some degree from the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not think that result turned upon the question of the re-charter of the bank, nor was it a popular decision of that inquiry. I believe the people, in that Presidential election, looked beyond the bank, and (without meaning any indelicacy towards his distinguished competitor) were governed by higher and more interesting considerations in the re-election of General Jackson. Thousands of voters threw their weight on the side of the successful candidate, who would vote for a national bank to-morrow. It is not pretended that the re-election of the President gave him any new power. It only told to the world that the people did not expect a renewal, during his term, of the charter of the bank. Every one thought, after the bill had been lost—public opinion settled down in the belief, that there was an end of the Bank of the United States. What said the honorable Senator on my right, from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in his speech after the veto message came into the Senate in 1832? He declared, "The bill is negatived; the President has assumed the responsibility of putting an end to the bank; and the country must prepare itself to meet that change in its concerns which the expiration of the charter will produce!" This sentence is a condensed argument, fully justifying the act of the Secretary of the Treasury. As it comes from high authority, examine it. What is meant when we are told "the country must prepare" to meet that state of things to be produced by the extinction of the bank? It surely means that the community, the Government, and individuals, must all adopt preparatory measures to meet the coming event—the approaching change. In this early preparation it cannot be meant that the Government, so deeply interested, must be the last to act, and to profit by this timely admonition. The honorable Senator himself made it precisely what the Secretary had made it—a question of time only.

You might as well censure Congress for not having given a law for the continuance of the bank, as to blame the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits; because the act is justified by every presumption that a new charter cannot be obtained. Are we not brought to this point? The charter is to be renewed, or is not to be renewed? And why does not the bank come forward at this session? For if its charter is to be renewed, the deposits ought to be restored; and if not, and the deposits were, nevertheless, given back to it, the same scene must again be exhibited at some time before the 4th of March, '36. I repeat the question: Why does not the bank now come forward and try the issue with a new Congress? Why not, within its last two years, ask for that "definitive action," of which they speak in their own memorial?

The Secretary truly says in his report, It is a mere question of "time." Two and a half years only remained, which left little time enough to make an experiment which could not be avoided. I admit it to be an experiment, not courted, however, by the administration, but rendered inevitable by the law of the country. I assert too, that this experiment is an important and deeply interesting one. It must decide whether the Government can, or cannot, get along in its fiscal concerns, without the Bank of the United States; and whether our local banks can be made safe and efficient depositories of the public money. However serious the experiment may be—doubtful if you please—it must be made; and the earlier it is made, the safer for the public interests, and the better even for the bank itself. If, between this and the 4th of March, '36, the trial shall fail, the bank ought to be well pleased, and might fairly exult in the opportunity thus afforded of testing its utility. And shame upon it, if it has confidence in its own integrity and usefulness, for not permitting, with a spirit of liberality, the experiment fairly to advance.

The late Secretary, Mr. Duane himself, in his letter of the 23d of July last, says: "The operations of the Bank of the United States, excepting such as may be necessary for winding up its affairs, will cease on the 4th of March, 1836." And hence he commenced his inquiries preparatory to the removal of the deposits. A paper of much authority yet remains to be referred to, very decisive of the necessity of early preparation to meet "the expected change," and for the country "to seek new channels of business." I allude emphatically to the memorial of the Bank of the United States, signed by its president himself, and presented to Congress in the session of 1831-'2. I will quote two of its paragraphs: "Unless the question is decided by the present Congress, no definitive action upon it can be expected until within two years of the expiration of its charter, a period before which, in the opinion of your memorialists, it is highly expedient, not merely in reference to the institution itself, but to the more important interests of the nation, that the determination of Congress should be known." And again: "If, on the other hand, the wisdom of Congress shall determine that the bank must cease to exist, it is still more important that the country should begin early to prepare for the expected change; and that the institution should have as much time as possible to execute the duty—always a very delicate and difficult one—of aiding the community to seek new channels of business; and, by gradual and gentle movements, to press with the least inconvenience on the great interests connected with it." Thus, in his own representations made to Congress two years ago, does the president of the bank himself advance a complete justification for the act of the Secretary of the Treasury, in seeking "new channels of business," and thus beginning "to prepare for the expected change," because it had been determined "that the bank must cease to exist."

If, therefore, the proper and expedient time had arrived for the exercise of the authority given to the Secretary, it was the duty of the Executive department promptly to take care that it should not pass by, to the detriment of the public interests. If there was even a mistake as to time, and the most expedient moment had not arrived, this circumstance would not convert the exercise of a responsible and plainly-authorized duty into a usurpation, and stamp it as high handed and despotic.

In the second place, I contend that the removal of the deposits was hastened by the bank itself. Upon this point we are frequently met by the question, Why adopt this important measure only two months before the meeting of Congress? To this I reply, that delay would have brought with it, inevitably, positive injury, without giving the national legislature the opportunity, or the power, to interpose any salutary provision. Congress would have had no authority to interfere with the removal of the deposits. By the charter, they had parted with their power over the subject, and surrendered the control of it to the head of the Treasury Department. If Congress attempted to interfere before the Secretary had acted, the bank would have a right to protest against it as a violation of their charter. The matter rested entirely with the Treasury, and before Congress could again assume jurisdiction over it, the head of that Department must first act, and then, by the report of his reasons, give to us the right of legislation upon it. Congress might, indeed, in case of the removal, have appointed the new place of deposite, but could not, until the Secretary had acted, alter one word of the charter, by giving the public money into the keeping of other hands. The new depository is not the essential matter of contention here—its mere indication would not be worth the perilous delay of two months, and it would puzzle Congress to discover any other depositories than those chosen by the Secretary.

Removal of the Deposites.

It is well known, by the assurance of those whose candor cannot be questioned, as well as by the language of the late Secretary's instructions to the agent in his letter of the 23d of July last, that it was not the original intention of the Department to take from the Bank of the United States the deposites at the time they were removed; but an abandonment of that intention was forced upon the present Secretary by the danger and mischiefs of delay which were threatened, and inevitable, by the early and vexatious course of conduct adopted by the bank. This must be apparent when we recollect that as early as the 1st of August, two months before the removal, upon sheer rumor, when Mr. Duane was in office, adverse to the measure, the bank, a mere agent, too arrogant to ask for information or seek negotiation with its principal, commenced a system of enormous curtailments and severe oppression, imperiously demanding of the Government all that could be done to check and disarm it. If the public deposites had continued with them, accompanying their rapid reductions, where would we now be, after a lapse of five or six months? Every thing rushing into the bank, through the two wide channels of public deposites and curtailment of loans, what could supply the vacuum? If, in ordinary times, that startling declaration of the President of the bank were true, that "the State banks exist but by the forbearance of the Bank of the United States," what would now have been their condition and the condition of their debtors? The extraordinary reduction, from the 1st of August to the 1st of October, of upwards of four millions, shows they were as oppressive before as after the removal. If those early curtailments urged immediate action, the curtailment since the 1st of October proves the wisdom of the measure.

My third position, sir, that the State banks are the only and proper depositories for the public money, when it may happen to be removed from the Bank of the United States, is assumed, because propriety, public opinion, the uniform practice of the Government, all point to them in the absence of legislative provision upon the subject. Where else would you carry the public money? Not to brokers, stockjobbers, or private bankers? There was no new national depository provided. The charter of the present bank, although it expressly provides for the removal of the money, is entirely silent as to the new depository to which it shall be transferred, because Congress thereby intended to leave the subject where they had found it—in the hands of the Treasury Department. And it is equally silent as to any new depository upon the termination of the charter. In the whole financial history of the country, from the continental establishment of the Treasury Department, in September, '76, down to the present day, the deposites have been left under the exclusive control of the head of the Treasury, by whom the State banks have always been employed since our first knowledge of them. Follow our history for a moment on this subject. In the charter of the Bank of North America, granted by Congress in December, 1781, there was no injunction that in that institution the depo-sites of the public money should be made. There is the same absence of all provision of the kind in the charter of '91, given to the old Bank of the United States: and during the existence of that bank, the State banks participated with it in the enjoyment of the deposites. From '91 till the year 1800, the merchants' bonds for duties were not even directed to be deposited in the old bank for collection, until a special law, of the latter year, changed the practice as to six of our chief commercial cities. In 1811, when the old bank went down, no new legislative regulation was made; and the fall of that institution was softened by the assurance that the local banks would, of course, become its substitutes and the safe depositories of the public money. An honorable gentleman now upon this floor joined in that assurance: and a veteran statesman and experienced merchant, then a representative from Maryland, carried his opinions so far as to declare that the State banks were the safest depositories. In 1818, during the discussion in the House of Representatives, when the present bank was in much trouble and peril, no legislative action, designating new depositories, was at all proposed; all seemed to unite in the opinion that the State banks would necessarily become the holders of the public money. I will now refer to an extract from the opinion of a gentleman, then a member of the House, and now a distinguished Senator on this floor, [Mr. TILLY.] He asked, "Would it be a task of any great difficulty to substitute another system for this? I submit to honorable gentlemen to say whether, in the event of the Government selecting a bank in each State, notoriously solvent, in lieu of the present, we should not be precisely situated as we now are? You take a bank in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Richmond, &c., known to be solvent, and bestow on them the same countenance you bestow on the branches of this bank, limiting the reception of revenue to their notes or specie, and giving them the public deposites. Will gentlemen assign any good reasons for supposing that the notes of such banks would not circulate as currently, and as uniformly, as those of this institution?" And again: "There is no necessary alarm about the safety of the public deposites." And the same gentleman then proceeds to point out for security, the very mode adopted by the present Secretary of the Treasury in his arrangements with the State banks. Upon that occasion, also, General Smith, of Maryland, declared: "The control over the State banks will be greater than over the Bank of the United States." And in another part of his speech he says, "You will have a much greater control over the State banks, because you are under no obligation to put money in them, and you may change them whenever you think proper. The danger of losing the public deposites will always be a sufficient control over them."

If, during the earlier period of the history of our banking system, the State banks were considered by Congress, and by all the officers of the Treasury, as safe depositories for the national treasure, why should they not be held in the same estimation now, when the business is better understood, conducted with increased capital under the light of experience, resting upon a firmer basis, with new features thrown into their charters, conferring security and guarding against the suspension of specie payments? It is remarkable, that the friends of the old Bank of the United States left the deposites with the State banks, whilst the adversaries of it rested their opposition upon the same confidence in the State banks; and during the interval between the old and the present Bank of the United States, Congress left them there. And let it be remembered that the projectors and friends of the new bank never thought of any other than the same depositories, or of any change in the usage of the Government, for this sixteenth section, out of which our controversy springs, was introduced by a gentleman opposed to the bill.

FEB. 17, 1834.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[SENATE.]

The fourteenth fundamental article of the present charter itself authorizes, in certain cases, the employment of State banks, to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The last instance which I shall cite to show the confidence of Congress and of the Government in State banks, is to be found in the fourth section of the law of 3d of March, 1809, and which directs that "public agents shall keep the public moneys in their hands, in some incorporated bank, to be designated for that purpose by the President of the United States." The average amount of public money in the hands of disbursing officers of the Government is very great—essentially they are public depositories. Yet this provision by Congress was made when the old Bank of the United States was in being, and does not order the moneys to be there deposited; and so the statute stands through the time of the present bank and its many branches, indicating no preference over any incorporated State banks.

The contracts made with the State banks upon their receiving the public depositories have been critically and severely scrutinized. They can bear the close examination they have received, for they are discreet and cautious, effectually guarding the people's money and the public interests. Look at those arrangements. The Secretary has secured over the selected banks every salutary control—has assumed to himself every necessary source of information—if not more effectually, at least as great as the charter gave him in reference to the Bank of the United States. In those arrangements he has followed in the footsteps of Mr. Crawford and Mr. Rush. They are not only prudent and economical—for none of the expenses fall upon the government—but they are liberal, guarding the interests and providing for the accommodations of the merchants, and the convenience of the trading community. But these arrangements are, at any rate, mere matters of detail, open and subject to be regulated at any moment by the interference of Congress.

It has been argued that the people have confidence in the Bank of the United States only; and those who have money to deposit place it there. Not so—this is an error. You may test any where the comparative confidence in State banks and the branches of the Bank of the United States, and you will discover the fallacy of that position. I will give you an instance extracted from the official returns. By that of the Bank of the United States, it appears that the depositories of individuals in their branch at New York, on the 23d of December was - $1,064,471

In the Mechanics' Bank of New York, on the 11th of January, individual depositories were	$1,124,570
In the Manhattan Bank on same day, -	870,478
In Bank of America, 17th January, -	670,027
	$2,665,075

This not only exhibits the comparative confidence, but it shows the nature of the pressure represented to exist, by so large a sum lying idle in only three city banks of New York!

My fourth position is, that the present distresses of the country, extend as far as they may, are not the immediate result of the removal of the public depositories, but are to be directly ascribed to intervening measures adopted by the Bank of the United States, from selfish and resentful motives, her great object being the coercion of the country into her own views.

However deeply, upon all occasions, I may deplore any measure of distress, whether partial or general, which may fall upon my fellow-citizens, I cannot resist the impression that our present embarrassments are magnified by political newspapers and by the partisans of the bank out of doors. They have succeeded, too, in producing panic—distrust—want of confidence—(sure precursors of distress)—all readily produced when they refer to money—to the purse—to that sensitive thing called "the money market"—and all of which we are efficiently but unfortunately continuing and extending by our terrifying forebodings and alarming discussions here. The moment these shall be terminated, the panic will subside. And let that termination be as it may, there is strength, elasticity, and enterprise in abundance in the people to accommodate themselves to any condition of things which may succeed this discussion. It must not be forgotten too, in our attempts to establish the true cause of the prevailing and injurious panic, that the bank is bound to make good every thing which its friends may allege. To accomplish its purposes, the exertions of its varied and extensive power must go hand in hand with the alarms that are spread, and must instantaneously cause embarrassment to be felt where it is said embarrassment prevails.

In making allusion to the strength and vast resources of our community, proving its ability to extricate itself from real or fancied embarrassments, and of the necessity of throwing itself upon its own powers, I am called upon to notice the frankness and independence of the committee recently deputed by the New York merchants, and who visited this city in opposition to the Executive measure which I now advocate. The report of that committee, and the proceedings adopted upon it by their constituents, afford to the commercial community an example worthy to be followed. They distinctly avow the capacity of that community to carry itself through the present embarrassments, to safety and prosperity; and independently resolve to rely upon their own energies, upon their calmness, liberality, and mutual forbearance. The report of that adversary committee merited reference on another account. It overthrows an allegation made upon this floor and elsewhere, well framed to excite in the breasts of citizens of other States the most sensitive feelings of alarm and jealousy; for it distinctly avows that the secret and ultimate object of the present struggle is to break down the Bank of the United States, and from its ruins and scattered materials to erect a new institution in the city of New York. The committee of that city, well informed and enlightened on the subject, returned to their constituents and distinctly declared there is no such project here. They exonerate the first and second officers of the Government from all such intention. If I could think for one moment that the struggle now going on was with a view to that selfish and interested object, that there secretly lurked under this Executive measure any such purpose or scheme of State rivalry, I would promptly turn my back upon the whole affair and abandon the proceeding I am now endeavoring to sustain. Whenever the contest shall be between "Wall street and Chestnut street," I will go for Chestnut street. Nay, more; I will never give my vote for a bank of the United States, unless it is to be placed in the good city of William Penn. The people of Pennsylvania do, indeed, struggle and compete with New York—but not on the sordid question of the locality of a bank. We have a higher and more durable object before us; one upon which truly and essentially rests the commercial welfare and prosperity of our State. We aim at and struggle for the trade of the great West. Upon the interesting and important policy of internal improvements, we carry on and maintain a high and honorable contest, not to be terminated, I trust, until we take from our rivals of the "Empire State," the rich prize held in the neutral hands of our enterprising fellow-citizens of the Western States.

But, let me return to the inquiry I have just entered upon. Where are those distresses found? They are local, not national. They evince no general calamity. I cannot believe that they have fallen so seriously, or to such great extent, upon one class of our citizens, held by men in the highest estimation: I mean the fair American merchants—a high-minded and most excellent portion of our community; who continually add to the honor of their country abroad, and whose enterprise discovers their hand and their impress upon every public undertaking at home—whose hearts swell and expand like the canvass of their ships, and carry their public spirit and their benevolence into every quarter of our country. To avert a calamity from such a community, I would be willing to make almost any sacrifice, save that of the rights of my Government and of the people to the ambition of the bank.

Trace up these distresses, and I again ask, Where are they to be found? Certainly not in an unusual number of bankruptcies and suspensions—for, it is undeniable that they are less numerous than they were within a recent period, when the bank was undisturbed in the full possession of the public money. Are not those distresses—at all events as yet—limited to your speculators, to brokers, to stockjobbers; to those who live by daily and weekly borrowing; to those who languish and pine away under a continual feverish excitement, in watching every morning's discount of the banks, and to whom curtailment is another word for bankruptcy?

There has been, in fact, recently, a new epoch in the speculations of our country. I refer to the vast and unusual amount of investments in new banks—in public stocks, canals, railroads, and State securities. These are depressed for a time by that great power which controls the money market; and let the unfortunate sufferers look to that power as the wanton author of their distresses: but, sir, here I stop, and draw the cheering distinction—the great mass of the people are safe and undisturbed, for the simple reason that the people are not indebted: they are unembarrassed, from the great abundance and recent prosperity of the country: the bone, and sinew, and muscle of the country, are sound and healthy.

I again repeat it, that our embarrassments are artificial—for there is no real cause for them; because, sir, we have, at this moment, within our favored country, all the elements of great prosperity—health—unusually abundant crops, which bear a fair value—general peace amongst our commercial customers abroad—no export demand for our specie, but an influx of it upon us—imports comparatively light—our manufactures, as yet, safely protected, and undisturbed by the agitation of that question of policy so vitally interesting to them; the spirit of internal improvements advancing and giving employment to our industrious laborers; our local banks all standing firm, and their paper circulation intrinsically as good as ever; more coin in the country now than there was on the 1st October last; and the vast accumulation of it lying idle in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, renders her perfectly safe. This happy condition of the country, this abundance, rendered the moment selected by the Secretary of the Treasury a peculiarly fit one for the transfer of the public deposits.

It is useless, sir, for me to repeat that the money is all in the country, and in the hands of those whose very occupation it is to lend it out, accompanied, too, by the instructions and the injunction of the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of it in commercial facilities. But, the Bank of the United States overshadows us, and yet governs—controlling the wishes, and restricting the actions of the other banks. With this exertion of her power, aided by her alliance with influential newspapers, she has succeeded in extensively spreading distrust and want of confidence. Of course, in public stocks, and in State securities, a depression must follow if she continues her course—failures and suspensions must eventually ensue. Hence, too, in the business of merchandise, there is little done, because the merchants are afraid to buy and sell. Our commission merchants are afraid to seek consignments—domestic sales of southern crops have been limited, but a recent rise in Europe in the great staple of that section of the Union, whilst this discussion has been going on, shows that the deposits had no influence upon its foreign market. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to permit a reinvestment in this country of the capital withdrawn by the payment of the instalment of the public debt. The very few among us who are disposed, in a moment of general alarm, to let out their money, find a more profitable investment in buying notes and public stocks. There is a general contraction of all engagements to pay money—a “terrapin system” adopted—every man draws himself within his shell, and buries deeper, or hugs more closely, the purse which contains the object of his care and continual pursuit.

But, the simple refusal of the Government any longer to keep its accounts in the Bank of the United States was not the primary cause of this state of things, nor in any way adequate to produce such effects. We have now the same alarm—the same representations—the same drama which was performed upon the going down of the old Bank of the United States in 1811, now in rehearsal by a new company. The alarmists then found their way into the newspapers, into the lobbies and galleries of the halls of Congress; and their successors, following their example, are now exhibiting to us the same scenes. I cannot believe they will terminate in “deep tragedy.” What did, then, produce the pressure? It is a grave and serious question, to which the people will respond in their indignant condemnation of the bank. I answer—it was not the Government, but the bank, by yielding to a spirit of resentment—of vindictiveness—having in view ulterior objects—the repossession of the public money, and the perpetuation of its charter. And, regardless of the happiness of the community, that corporation vexatiously produced the convulsions with which we are now distracted. In the indulgence of this arrogant and resentful spirit, she broke up all amity between herself and the State banks, and turned her back upon the commercial community, whose convenience and interest she refuses to consult, because she has quarrelled with the Secretary of the Treasury!! The bank, swelling itself up to a consequence not justified by its charter, was determined to contend with its principal, regardless how the innocent might suffer in the conflict. She proudly refuses all communication with the administration, and declines all negotiation with the local banks. Why so, at a juncture so important to the interests of all? Upon more occasions than one, in her eventful and disastrous history, she had to ask indulgence and to sue for favors from the State banks, and had to fly to the Executive for safety. Why did she not turn back, in grateful remembrance of the favors she had received, and say to other banks and to the merchants: “We are badly treated by the Government; the administration is encroaching upon our chartered rights; but this affords no reason for the disruption of all amity between us, and the spreading of distrust and alarm over the country?” Sir, she maintained a good understanding with those institutions and with the Treasury, as long as she thought it was her interest, and the moment that interest was supposed to depend upon a contrary policy, hostility to all around was immediately commenced. Mr. President, in the examination of this Executive measure, it is natural to turn round and inquire what was the state of the community and the condition of our commercial cities, preceding and at the time of its taking effect.

I believe there is always something in the state of the business in our large cities at the commencement of the winter season, which produces a slight and increased demand for money; but this is hardly worth taking into the present account. A great amount of capital had been abstracted from our chief Atlantic cities and invested in the way I have mentioned, and now, when wanted by the merchants, they have it not, and cannot, upon the emergency, re-possess themselves of it. But I refer more particularly to the new tariff system which went into operation on the 4th of March last, establishing short credits and cash payment of duties. This, in effect, has taken away from our commercial community an immense capital. The credits on some goods, largely imported, were six, ten, and twelve months. This was actually a capital loaned by the Government to the merchants, sufficient to trade upon. By the change in the policy of the country, these loans were withdrawn, and at the moment when the effects of this new system were beginning fairly to be felt and to press upon the commercial community, the Bank of the United States commenced a rapid reduction of its loans: thus taking advantage of the change in the tariff policy of the Government, and seizing upon it as a favorable opportunity to work out its purpose of resentment, by putting the screws to the people. I am not aware that gentlemen are apprized of the serious and extensive effects, and the increased demand for money by the merchants, produced by this recent change in the tariff. In the city of New York it appears to be acknowledged that the increased demand within the year, would be at least ten millions of dollars. In the city of Philadelphia, by an authentic statement in my hand, from the 4th of March to the 1st of January, it would exceed two millions—in Boston it would be something less; and, I presume, in Baltimore still less. But extend the system through all the importing towns and cities of the Union, and it will be obvious that the augmented demand upon one portion of our community, whose wants or abundance spread alarm or infuse confidence, must have been excessive and of itself a most plentiful source of pecuniary and commercial pressure. At such a moment, with our commercial community in this novel and pecuniary posture, the Bank of the United States should have advanced to the very verge of its own safety, to have preserved its own friends and neighbors at least from the first rigorous trials of this new policy. But how was it? In the month of May, 1832, preceding the election, they had run up their loans to the maximum, exceeding seventy millions of dollars, more than double their capital; and that, too, when there approached a payment of an installment of the national debt, which could only be met by "removing the deposites," yet then, when not so rich and secure in resources as at present, they could, gratuitously, run up their loans to an excess unknown at all other periods! They could then come forward and ask favors, arrangements, accommodation from the Government. Why did they not do so lately? Why not now? To save the commercial community, which was the deceptive excuse then given by the bank, Mr. Secretary McLane at once and liberally assented to all that was required. They alleged they were prepared to meet the payment of the three per cent. stock; but if it was discharged on the 1st of July, the withdrawal of the amount from their accommodations would bring down a pressure upon the merchants, and for that reason, which was readily yielded to, they sued for an extension of the time to the 1st of October. They obtained it. But how did they use the privilege? Neither to save our honor abroad, nor to accommodate our merchants at home; for their loans, instead of being kept up, immediately began to be curtailed.

In page nineteen of their own report, they speak of "the expansive power, so valuable in the institution when the wants of the country required its aid." And upon the same page they say, "the bank enlarged its business to meet the commercial wants of the country, and when those wants were supplied, the business of the bank of course subsided." And again, in page twenty-one, they say, "wherever large payments are made by the Government, as it is necessary to withdraw from the use of the community considerable sums, the process requires some delicacy in recalling from distant parts of the United States as much as may answer the immediate exigency, yet not enough to press disadvantageously on the community." Why do they not, sir, upon the present occasion, exercise their functions upon this fair policy? When the rumor about the deposites went forth, why not negotiate with the Government as they did in 1832? Why not in 1833 as well as 1832, plead the cause of the merchant, and sue for accommodating arrangements? Why not represent, in their own former language "the situation of the commercial community"—and that it "would require all the aid and all the forbearance that could be given them?" Had they so conducted themselves in the present crisis they would have found, as they formerly found, every disposition on the part of the Secretary to go hand in hand with them to relieve the commercial community.

Sir, I have called their curtailments not "gradual," but rapid and oppressive. Allow me to exhibit, to sustain me in this assertion, extracts from their own official returns.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

August 1st,	-	-	$7,599,841.47
October 1st,	-	-	9,182,173.08
December 1st,	-	-	5,162,360.63
January 1st,	-	-	4,230,509.63

These sums include the credits to the Treasurer, those of public officers, and redemption of the public debt.

BANK LOANS.

Curtailments.

August 1st,	-	$64,160,349.14
October 1st,	-	60,094,202.73
December 1st,	-	54,453,104.67
			$4,166,146.21
			9,607,244.47

Thus, the curtailment from 1st August to 1st October, is - 4,166,146.21
And increase of the public money during the same time, is - 1,582,331.71
Curtailment from 1st August to 1st December, - 9,607,244.47
Decrease of public moneys between 1st August and 1st December only - 2,437,480.82
So, to meet decrease of public moneys in four months, which was only $2,437,480.82, they curtailed 9 millions 6 or 700 thousand dollars.

Decrease of public moneys between the 1st of August and the 1st of January, is only $3,369,331.84.

The bank curtailed between the 1st August and 1st October, before the deposites were removed, in two months, near $800,000 more than the whole amount of public money which they paid over after they were removed up to the 1st of January last.

But, this is not all: when its discounts were at their maximum, viz. in May, 1832, they were $70,428,070.

Therefore, their reduction from 1st May, 1832, to the 1st of August, 1833, fifteen months, was only $6,267,721.

Whilst in four months from 1st August, '33, to 1st December, '33, it was, as we have seen, 9 millions and between 6 and 700 thousand dollars. That is, during the former period, at the rate of $417,000 a month, and during the latter period at the rate of $2,401,811.

In further proof of this rapid and oppressive reduction of loans, cast your eyes over their returns, and see how it has fallen on the branches. I will give you an instance or two:

The Nashville branch.

Its loans were, on 9th January, 1833,	-	$3,710,505
on 13th November, 1833,	-	1,946,415
Reduced in ten months	-	$1,764,090

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[FEB. 17, 1834.]

The Pittsburg branch.

May, 1832, at its maximum,	-	-	$1,739,216
Its loans on 24th January, 1833, were	-	-	$1,610,147
on 31st January, 1834,	-	-	1,052,264
Reduced in one year	-	-	$557,883

And in the last two months, ending on the last day of January, the sum of $72,850.

In the Boston branch, (if I am not mistaken in the extract from the official return,) the reduction of loans in the last six months, is $3,200,000; leaving in that city now upon loan only $1,636,000.

It will be seen that their loans were run up to an excessive amount, just before the veto; then rapidly diminished, until the election of 1832 had passed; then increased until the removal of the deposits was spoken of, and then this excessive reduction made.

I wish we could stop here; but we must proceed and add to the list the reductions which this great controlling institution obliges all the local banks immediately to make. And you must also throw into this account of the curtailment of discounts the aggravating circumstance that the panic unjustly impaired confidence in the State banks, and their issues constantly returned upon them, and thereby diminished the fund upon which they discounted.

There are other facts to be brought up as evidence against the bank, of its wanton disposition, and its disregard of all appeals to it to save the community. A prominent one is, the refusal of the directors to join the local banks in any arrangement for relief, and to ease off the pressure from the public, when they well knew that the administration and the Secretary of the Treasury would cheerfully have concurred in measures to have attained that object. Any liberal scheme of good understanding and mutual forbearance does not suit their purpose; and hence it happens that the State banks within the immediate range of their influence, memorialize Congress for the restoration of the deposits; because it is only by that measure they can propitiate this angry power, and find peace for themselves.

Another evidence of their refusal to interpose and relieve in any way the wants of those who suffered, by even a partial and temporary exercise of that mighty "expansive power" of which they boast, is to be found in the fact that they even refused "to consider" the resolutions offered at the board last fall by the public directors, set forth upon page 23 of their memorial, which had for their object a union and a "concert of action" among the banks of Philadelphia, in the hope of restoring confidence, and giving ease to the mercantile community.

The last, and certainly one of the most extensively oppressive acts in the condemning catalogue, is their resolution of the 13th of August last—almost two months before the removal of the deposits—breaking up the domestic exchange between the Atlantic cities and the West, and between the towns of the West and of the interior; and this has been followed by a system of exaction in the increase of the rates of exchange. This one act, throwing aside all others in the series of their conduct, in the days of Mr. Secretary Crawford, as he avows in his letter of the 3d of July, 1817, written upon this very subject of domestic exchanges, would have left with the Government no alternative, and, in the view of that statesman, would, of itself, justify the measure of the present Secretary of the Treasury. The whole of the great West has felt this act more sensibly than any other parts of the Union. All the towns of the valley of the Ohio and Mississippi, commencing with the city of my own residence, are so intimately connected in all their pecuniary intercourse, continual interchange in commodities, and correspondence, springing from their active, honorable, and enterprising commerce, that this blow fell upon them, in a hidden way, with peculiar severity; but, when traced to the arm which inflicted it, the Secretary of the Treasury must stand acquitted from all blame. This business of domestic exchange had been entirely surrendered to the Bank of the United States—a monopoly which it secured to itself by means of its great capital, the occupation of all our chief towns by its branches, the use of the public deposits, and the extensive circulation of its notes; and it suddenly and capriciously broke it up, without giving time for the country to prepare for and build up any new system in its stead. There was another injurious effect produced by the resolution of the 13th of August. It invited the purchase of drafts upon the Atlantic cities, thereby increasing the commercial responsibilities there, and adding to the demand for money upon the Eastern merchants. How, then, can we be mistaken about the cause of the distress? The old Bank of the United States, in 1811, refused by Congress a single hour of extension of time, surrendered the public deposits—went down—closed its affairs—without inflicting distress upon the country. The recent death of that successful merchant and benevolent man, Stephen Girard, suddenly closed the doors of his bank over a discount of business paper to an amount, I believe, of upwards of four millions of dollars, without producing any shock or convulsing the commercial community of Philadelphia.

I admit the Bank of the United States ought to have reduced its discounts; because they had less ability after the removal of the deposits, to accommodate the community to the extent of the means derived from the possession of the public money, than they had anterior to its transfer. But this reduction ought not to have been disproportioned to the demand likely to be made upon them. That bank holds the main-spring that regulates all the machinery of discounts, domestic exchange, and commercial facilities. This is the great power of the bank, and it is wielded by one hand and one mind of vast resources, of high ambition, and inflexible in the pursuit of a determined purpose. In the pursuit of that purpose, they suddenly, almost entirely, ceased the business of discount. They oppressively closed their iron doors over their ten and a half millions of specie, and turned their customers adrift, to seek relief by knocking at other doors, which they had also taken care should be closed against them.

There was no necessity to adopt so oppressive a course. Such excessive curtailment could only have been rendered necessary by changing the relative power of the Bank of the United States and the local banks, and bringing the safety of the one within the control of the many. Of this no danger did exist; and, from the small amount of capital and separate administration of the local banks, as well as their entire want of concert of action, never can be brought to exist. The Bank of the United States, covering the whole country, having her twenty-five branches occupying all the strongest commercial positions of the Union, having for eighteen years, with an immense capital, enjoyed the control of the banking business, holds the discounts of the country in the palm of her hand. She can produce a simultaneous and uniform action throughout our entire empire. When she touches the chord at one end, its vibrations are instantaneously felt through all the ramifications of commerce, the business, and the interests of this enterprising nation. Her hard hand now presses on the chord of contraction, and the only notes that are heard are those of panic and distress.

In reference to this pressure upon the country, we are asked, What can the bank do? I answer, Every thing. It is rich, secure, powerful, and influential. By a single breath it can dispel the panic and restore confidence. By one morning's discount it can substitute cheerfulness for gloom. It is the ruling power of the country, and ought to take the guidance and lead off in restoring amity and mutual forbearance between itself and the other banking institutions. Let it do this—not for the sake of the Government, but for the community. Let it negotiate, as it has done upon former occasions, not so urgent as the present, out of regard for its debtors, and let its hostile attitude to the Government be no impediment in the way of its usefulness. If the termination of its charter was not near enough to justify the removal of the deposites, it has not approached so near as to excuse persistence in its refusal to forbear. In one word, who can doubt the power of the Bank of the United States to alleviate? It ought to go to the very verge of the precipice, and peril its own safety to give relief. Its circulation cannot be affected, its notes are secured as a legal tender to the annual amount of many millions in payment of debts to the Government. Its wealth, safety, and strength, are well boasted of by its advocates, and yet it will not relax in its rigid policy. To show that it is out of the reach of accident or hostility, I refer to a brief extract in my hand taken from its monthly return, dated on the 3d of the present month. But previously let me observe, that in 1831 the bank voluntarily parted with five millions of specie, called then surplus; so that on the first of March, 1832, their specie was reduced to six and a half millions, when their paper circulation was greater than at present, and foreign exchange stood on a very different footing.

In the last month they have decreased their loans on the line of notes on personal security, that is, business paper, more than a million of dollars, and at the same time, have added more than half a million to their specie!

Sir, what is a panic—that sudden terror inspired by a misapprehension of danger—that fright without real cause which substitutes distrust for confidence, and threatens to overspread our fair land with commercial disaster? I refer Senators, and the public, to an appropriate and happy answer, given by the president of the Bank of the United States himself, on Monday the 30th of April, '32, to a question put to him by the Committee of Investigation, and to be found in your printed documents of that year. You will there discover how admirably well that intelligent gentleman not only portrays “a panic,” but exhibits in himself and in his own institution the very simple and ready means of driving the evil from our continent. He proceeds, and assures us “how little is required to produce a panic,” and that the means to allay it are about as trifling. He tells us that the most disastrous period in the financial history of England was in the fall of 1825; and that the storm which then broke upon that country was subdued, and the whole kingdom, and the Bank of England (considered now as almost a part of their constitution) saved, by trivial means and accidental occurrences bordering on the ridiculous—“the unexpected arrival of about two hundred thousand sovereigns from France, the discovery, in the cellars of the Bank of England, of eight hundred thousand one-pound notes, long before condemned to be burnt, and the intervention of a Sunday.” The accomplished financier then describes to us how the same storm which had thus broken upon England passed over this country but a few weeks before; how it had threatened to produce the same results—the same dismay and confusion in all our great interests. And pray, sir, how was this frightful crisis met? The witness answers, and says, “By a resolute and decided step to rally the confidence of the country? By whom? By the bank and himself. How? By a ride from Philadelphia to New York, after a little trouble, to put the bank in an attitude of safety, and the increase of its loans by one morning's discount, to the paltry amount of fifty thousand dollars!” This, too, at an unpropitious moment, when the bank had to make a very large payment of the national debt, and when there was a demand upon them from abroad for their coin. Thus, confidence revived and dismay vanished at the only moment, in our financial concerns, when the moral courage of the president of the bank seems to have failed him; for he himself declares that he “never felt any uneasiness about the banks of this country, except on that occasion.” Hear a little further his own language, when speaking of this mighty effort, the increase in one day, at the branch of New York, of its loans to the amount of fifty thousand dollars! He testifies: “From this moment confidence revived, and the danger passed. I then thought, and still think, that this measure, the increase of the loans of the bank, in the face of an approaching panic, could alone have averted the same consequences which, in a few days afterwards, were operating with such fatal effect upon England. I have never doubted that the delay of a week would have been of infinite injury, and that the prompt interposition of the bank was the occasion of protecting the country from a great calamity!” To all this very excellent doctrine, I have only to say: Go, and do in 1834 as you did in 1825, take a ride to New York, and extend your loans!

Mr. President, we hear much upon this floor of “disorders in the currency.” I deny their existence—there is no such thing. Because, at this moment, there is not a single note in circulation of any bank in the United States which is not as good, at this moment, as it was before, or at the time of the removal of the deposites. There can be no confusion, no disorders in the paper currency, so long as the State banks continue to pay specie. Why should there be, whilst they all stand firm, and promptly pay the coin upon presentation at their counters, in fulfilment of the promise carried upon the face of their notes? And, in reference to the notes of the Bank of the United States, you are secure from any disorder, because the law of Congress guaranties their circulation, and secures them from interruption, by the obligation imposed on the Government in the 14th section of the charter. If, during the present absence of amity, and prevalence of dismay, any of the local banks should be crushed, and there should succeed suspensions of specie payments, then, I confess, there would be, indeed, confusion and “disorders in the currency.” Those quotations made by Senators from tables of bank-note exchange, are not entitled to that degree of influence which should govern us in forming an estimate of the effects of any great political measure, or an opinion of the true condition of the country. They are made up by interested persons, who live and fatten upon the very inequality and confusion which they themselves represent to prevail in bank-note circulation. The truth of the case is, that the difference in exchange can really never be any thing more than the expense of transmitting the notes for payment, and bringing back the coin. For this reason, distant floating notes—even distant branch notes—have never been received at par. And if, by these interested tables of bank-note exchange, there appears to be any decrease in the value of distant State bank notes, it cannot be very well ascribed to the removal of the deposites, for that measure was rather of a character to strengthen those banks, and to weaken the power which held over them the control and the supremacy.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his official report, presents, and in my mind, substantiates the charge against the Bank of the United States, of having "used its means with a view to obtain political power."

If this charge has been sustained by reasonable evidence, no one will deny that of itself it afforded sufficient ground, independent of all other considerations, to justify the removal of the depositories.

Upon the purity of our elections, upon the exercise of the right of suffrage without reward and not perverted by corrupt practices, depend the integrity with which the Government will be administered, the preservation of our rights, and the continuance of our political institutions.

It would excite deep and universal condemnation to employ the money of the stockholders alone to influence our elections and "with a view to obtain political power"—or, to permit any moneyed corporation, the creature of the Government, to throw itself into our political controversies. But, what would be the indignant judgment of every citizen against the directory that would use the people's money to corrupt the people!—that would use the Government stock and dividends to overturn the Government!—that would employ the public depositories, left with them at the will of an administration, to vilify, electioneer against, and destroy every member of that administration!

In all times of our political history, no matter of whom the dominant party might be composed, the interference of banks in the politics of the country has been universally censured and doomed to public punishment. In 1811, a prominent and distinguished gentleman now upon this floor, advanced to his constituents, as one of his reasons for his essential aid in putting down the old Bank of the United States, that it had been "reported" it had in a particular quarter of the country interfered in the politics of the day. The committee of the other House, in the report to which I have already referred, of the 30th of April, 1830, speak of the punishment to be inflicted on the "directors who would bring the pecuniary influence of the institution to bear upon the politics of the country." The present Bank of the United States should be less presumptuous, and endeavor to profit by lessons and examples spread before it. The old Bank of North America, incorporated by Congress in December, 1781, because "the exigencies of the United States rendered it indispensably necessary," lost its charter, granted by Pennsylvania, in 1785, because, in the administration of its affairs, it had "been found to be injurious to the welfare of the State, and its tendency incompatible with the public safety." Of the offence of which I now speak, and of its well-merited punishment, there can be but one opinion. The only contested question is, By what evidence is the accusation sustained? I answer, By that kind and weight of proof, full to the point, if you are governed by that rule which requires the best testimony the peculiar and difficult nature of the case will admit. The directors themselves, aware of the deep impression made by the evidence against them, admit substantially the whole of the facts upon which the charge against them rests, but labor to explain them away—to draw their own inferences—to conceal their real intention under the assumed and false argument and pretence of self-defence. In this admission they yield the point; for their self-defence went far beyond answers to the arguments and objections contained in the veto message; bound by no limits in their language and proceedings, they aimed at the entire overthrow, personally and politically, of their adversaries, to whom trusts of deep interest had been committed by the people. Say, for a moment, there is no positive proof. Do you ask for it in a case like this? Do you demand it in the instance when the doings of the association are all secret and with closed doors? Do you call for the same direct evidence as if you were trying an issue before a judicial tribunal? Look around you—look every where—cast your eye over the whole country—a bank atmosphere every where covers the land, full of political interference and influence. Immediately succeeding the presentation of their memorial in '31, '32, they opened their coffers and poured out their money like water. I am averse to allusion to the individual accounts of any of our citizens. It is sufficient to rely upon the pages of the bank report made by the board of directors themselves, and by a reference to them, it will be perceived that in the execution of those resolutions which placed the whole funds of the institution, public and private, at the uncontrolled disposal of a single officer of the bank, they disbursed and incurred expenses, within a short and recent period, to the amount of $58,265 94—and during the same period the total expenses under the head of "stationary and printing" ran up to the sum of $105,057 73. So much for their own acknowledgments under their own hands! But, the public directors, with all the caution and solemnity which ought to characterize an official memorial to Congress, openly charge upon the bank a total expenditure in the years 1831 and 1832 upon the same objects of $81,882 67, instead of $58,265 94, admitted by the bank, of which, in the first six months of the year 1831, there was lavishly expended the sum of $29,979 92; and in the last six months of 1832, the sum of $26,543 72! For myself, sir, I am willing to yield to the bank the right of reasonable expenditure for the publication and circulation of "reports to Congress," of "speeches in Congress," and for "essays on currency and banks." But I can go no further; for we are then brought to the material, important, and culpable class of "publications." I mean that which the directors themselves denominate in their report "other miscellaneous publications!" What does this mysterious phrase cover? Not "speeches in Congress," not "reports to Congress," nor "essays on banks and currency." Why not specify? Why mystery and concealment by a public, Government institution? They refuse to exhibit an account and to produce vouchers! Why not divulge—more particularly where such enormous expenditures were made, in part, out of the people's money by one director alone, and that director, in fact, forbid by the board to disclose, when public accusation called for light and information! Let me see this account for "miscellaneous publications," and if we are in error in the conclusions we have drawn, I will be the very first to acknowledge that injustice has been done. Their concealment justifies the accusatory demand upon them. Let us see this list of "miscellaneous publications!" In these, do they assail or defend? ~~We may only conjecture~~ what has been secretly done, when we see what they have publicly said and laid upon our tables. I refer, sir, to "the report of the committee of directors of the Bank of the United States," in which a language so reprehensible and so indecorous is held towards our public officers, that finally the only reward of the bank will be found in a general burst of public reproof. The whole tenor of that bank production is marked with a degree of bitterness unbecoming a public and exculpatory document, and using the inexcusable language and epithets of "the individual Andrew Jackson," of whom these directors "cannot speak without wounding their own self-respect," of "what is called a cabinet;" and wherein, in the very same paragraph, they place the President of the United States alongside of, and upon a level with, the criminal counterfeiters of their notes!

Mr. President, I shall proceed, in hastening to a conclusion, to answer an argument enforced by our adversaries, and which they allege presents one general objection, covering the whole ground, to that Executive measure which ordered the removal of the depositories for the purpose of checking the abuses of the bank, and necessarily preparatory to the approaching termination of its charter. They contend, with one voice, that in any event the proceeding by scire facias ought to have been resorted to by the President, thereby giving to the bank the right of judicial inquiry, and the trial by jury. No one can hold in more sacred regard than I do, that constitutional right of the trial by jury, and I would at once admit the conclusive force of the position, if that judicial proceeding had been at all adapted to the case, or the fit and effectual remedy for the mischiefs complained of. But it was not, and could not be, the proper corrective. I shall repel the argument, by taking two views of the subject. First, let us suppose that a scire facias had been ordered, returnable to the fall session of '33 of the circuit court in the eastern district of Pennsylvania. Does it not immediately strike every one acquainted with the tedious and slow progress of judicial proceedings, that the pleadings, preparation of evidence, trial, and the decision in a momentous cause upon a final writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States, would at least produce that delay which would carry you to the end of the session of that court, in the winter of 1835-6—and before that, the charter would have fallen by its own limitation. If a scire facias had even issued, either by the direction of Congress, or the order of the President, the removal of the depositories must inevitably and immediately have followed. If that process had issued, and the solemn judicial proceeding had been pending upon the avowed belief that the charter was forfeited, would you have continued with the bank the possession of the public money? Would not the order of removal have been simultaneous with, and justified by, the order of the scire facias? What would have been the distrust, embarrassments, and disorders, if that grave and alarming proceeding had been adopted? In such case, would not the bank, and the Government too, be obliged to prepare for a decision against the corporation? And would not that have been made an excuse for curtailments, and the infliction of distress, to coerce a discontinuance, as they now in that way seek a restoration? A scire facias, followed by a judgment of forfeiture, would have been an abrupt termination of their charter, and the business of the bank; whilst the removal of the depositories, adopting the milder course, simply checks its abuses, and suffers it to go on, with the credit of its issues unimpaired, to the end of its time. But I take the other view of the subject.

The scire facias is authorized by the last section of the charter of the bank, which enacts that Congress, or the President, may direct that writ to issue, in case either shall believe "the provisions of the charter to have been violated." It is, therefore, the statute and proper remedy only in one particular class of cases—those which arise out of "a violation of the provisions of the charter," and which would bring down upon the institution a judgment of forfeiture. But, it is not the remedy, and it would be useless to resort to it, in very many instances of grave and deep import to the interests of the people, the commerce and business of the nation. Upon these, they might inflict aggravated and lasting injuries and distress, without transcending the limits or violating the provisions of their charter by corruptly, oppressively, and partially carrying their vast banking powers and pecuniary influence to their utmost limits. I might particularize many serious public mischiefs demanding the prompt and energetic interference of the Executive, which could not be reached by the process of scire facias. For instance—bringing the influence of their money to bear upon the politics of the country; securing to themselves an unjust monopoly; a wanton pressure upon State banks, thereby crippling the commercial community, and rendering the public debtors less able to pay their Government; a vexatious curtailment of loans, with an increase of the public depositories; the case referred to by Mr. Crawford in his letter of the 30th of May, 1823; the entire disruption of the domestic exchanges, on an oppressive system of gain and exaction, as protested against by the same Secretary in his letter of the 3d of July, 1817; with many other commercial emergencies, or financial exigencies which might be represented; in all which the bank would laugh at, and defy the process of scire facias, whilst the interference of the Treasury Department, if it did not humble and bring them to terms, would, at all events, lessen and check their power to do mischief. I will content myself with one other case to fortify my position. Suppose the Bank of the United States (and the supposition would not have been extravagant upon one or two occasions in its history) to be notoriously insolvent, or to refuse specie payments; neither circumstance would be a forfeiture of its charter, nor a ground for a writ of scire facias, and in neither case could the Secretary of the Treasury refuse to take its notes in payment of debts due to the Government; yet, who would say that under the power of this 16th section he ought not to remove the public depositories?

The restoration of the depositories is the great and ultimate object of the Bank of the United States. Must it be gratified. For myself, I answer, No! For I am unwilling to yield to measures of coercion preferred by the bank to the experiment of reason and negotiation. Restoration is but another name for dominion: restore, and the bank rules now and forever—restore, and by the same means it must obtain a recharter upon its own terms—a perpetuity of its monopoly. How does it happen that the re-possession of the depositories is the only remedy proposed? Will nothing else appease? Restore, and the bank will not relax. It must still pursue some course of oppression to retain possession, and secure the great and vital object at which its ambition ultimately aims. And is it possible that our country, which we so continually extol as the most happy, abundant, and prosperous on earth, must rely, for a continuance of its blessings, upon the restoration of the depositories, and the will of the Bank of the United States! Can we not, to preserve our independence, turn upon our own resources, our own industry, enterprise, and commercial capital, strengthened by State bank facilities, and supported by a cordial disposition to co-operate on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury? I am very willing frankly to confess, that I believe there are many with whom the original question is now changed; for, let me, for the sake of the argument, yield for the moment, that it was not expedient on the 1st of October last to have removed the depositories, yet, as the measure has been fairly and honorably executed, and an experiment made, which could not be very long postponed, the question is now changed, and presents itself in a new aspect. To return the depositories now, would be to add to the present distresses; for, you would thereby throw the State banks into disorders and embarrass their borrowers.

And, certainly, before very long, you would have to commence measures again to take them from the Bank of the United States—because there is no presumption of its being able to obtain a renewal of its charter. Satisfy me of that fact, and I will, at any moment, vote for a restoration of the public money. This state of uncertainty is oppressive upon the local banks, and paralyzes their means of usefulness. Speaking for myself, and without undertaking to judge for others, I cannot view the question in any light, with those who vote for a restoration, than as a question of charter or no charter. To my mind, there is no escaping from the position. Yes: let me correct myself. There may be one asylum to which gentlemen can fly—emigration! Let them emigrate—not to "the ancient dominion," but to modern Virginia, where the descendants of a race of noble ancestors have made the wonderful political discovery, that of all banks in the world, in which to deposit the people's money, an unconstitutional bank is the best—a bank, according to their political scruples, having on legal existence—a mere nonentity. Why should gentlemen order a restoration, which must be temporary, unless they mean finally to vote for a continuance of the deposits?

Let Senators, let impartial men, take up the prominent acts of the board of directors for the last two years, and decide the question, whether it is possible to continue the relation of principal and agent between the bank and the Government of the United States, with any hope of harmony and utility to the country. Commence with the presentation of their memorial to Congress, in 1831-2; the interference which immediately succeeded in the politics and elections of the country; their deceptive conduct in reference to the postponement of the instalment of the three per cent. stock in 1832; the damages claimed on the French bill; the expulsion from the board (it can be called by no other name) of the public directors, and of Mr. McAllister, a high-minded director, chosen by the stockholders themselves; their disregard of the justice and gratitude of the nation, manifested by their withholding the books and funds appropriated for the payment of a public debt due to the surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution; their infliction of unnecessary distress upon the commercial community; the public insult thrown upon the American people by the language and epithets applied to their Chief Magistrate and his cabinet, in the bank report laid upon our tables.

Take all these into consideration, and they evince a spirit of hostility so unjust as to leave no room to doubt on which side the nation will throw itself; and that upon the bank, the wanton aggressor in the conflict, will fall a judgment of universal condemnation.

Sir, I give way to no political despondency. I do not agree that we are either "in the midst of a revolution," or at all approximating to one. Our constitution and political institutions are all safe, for public sentiment is sound and the people uncorrupted. Executive usurpation is much talked of by those out of power, but never dreamed of by him upon whom the charge is so groundlessly made. The assertion of bank superiority, and the attempt at bank control, may produce distress for a time upon an innocent community, but when that institution arrogantly attempts to swell itself up to the importance of one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and aims to check the proper action of any of the Executive departments, it only evinces its own feebleness, and will sink under the derision of the whole nation. Mr. Ingham, in a correspondence with the bank in 1829, well said, "The bank cannot avoid the action of the Government in all its legitimate operations and policy, however disposed it might be, after calculating the immensity of its coffers and the expansion of its power, to assert authority, a superiority, or insensibility to such action. The pretension could only excite a smile. Compared to the Government the bank is essentially insignificant." The sentiment is a noble and patriotic one. And I call upon the people, in the name of their sacred institutions, to carry out the elevated sentiment—to resist this "expansion of power," and this "insensibility" on the part of the bank to the wants and the comforts of the community. I call upon the country to recollect that the bank is a mere corporation, one of the implied means, simply, convenient to carrying on the fiscal concerns of the Government; not one of the great ends for which our Government was formed—not indispensably necessary—nor to be tolerated because she may think herself indispensably requisite to the operations of the Government. I call upon Congress, sustained by public sentiment, to drive back this usurping institution within its legitimate sphere of banking and fiscal agency. Let it recede within the limits designated by the spirit of its charter. Let it cease its attempts to transcend all authority—abandon its vain and mistaken efforts to conquer and to rule. Let it so conduct itself, and it may check the popular tide which is now setting so strongly against it, and find favor in the eyes of future legislation.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

VIRGINIA MEMORIAL.

Mr. TYLER rose to present a memorial from the city of Richmond, signed by nearly nine hundred of the citizens, and certain resolutions adopted by the people of Franklin county, in the State of Virginia. In regard to the memorial, he would say, that it would be borne in mind by the Senate, that he had rarely, very rarely, been called upon, since he had been a member of the Senate, to perform a duty similar to that which he was then in the act of performing. The people of the State which he represented, in part, on this floor, were content, under ordinary circumstances, to leave the expression of their sentiments to be made by those who represented them and their interests in this House and the other; and their departure from that course, on the present occasion, bore to Senators the strongest possible evidence of the great agitation of the public mind. The memorial was signed by persons of all employments and pursuits, and presented an array of names which would compare, for intelligence and the attributes of high moral character, with any similar number from any city or town in the Union. They remonstrated against the late proceedings of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, as involving high assumptions of power. Reared, from early infancy, in the belief that, in order to preserve liberty from overthrow, it was necessary to keep the three departments of Government separate and distinct, they regard with alarm the late measures of the President, as drawing within the vortex of Executive power, judicial and legislative functions, and, in the forfeiture pronounced of a most valuable franchise, or privilege, of that corporation, which had been solemnly ratified to it by charter stipulation, and for which it had paid, they recognise a breach of public faith and violation of individual rights in the persons of the corporators. Mr. T. said, that while he concurred with the memorialists most fully in their views, he should abstain from going into their consideration now, as he proposed, should his health permit and the Senate so please, to express his opinions more at large upon them after the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] should finish the speech which he had commenced. The memorialists also represented that a deep gloom rested on their city and hung over the country; that commercial enterprise and manufacturing industry, deprived of their proper aliment, were stagnated; that all the pursuits of life were paralyzed; that, in consequence thereof, the great staples of production, tobacco and flour, had each fallen twenty per cent. within the last sixty days; that exchanges had fallen from eight to thirteen per cent. in the same period, and as an evidence, that no accidental circumstance of trade had produced this state of things, but that all depended on the condition of the money market, that every day and every hour brought with it its fluctuations. The memorialists saw no glimmering of light through the gloom, but anticipated a darker night yet to come than that which enshrouded them. They looked to Congress for relief. They ask not, said Mr. T., a renewal of the bank charter. No, sir, they implore that a stable system may be introduced. Not one resting on Executive will—not a Treasury resting on agents appointed by the Executive, liable to be displaced at his pleasure—holding their existence but at the breath of his nostrils—fleeting and ephemeral as whim, or caprice, or passion, or political motives might make them: but resting on law—permanent, enduring law—law not to be changed but for high reasons of state policy, approved by the wisdom, and sanctioned by the experience of Congress. To a measure of that character do they look for the restoration of public confidence; and to such measure alone can they look, or can the country look. These were the views, and, he must say, the sound views, of the memorialists. If any man believed that this memorial came here borne on party or partisan principles or motives, he did great injustice to the cause of truth. Men had signed it who would as proudly scorn such imputations as he would do, was a similar ascription made to himself, for any part of his course here. No, sir, (said Mr. T.,) these men speak forth their sentiments as freemen—as the supporters of free Government—and he trusted that, at all times, no matter who might fill the Presidential chair, they would never be backward in expressing their apprehensions for public liberty when it should be brought in danger. Nor, let any man believe that their statements in regard to the pressure upon them was not to be relied on. That pressure was real; if any thing, other than the memorial, were necessary to satisfy the Senate of that, he would read a sentence from the letter of the gentleman who forwarded the memorial. To those who knew him, it was only necessary to mention the name of Thomas Rutherford, to ensure it the reception and confidence he asked for. He would say, that there existed no man within the wide limits of the Union more entitled to confidence and respect. This is his language: "I can assure you, my dear sir, on whatever of honor or judgment I possess, that the evils growing out of the removal of the deposits are daily increasing; and that all men, except those who, from the possession of funds which may enable them to take advantage of the distresses of their neighbors, look to the future with horror, unless an immediate remedy shall be applied." Before I take my seat, (said Mr. T.,) I ask to be indulged in one or two remarks. The call has frequently been made on the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WABSTER,] standing at the head of the Committee on Finance, of which he (Mr. T.) was a member, for a scheme of Treasury agency. For his part, he could see no propriety for that call, until the sense of the Senate should be fully expressed on the resolutions pending before it. If the Executive were sustained in the power it had exerted over the subject, then Congress had nothing to do with it. The great question before the country was, whether the President or Congress had a right to establish a Treasury agency. The President had done so: and if it was decided that he had done so with full power and authority, that decision was decisive of the question as to the Legislative authority. The Executive authority was, in that event, co-extensive with the whole subject, and the legislature would encroach upon his power, if it acted at all. For his part, he believed that the President had invaded the legislative functions in a vital point—that he had grasped the purse; and he was happy to find that he was that morning sustained by the memorial from Richmond, and the resolutions from Franklin Lowland and highland seemed to be united. The voice from the first had been reverberated by the mountains of the last, and he trusted that the sound of that reverberation would not cease until the whole country should be roused into a knowledge of the great principles at issue.

Mr. T. concluded by moving that the memorial and resolutions be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; which was accordingly done.

KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BIBB rose and said, that, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of Kentucky, he had received two resolutions of that body, the one expressive of their sense of the dangerous power exercised by the President of the United States, in withdrawing the public moneys from the places of safe deposit appointed by law, into certain State banks, selected by mere executive will; the other, touching the frequency and manner in which he has exercised the power of the veto, and of withholding bills passed by both Houses of Congress.

It is a duty incumbent on me, said Mr. B., as one of the Senators of Kentucky, at all times, to treat with the most respectful consideration any expression of either branch of the legislature of that State, of their sentiments upon the administration of the affairs of the Federal Government. And, in this instance, I take pleasure in presenting these resolutions. I have ever been one of that class of politicians included under the denomination of "State Right Republicans." That great body of republicans have looked with fearful apprehension to the gradual encroachments of the Federal Government upon the rights and powers not delegated, but reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people. They have viewed, with deep concern, the tendency of the powers delegated, as well as of those taken by the far-fetched constructions from the mass of undelegated and reserved powers, to the accumulation of inordinate powers in the chief Executive of the United States. But too many examples are to be found in the annals of the Federal Government since the adoption of the present constitution, to justify those fears, to prove to demonstration, that such apprehensions were not the baseless visions of a dream. And, amongst these examples, the acts of the Executive in removing the Treasury deposits from the places appointed by law, to places selected by mere Executive will, and upon Presidential "responsibility," together with the arguments offered in justification, deserve the gravest consideration. The regularly-organized deliberative assemblies of the legislatures of the States, based upon the suffrages of the people, having themselves the power of taxation, and of officering the militia, are proper sentinels to watch against federal encroachments, and effective checks, in the last resort, to prevent the Government of the United States from wandering from the sphere of delegated and distributed powers. When these regularly-constituted bodies interfere by way of remonstrance, and for the purpose of setting bounds to executive power, their voices are to be hailed as auspicious to civil liberty. The love of power needs no excitement. Men are but too prone to grasp at, and usurp powers; they stand in need of effectual control to keep them within the pale of permitted powers, and to compel the prudent and discreet exercise of such as are properly and necessarily delegated. The House of Representatives of Kentucky consists of one hundred members, elected annually, according to a ratio of representation founded on an actual enumeration taken periodically, as provided by the State constitution and laws. The members of this branch of the legislature were elected in August last. The legislature commenced its session on the last day of December. The removal of the deposits had been made, and became the subject of discussion among the people long before the members left their respective counties for assembling at the seat of Government. The resolves of this branch of the legislature, so made, is entitled to respect, as the deliberate sense of the representatives of the people, after full opportunity of communing with their constituents.

Mr. B. moved that the resolutions be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; and the motion was agreed to.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, the Senate took up the motion to print 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, made yesterday, on the Message of the President of the United States relative to the agency of the Bank of the United States for the payment of pensions.

Mr. CALHOUN called for the reading of the report, and it was read accordingly; the reading occupied an hour and five minutes.

The reading having been concluded—

Mr. MORRIS said, he had no objection to the printing of the additional number of copies of the report, as moved by the gentleman from North Carolina, but he thought it desirable that, in ordering the printing, the Senate should take care that the whole subject-matter was sent to the people. With this view he moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, by inserting an order for the printing of the same number of copies of the President's message, and the opinion of the Attorney General on the subject, to be appended to the report.

On the suggestion of Mr. WEBSTER and Mr. BIBB, who expressed their entire willingness to adopt the amendment, the motion was so extended as to embrace the whole of the documents which had been sent in with the message of the President.

The amendment was then agreed to, nemine dissente; and the motion was then adopted.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Mr. CLAY's resolutions relative to the removal of the deposites; when

Mr. WILKINS resumed his observations in defence of the removal, as given entire in preceding pages.

Mr. MANGUM, adverting to the thinness of the Senate, owing to the attendance of members who had been invited to attend a solemn ceremony, in consequence of the death of Mr. WIAH, moved that the Senate now adjourn. The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

PENNSYLVANIA PETITIONS.

After the usual morning business had been disposed of—

Mr. McKEAN said, he had received the proceedings of two public meetings of citizens of Pennsylvania, both said to be large and respectable; one held at the town of Erie, in the extreme west, and the other at Germantown, in the extreme east of the State, maintaining directly opposite sentiments in reference to the same topics which now agitate the public mind. He regretted to say that there were, as he conceived, unguarded expressions contained in the proceedings of both meetings, which did not meet his approbation, and which he wished had been omitted. But this, he hoped, would be overlooked, as being peculiar to the present state of public excitement, as he was unwilling to believe that any of his constituents would deliberately use offensive or disrespectful language. It was, however, his desire, with the permission of the Senate, to present both proceedings at the same time, and ask for their separate reading, which would enable the Senate the better to judge of their further disposition.

Mr. KING rose, and expressed the reluctance which he felt to say any thing in opposition to the reception of memorials from any portion of the people, but he considered the character of both these memorials as so exceptional, that the Senate owed it to their own dignity, and the preservation of their own character, not merely to refuse to give the usual direction to them, but to lay them on the table, where they might be subjected to the indignant frowns of every friend of good order. If the Senate should suffer themselves to be approached in this way, with denunciations of individual members of the body, and casting unqualified censure on the officers of the Government, he wished to know what we were to expect to come to. It was required of gentlemen, when they presented petitions, to state the substance of the memorials, in order that it might appear if they were of a character proper to be received. If they contained expressions calculated to wound individual Senators, or to deceive the public mind, they ought not to be received. That was the reason for the prefatory statement of the substance of memorials. He regretted that his friend from Pennsylvania should have thought it proper to present these petitions. He objected not to receive any petitions which were couched in decent and respectful expressions. It was proper that such should be received. The ears of the Senate ought to be open to the voice of the people. But, when they were suffered to approach this body with the language of abuse and calumny, the Senate would speedily retain no other character than that of a body through which electioneering, denunciatory pamphlets, might be sent abroad, the effect of which would be to unsettle the tranquillity of the country.

He believed that no Senator could conscientiously say, that he believed these memorials ought to be received. He did not wish to make any discrimination between the two. Considering them both as highly exceptional, he moved to lay them on the table, without any intention that they should ever again be disturbed.

The motion was withdrawn, at the request of

Mr. McKEAN, who desired to say, that he felt no particular anxiety about the disposition which might be made of these petitions. He had not presented them without consultation with his colleague, and he had done his duty in bringing the petitions before the Senate. On presenting them, he had stated that they contained expressions which he disapproved. Having done his duty, he should be satisfied that the Senate should dispose of the petitions. He could not approve of expressions of this character addressed to this body, and he hoped he should hear no more of such. He was willing that the gentleman from Alabama should renew his motion.

Mr. KING then moved that the petitions should not be received.

Mr. CALHOUN: I second the motion.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that the expressions contained in the memorials which had just been read were certainly in very bad taste; but he did not know whether the Senate of the United States ought to take upon itself to say in what terms the people should express themselves either to this body or any other constituted body. He could not approve of the course pointed out by the Senator from Alabama, not to receive these memorials, because it would be setting, in his (Mr. F.'s) judgment, a bad precedent. How easy would it be for honorable Senators to find exceptional words or phrases in many of the petitions and memorials that are presented to the Senate, and consequently there would be no great difficulty in getting rid of them altogether. He would again repeat, that the memorials presented by the honorable Senator [Mr. McKEAN] are in very bad taste. He was sorry to see such language coming from any portion of the people of the United States, but still the Senate was bound to receive these sentiments; let them emanate from their political friends or enemies, it was perfectly unimportant. He hoped the honorable gentleman from Alabama would not press his motion, but suffer the petitions to lie on the table.

Mr. SPRAGUE rose to express his concurrence in the views of the gentleman who had last addressed the Senate. There were expressions in these petitions which, he had no doubt, were unacceptable to all. But, in times when the people were suffering great distress, and when their apprehensions in regard to the future were still more gloomy, he would not, as a member of this body, refuse to hear any language in which they might think proper to express their feelings to us. The right of petition was not a mere matter of form; but the people had a perfect right, as the sovereign, to use their own language, and the Senate were bound to listen to that language. The expressions in the first of these memorials, were certainly most disrespectful to the Senate; they called this body an aristocratic Senate. The Senate could not prevent such expressions of public opinion, by closing their ears against them; and if the people, in any quarter, had been taught to view the Senate as an aristocratic body, destined to be fatal to the liberties of the country, let the Senate listen to their voice.

[SENATE.]

This was not the first time that the Senate had been struck at. It was not the first time that they had been told that the Senate was to be prostrated. They could not ward off the blow by refusing to listen to such language. He would, therefore, receive the petitions. As to printing them, as that was done merely for their own convenience, and the memorialists had nothing to do with it, and had no rights involved in the question, he would not agree to it. It might not be deemed proper to send them to a committee. But the memorialists had an unquestionable right to send hither their sentiments, and Congress was bound to receive them. As to the expressions in the Germantown petition, aimed at the presiding officer of the Senate, all must regret that they should have found a place in the petition. And, as a member of the Senate, he would go further to repel any such language, when addressed against the presiding officer, than if it were addressed to a member; because the President of the Senate had no voice in the Senate. Still he considered that the Senate was bound to receive petitions, whatever might be the subsequent disposition of them.

Mr. MANGUM said that he perfectly concurred in the sentiments which had been generally expressed relative to these memorials. He thought it would be an extremely unjust proceeding on the part of the Senate to refuse to receive them on account of the language employed therein, inasmuch as there was no rule laid down by the Senate by which it could judge as to the exact language that ought to be employed in petitions and memorials. With regard to what had been said in the first memorial, he could not at all approve the language. But there was one view of this case which deserved to be noticed. He believed that, in every civilized country in Christendom, the court language is considered as the standard of purity, and has a tendency to regulate the style of society. And he intimated that the language of the memorials, taking this view of the subject, must be regarded as having reached the highest degree of perfection. He did not desire the printing of the memorials, but he thought that they ought to be received.

Mr. KING said a few words in explanation. He resisted the opinions of the gentleman from Maine, and from North Carolina, that the Senate ought to receive the petitions, be their language what it might. He could not consent that the Senate should be compelled to sit here and listen to calumnies levelled at individual members of the body. As to court language, he wished to know what was meant by the Senator from North Carolina. That Senator seemed to be peculiarly sensitive on the subject of something which had reached his ears. These memorials, however, ought not to be tolerated here, on account of the disrespectful terms in which they were couched. This was admitted; yet the gentleman from North Carolina said that this was the court language, and therefore the Senate had no right to refuse to receive it.

Mr. K. moved to lay the petitions on the table, but again withdrew his motion.

Mr. SMITH desired to say but a word or two on the subject. It is the undoubted right of every American citizen to address Congress, and to make known his wants and complaints to it. This right could be fully enjoyed by addressing the Senate in respectful language. He would observe the same rule in this case as applied to our courts of justice. The right of every citizen in this country is secured to him, to appeal to our courts for a redress of his grievances. But (said Mr. S.) suppose a petition is addressed to the chancellor, couched in scurrilous and disrespectful language, will the chancellor hear it until it is purged of such offensive language? Certainly he will not. We all recollect instances of the kind. I recollect one: that of a petition being addressed to the chancellor, who referred it to the master to expunge the exceptionable matter, and the chancellor went so far as to say that if he saw another instance of the kind, he would direct inquiry to be made who was the draughtsman. He (Mr. S.) in conclusion, said that he thought that if the petition was received it ought to be laid upon the table.

Mr. BIBB observed that it was the duty of those who petitioned for a redress of grievances to couch their memorials in respectful language. It was a course pointed out by a proper regard to their own dignity, and was a respect due to Congress. He admitted that the people were entitled to the right of petition and remonstrance, but he must say that they had no right to abuse this body by using degrading and disgraceful language towards it. The right of petition and remonstrance was secured to the community; but there was no law abridging the liberty of speech or of the press. He would ask, however, if it followed that Congress was bound to receive most offensive and disgraceful language? Was there not a rule of self-preservation which it ought to exercise to protect itself against calumny? He conceived there was, and that it was the duty of the Senate to put it into effect—it being due to its own honor and self-respect. He (Mr. B.) was of opinion that the people's respect for truth, for justice, and for integrity, followed in a very considerable degree from the examples that were set them by those in power; and he wished that this matter was understood a little better elsewhere. He liked not the preacher who tells his congregation to do as he says, but not as he does. He (Mr. B.) would repeat, that all petitions to a legislative body ought to be couched in decent language. Many rules had been adopted by legislative bodies, requiring that the members presenting petitions should vouch to the House that they were couched in respectful terms. There are two rules on this subject; but he confessed himself inclined to adopt such a rule as would preserve the Senate in its just rights, and not infringe on the rights of petitioners, and that was this, to refer all memorials of a like character to those which had been presented this morning, to an officer or a committee of the Senate, in order that they might expunge from them all objectionable language before they should be presented. If he could have referred these memorials to such a committee, he would have done so.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he would add a few remarks to what had already been said, on the proceedings of the two public meetings in Pennsylvania, now before the Senate. The right of petition and remonstrance, he said, had been secured to the people of the United States by the constitution; but the precise wording in which such papers should be drawn out had not been defined by any settled rules, and was perhaps not susceptible of clear and satisfactory definition. But, in general, it was expected that they should contain no expression disrespectful to the body to whom they were addressed. On this subject he was as sensitive as any honorable gentleman of this body, and would go as far to condemn, or repress, any vituperative language applied to the Senate, or any one of its members. He thought the resolutions passed at both those meetings censurable, on account of the coarse language in which they were couched, and the imputations cast upon the body, and particular members of the body, to whose consideration they were addressed. But, said he, the people of Erie county, who composed the meeting assembled in that remote part of the country, may find an apology, if not a justifiable one, for the language which they thought fit to adopt, in the examples furnished them of expressions even more coarse and offensive, with which our ears have been astounded within these walls, coming from a Senator within his seat, while discussing a grave question of national policy. One of the series of resolutions which have been read to us, refers to a past political event: the rejection, by the Senate, of a nomination to an office of high trust and responsibility. That rejection is censured by the good people of Erie, and the Senate characterized as an aristocratic body. Are they to be condemned for the freedom with which they have spoken on this matter? If so, have we not ourselves given a license to this, or any other virtuperative epithet which may be applied to us by any portion of the people who do not possess full information of the grounds on which we rely for the justification of our measures? Sir, (said Mr. P.,) the error lies at our own doors; let us correct it, and we shall not be offended by its echo from the borders of the Republic, in the ill-judged fulminations of primary conventions of the people. Have we not been told in open debate, by a member of the Senate, heedless of the decorum which ought to be observed in a deliberate body, speaking of the same political event referred to in these resolutions, that the rejection of a nomination to office, by the Senate, was a passport to the confidence and affections of the people? That the censure of the Senate had long since ceased to be a reproach to any man in the nation? Yes, sir, we have heard all this, and much more equally indecorous language, from a member of our own body, and we have permitted it to pass without rebuke, or any notice whatever. We have quietly submitted to these foul imputations on the honor and dignity of the Senate. They have gone forth to the public under our sanction, and shall we complain when they are sent back to us by the people who received them through the medium of the public prints, as the record of debates uttered on this floor? He wished not to be understood as approving the language or import of the resolutions; they were highly disrespectful to the Senate and ought therefore to be marked with our disapprobation. But let us begin the work of reformation at home. Let the Senators treat themselves with respect, and they may then command the respect of the people. Nothing can be more natural than what has occurred. When we particularly listen to calumny and detraction on ourselves, from a member in his place, and tamely submit to it, the citizens of Erie have, at most, committed an innocent mistake, in returning to us phrases with which our ears have become familiar. But we have on our file a petition sent to us under the solemnity of an Executive message, more grossly offensive than any thing to be found in these proceedings of the public meetings in Pennsylvania. The President had, a few years past, nominated a person to fill a land office in one of the districts for the sales of the public lands, and the Senate refused to advise and consent to the nomination. The same individual was subsequently re-nominated for the same office, by a special communication from the President, and by way of inducement to a reconsideration of the former rejection, we were favored with a petition, signed by about two hundred persons, in favor of the nominee, which among other things, charged the Senate with having committed a gross, palpable, and corrupt violation of the constitution. This is an example of executive courtesy to his constitutional advisers, worthy to be imitated by his worshippers. That petition, sir, was read and considered, and is now on the files of the Senate. With the imposing precedent before us, we might surely excuse the mistake into which a portion of our fellow-citizens have fallen. Mr. P. thought, upon a review of the transaction, that it would be better to treat this error with mildness, and not, as had been suggested by his honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BRAN,] deny those people a hearing, and refuse their resolutions a resting place on our table. In these times, when arbitrary power is stretching forth its arm, and prostrating all the safeguards around the liberties of the people, he was not disposed to follow the illustrious example of the chieftain who wields the sceptre, but he would prefer to err, if at all, in the opposite extreme, by giving free scope to the expression of the popular feeling, in whatever terms, it may be conveyed. Mr. P. said he regretted the reference which had been made by the respectable and intelligent citizens of Germantown, to a particular member of the Senate, and to its presiding officer. But, in this free country, gentlemen could not expect to get along without an occasional hit, on one side or on the other. For himself, he felt unscathed, his "withers were unwrung," and whatever might be the sensibility of other honorable gentlemen on the occasion, he was disposed rather to smile at the apparent indecorum of the resolutions, than to manifest a spirit of resentment, by treating the subject too seriously, and thereby imparting to it an importance which it did not seem to merit. He concluded, by expressing his willingness to refer the resolutions to the appropriate committee, as it might give greater satisfaction to those who had adopted them, and assuredly could do injury to no one.

Mr. KING then renewed his motion, and the petitions were laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Mr. CLAY's resolutions, &c.; when Mr. WILKINS resumed and concluded his remarks, as given in preceding pages.

Mr. TYLER moved that the Senate adjourn, but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. CLAY, who, with a view to facilitate the transaction of business, and the economy of time, desired to make a proposition to the Senate. Like the currency of the country, he said, the business of the Senate had become a good deal deranged; and he presumed that the Chair would be as much gratified by the removal of the deposits on his table as the President was when he removed the deposits from the United States Bank. There were also several memorials to be presented, of which he had some. There was Executive business unfinished, and it was also probable that sundry members would be desirous to pay respect to the memory of a distinguished citizen, by attending his funeral at noon to-morrow. Under all these circumstances, he moved to postpone this subject until Monday next, and to make it the special order for that day.

Mr. TYLER concurred in the motion, stating that his health was not in a good state, and that he should be gratified to have the residue of the week to repair it.

Mr. CHAMBERS suggested, that when this subject was removed out of the way, the French spoliation bill would be the next special order, and would take precedence of other business, unless that also was postponed.

Mr. MANGUM moved to postpone that subject also, and to make it the special order for Monday week.

Mr. CHAMBERS assented, but gave notice that he should, on that day, move to postpone any other business which might obstruct the taking up of that bill.

The motion was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill to repeal the force act was postponed until Monday fortnight, and made the special order for that day.

Mr. CLAY then rose and presented the memorial of the citizens of New York, praying for delay in the payment of the revenue bonds. This memorial, Mr. C. said, was from the merchants of New York, and its object was to obtain a law prolonging the payment of the revenue bonds—a subject which had not yet been disposed of. The memorialists ascribed the distress in part to the act of July, 1832; to the change from credit to specie payments and begged that a credit might be extended to them for the debts to the revenue which still remained due. They also prayed for a graduated scale of payments, as to time. He must say, he had no wish to see much change in the manner of collecting the duties on imports; but, so far as relief could be afforded to those who had given bonds which remained yet uncollected, he thought it ought to be afforded. The other day it had been said, that the relief would be but partial, while the distress was general. Well, if this were true—if the relief was not equal to the whole distress—it was no reason that Congress should not extend the proposed assistance. If Congress could not remove the total amount of distress, it could do so in part—it might extend relief as far as it was able. Such a measure would not be without example. In 1821, when great distress had been produced by speculations in land, the same steps had been taken as were alluded to in the present memorial. At the period of distress to which he had alluded, all were agreed that relief ought to be extended. What was the relief granted upon that occasion? Why, firstly, to those who had purchased land, a remission of the arrears of interest; then a division of their debts into instalments; and, finally, (what was still better,) $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the whole debt was relinquished, on condition of the money being paid at a certain time. Well, on the present occasion, the Government debtors were distressed—perhaps unable to pay. The example to which he had referred, suggested what ought to be done. He did not think the principle of credit instead of cash payments, a right one; and, therefore, he was opposed to any radical change: but, if they found any portion of their debtors embarrassed, and this embarrassment resulting from an act of the Executive, they were bound to afford relief, to the greatest possible extent. This distress was contemporaneous with the want of confidence which had been produced by the late measures. The credit of the country had been completely destroyed.

The honorable Senator from Georgia had felicitated himself too soon upon the prosperous state of the South. Let him ask his (Mr. C.'s) friends to read the letters which they were daily receiving from the South. Let him look to those letters, and he would find that the exemption from distress which he had mentioned was but temporary. In this state of things, it did seem to him (Mr. C.) that if the state of the Treasury would permit it, relief ought to be afforded in the present case. It might be that the late monetary mutations had incapacitated the Treasury from granting this necessary assistance to the merchants. If, however, all the money which had been deposited in the selected banks were forthcoming when required, there could be no difficulty. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] had said that the distress was only temporary; if this were true, only a temporary remedy was needed. He (Mr. C.) could see no propriety in Congress refusing to do what was in its power because it was unable to accomplish all that was wanted. What would they think of a physician going into an hospital and refusing to prescribe for, or alleviate the sufferings of a patient, because he could not instantly and entirely eradicate the disease? But there was another point which should be looked at, although it was simply a financial one. If their bonds were paid up, the money would go at once into the banks, and those banks would get the interest; but if the prayer of the memorialists was granted, and the payment of the debt, with interest, postponed upon proper security, the interest would go into the coffers of the Government. Mr. C. concluded by moving the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Finance. The reference was agreed to.

A resolution offered by Mr. WEBSTER, instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into the effect of the removal of the deposits on the public revenue, was, on motion of Mr. SILSBEE, in consequence of the absence of Mr. WEBSTER, laid on the table.

The Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20.

The Journal having been read—

Mr. CHAMBERS rose, and said he had been apprized that the House of Representatives had just adjourned for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late Mr. WIRT; and as many of the Senators not only felt it an imperative duty to join in paying the last tribute of respect to the distinguished individual referred to, but were impelled to do so by a deep sense of feeling, the Senate would not probably be full enough to attend to business. He was not aware that it would be necessary for him to make any motion for the postponement of the resolutions or proceedings that might be expected to come up; and he would, therefore, simply content himself with a motion to adjourn. Whereupon, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. SOUTHARD rose and said, he had been charged with three memorials from different parts of the State of New Jersey, which he had been requested to present to the Senate. The first came to him from a committee appointed by the citizens of Trenton and its vicinity, and was signed by 423 names of persons, many of whom were among the most respectable in the State. Two of the committee were well known as having been formerly among the most ardent and active supporters of the present administration, as were also some others on the list. The letter which accompanies the memorial states that the latter expresses the views of the great body of farmers, merchants, mechanics, and working men, of that portion of the State, without distinction of party. To the character of those whose opinions were thus presented to the Senate, Mr. S. was ready to bear full and willing testimony, because he knew most of them well. Many of them were his neighbors and his friends. He knew that the memorialists were capable of correctly estimating the extent of the distress which they described; that they understood its causes, and were as able to decide on the mode and measure of the relief required by the condition of the country, as their representatives on this floor. They spoke the language of intelligent and virtuous freemen, and had a right to claim an attentive and respectful hearing.

The second memorial came from the township of Howell, a part of the county of Monmouth, which is now represented in the State legislature by members who are decided in their support of the present administration; it is signed by about three hundred individuals, of whose characters, standing, and respectability, he was also prepared to speak.

The third memorial was signed by 2,785 of the inhabitants and voters of the county of Burlington, in a different part of the State. It would be well recollected that, some time since, on the occasion of presenting the proceedings of a county meeting, held in the same county, he had ventured to express his opinion that those proceedings contained the sense of the county of Burlington on this great and exciting question. For this, he had been accused, in the very ears of power itself, of deliberate falsehood. Sir, said he, here are the names of a majority of the voters of that county, which is represented by four friends of the administration out of six representatives in the State legislature, three of whom voted for the resolutions instructing their Senators and Representatives in Congress to resist any effort to restore the deposits to the United States Bank. In that county, 4,200 was the highest number of votes which he recollected to have been given at any election; and at the last election, only about 3,500 votes were given. Here, in this memorial, will be found 2,785 names of voters of that county. More than 600 majority is the largest vote which he recollected, and about 1000 majority, upon such a vote as that by which the members who instructed him held their seats. Was he criminal, then, in the representation which he had before made? Shall the people of that county, and the world, be told that he was guilty of deliberate falsehood in his representation of their opinions? And this too, by the very mouth-piece of the Executive whose illegal conduct they disapprove? Is calumnious misrepresentation the fit and appropriate offering, at this day, to the ears of power, by its agents and flatterers?—the selected means, by which light is to be excluded from the only quarter in which relief, to a distressed community, can be promptly afforded?

He must be permitted to say to the Senate, that he knew many of the individuals whose names he now presented. They were, as they professed to be, farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, traders, working men, who understood their rights thoroughly, composing as intelligent and virtuous a community as can be found in any part of the nation—heretofore possessing a healthful prosperity—little inclined to complaints, and not prompt to mingle in party conflicts—such a people as any Senator may be proud to represent. They have not found the effects attributed to the violation of your constitution and laws to be “mere idle fancy,” nor would they permit him to tell them, that they did not understand the causes of their embarrassments, and that they arose from the withdrawal of their accommodations at a bank to an immense amount, yet which they had not intelligence enough to discover for months. Now, sir, would they permit their representative to assure them that the Executive alone had the right and the constitutional power to control the whole finances of the nation—to make experiments upon currency and credit. If such language shall be held to them, it will be not less than 3,000 names to a respectful memorial, which will testify their sense of constitutional principles, and their determinations not to suffer from Executive experiments, and the action of misguided ignorance and passion. They will speak in the tones of freedom—in a voice which will be heard—as one man, save a few exceptions, and they will be few, of those who may be restrained by official considerations, and those whom such an influence and control. Mr. S. said he made these remarks with full knowledge of the memorialists. They present themselves, not to the Executive but to Congress, and ask relief, and, in emphatic capitals, ascribe the power of control over the Treasury to the Legislative and not the Executive branch of the Government. They do not acknowledge that it is an Executive power to regulate the finances and the currency of the country.

Mr. S. then moved that the memorials be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILKINS presented a memorial similar to a number which had been heretofore presented, from a number of the surviving officers of the late war, praying for donations of lands in consideration of their services; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILKINS also presented resolutions adopted by two of the local banks of the city of Pittsburg, complaining of the pecuniary distresses, and deranged currency of that part of the country, which they ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and asking of Congress to interfere to restore them. The first set of these resolutions, Mr. W. said, was adopted by the Bank of Pittsburg, one of the old banks of the State, of great respectability, whose affairs had been conducted with much discretion, and whose credit and standing was undoubted. The other set of resolutions was adopted last winter by a bank which had lately gone into operation. This was also a bank of respectability, standing, and credit. He had also, Mr. W. said, some further resolutions on the same interesting subject, adopted at a recent meeting of certain citizens of Pittsburg. The meeting to which he referred had been composed of gentlemen who were well known to him to be of the first respectability in the State, and who had, in their organization, selected for their officers, men of the first respectability, in the various classes of which the meeting was composed. He moved that the resolutions be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was carried.

MAINE PETITIONS.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the memorial of 646 citizens of the city of Portland, Maine, in relation to the general distress of the country, and the deranged state of the currency.

Mr. S. said, that the memorial sets forth, that the signers, and the community in which they live, are now suffering under great and unexampled pecuniary distress. That there is at present an almost entire prostration of business, and that their prospects for the future, are still more gloomy; and they appeal to the national legislature to afford them some relief from their present suffering, and to avert the threatened danger of still greater injury. They do not undertake to point out in what that relief shall consist, or the mode in which it shall be obtained; but leave it, with confidence, to the wisdom and enlightened patriotism of Congress. They come here to the legislature—they do not go to the Executive—because they do not believe that it belongs to the Executive department of this Government to produce and sustain a sound currency, any more than that it legitimately appertains to it to produce a deranged and unsound currency.

This memorial is signed by all classes of citizens—merchants, mechanics, artisans, and laborers—of all parties; and from personal acquaintance with many of the memorialists, I bear willing and cheerful and decided testimony to their high respectability—to the entire confidence which ought to be reposed in all their statements. And, from the knowledge that I have of those who have transmitted the memorial, and given me their certificate as to the high respectability of those with whom I am personally unacquainted, I am confident in the belief, that all the memorialists are highly respectable.

When the memorial and proceedings of a public meeting held in the city of Portland, were some time since presented to the Senate, I referred to one name in particular. I find I was misunderstood in stating a fact in relation to that individual, and was merely supposed to say that he was one of those citizens who had supported the Chief Magistrate at an early day. I said then, and now wish to be understood, that the gentleman who heads the memorial, was the elector of President and Vice President, who gave the first electoral vote in New England for the present Chief Magistrate. My friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. KILPATRICK,] in presenting a memorial, stated that it embraced all classes, save one—that the office-holders felt no distress, and asked for no relief. I cannot make even that exception, for I find on the memorial at least the name of one office-holder, whose interest in the prosperity of the community at large, or whose sympathy for the sufferings of others, or whose elevated patriotism, induced him to wish the prosperity of his country in preference to the success of party. There are other names, unknown to the Senate, but known to myself to have been the decided friends of the Chief Magistrate.

The distress that has operated on the citizens of Portland, and of which they complain, is a matter above all party consideration. It is an all-pervading and general distress, which they say in this memorial is unexampled, and under that torture they cannot stop to indulge political feelings, or calculate its effects on party prospects.

Accompanying this petition, he had received a letter, signed by several highly respectable gentlemen—he believed they were six in number—in which they set forth that the cause of the general distress was believed to be the removal of the deposits; and that it was only owing to the mutual forbearance exercised by private creditors as well as the banks, that their sufferings had not been of a still more aggravated description. He would state a single fact. The branch bank in that city had actually sustained the local banks in their credit. It had happened frequently, certainly more than once, that there had been runs made on the local banks for specie, which they were unable to meet from their own means, and the branch bank came forward and sustained them by affording means to meet these demands, as well as enable individuals to comply with the claims of their creditors. As evidence of the existence of the distress, he would say that good business notes, of undoubted security, having less than four months to run, were offered at from 2 to 2½ per cent. per month, and that no one could be found to buy even at that rate. And this was a commercial city, where there was the greatest capital, the greatest means, and the greatest business of any place in the State.

He also presented the proceedings at a public meeting at Bangor, in the State of Maine, signed by 300 citizens. If this was a place of less notoriety than Portland, still it was one of great importance, although of recent growth. While the latter was situated on the seaboard, Bangor was in the farthest east, at the head of the navigable waters of the Penobscot. It was second only to Portland in the amount of its business, and had been rapidly approaching even to an equality with that place. Its growth was almost unexampled in New England; and had been equalled only by the progress of a single manufacturing town in Massachusetts. Bangor depended essentially on the lumbering business for its prosperity. It was the centre of a vast territory, containing almost inexhaustible quantities of the best pine timber in the world. These memorialists, without distinction of party, and comprising all classes, declare that the distress which had been pervading the whole country was at length beginning to be felt by them, and that their well-founded apprehensions as to the future are terrific. They were a population as industrious, as enterprising, as energetic and intelligent, as exists in the United States, or in the world. They well understood the sources of their prosperity, the cause of the existing distress, and the nature of the dangers which impended over them. They depended on the products of the earth, but they were products which were the growth of centuries. The crop on which they relied was taken off in winter, and marketed in the spring and summer. Orders which had been received for these products had been now countermanded, and the bright prospects of these memorialists, the expectations of their industry and enterprise, had been at once blasted. A period was rapidly approaching, when, if no change were effected in those parts of the country in whose markets their mercantile property depended, ruin, inevitable ruin, must ensue.

The committee chosen by the meeting were unanimous in the opinion that the pervading danger and distress had arisen from the feud between the President of the United States and the bank; but, from difference of party associations, there was some diversity of opinion as to which of the parties to this controversy was to be censured.

The resolutions adopted by the meeting declare this crisis to be above all party considerations; that, if the bank has conducted faithfully, it was entitled to receive the public deposits; but that, if it had conducted unfaithfully, it was the duty of the President to bring the bank to trial, and, if guilty, to have its charter annulled; that nothing short of the power and ability which are to be found in the national bank can afford a sufficient security for the deposits and a sound currency; and that this power and ability would be vainly looked for in any of the selected State banks; that the constitution never intended that the custody of the public purse should be in the President only, and that arming him with the military power, which was done by the bill of last session, had left but slight memorials of our freedom, independence, and popular sovereignty; that the concentration of such power in the hands of any one man, however patriotic and however pure, must prove dangerous to the public liberty.

The memorial was signed by about 300 citizens, among whom he recognised many names of great respectability, and several of the decided friends of the administration. They say that the general prosperity had been arrested, and that ruin impended over every branch of trade; that whatever doubts might have originally existed as to the cause, these doubts had been removed. They look to Congress to remedy the present evil, and to avert the impending distress. They say that the remedy is to be found in the re-charter of the United States Bank, or in the establishment of such national bank as Congress, in its wisdom, might create. He had thought it to be his duty, in presenting these petitions, to give his testimony to the high character of those who had signed them, so far as he was personally acquainted with them.

Mr. S. moved that the petitions be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

The petitions having been read—

Mr. SHEPLEY rose and said, that very soon after he was called to take a seat in this chamber, he had made a few remarks on the subject of the public distress. He had then borne testimony, that, when he came into the Senate, he was unacquainted with any extraordinary distress then existing in the money market. He had not had occasion to believe, at that day, that he was mistaken in the view which he had presented. He now understood, that, when Congress met, there was no greater distress in the money market in his section of the country, than frequently existed under ordinary circumstances. He wished that it was in his power to believe that the same state of things now existed; but he was now satisfied that it was far otherwise, and that there existed in the money market a distress unparalleled, pervading all classes of the community. It was never his desire to state any thing more than the truth. He had waited during the last eighty days, to understand wherefore it was that, day after day, they were to be told that there was an existing distress, and that this distress was increasing. He thought that he had now obtained so much knowledge, as enabled him to understand the subject. He held in his hand a statement of the condition of the United States Bank on the 1st of this month, which came from a friendly hand, and which he would now beg permission to read to the Senate.

[Here Mr. S. read the monthly statement of the condition of the bank.]

He then went on to say, that, in relation to the deposits in the United States Bank, every experienced banker, as well as every man of good sense, knew that a bank soon became experimentally acquainted with the average of its deposits; and that it was not necessary to retain but a limited amount of specie in the vaults, with a view to meet any rare and extraordinary occasion, because if one dollar was taken out, another was deposited; and thus, what was removed by one depositor, was replaced by another. In this view, he arrived at the conclusion, that it was not necessary for the United States Bank to retain specie to an amount beyond two or three millions, whereas it had now twenty-two millions to meet and fifteen millions to meet it. He had understood that the president of the United States Bank had, on more than one occasion, complained of the accumulation of specie; had at one time transported a quantity to Europe, because there was a surplus in the vaults; and had given it as his opinion, that seven millions of specie was sufficient to meet the greatest circulation of paper. He believed that the president of the bank was correct in this view, and that one dollar in specie was sufficient for an issue of five dollars in paper.

[FEB. 21, 1834.]

He inferred from this view that it was in the power of the bank, on the 1st of February, to circulate twenty millions more of its bills than it had circulated, and without any danger to itself, and the circulation of ten millions would have greatly relieved the country. The bank had sometimes expressed a desire to relieve the country, but what now was its conduct? It had curtailed, instead of extending its accommodations; and what was to be expected in the future? He held in his hand a paper, which spoke the sentiments of the bank to the people. He wished it to be well understood what the people had to expect from this quarter. A few days since, a communication appeared in a newspaper, asking of the United States Bank to extend its loans to the community. There was now another paragraph in the same newspaper, speaking in a somewhat singular tone, and as if by authority, and adopting such language as no one could use who was not in a situation of some power. If the writer had not the power to carry his suggestions into effect, he must have been a very presumptuous man to use such language. He referred to an article in the National Intelligencer, in the form of a communication, which he would now read.

"To the Editors.

"Gentlemen: I read lately in your paper a well-written article, recommending to the bank to come forward, by renewing its regular discounts, to the assistance of the community. What is so desirable, and what the directors of the bank will take pleasure to do, they cannot do, before the stockholders of the pet banks shall meet, and direct those banks to withdraw from being the instruments of subservency to the designs of a mistaken President. When they shall do that, the bank will no doubt go on again with its regular business of discounts for its own profit, which will of course give relief to the pressure, now injuring every kind of business. Stockholders of the pet banks must make the first move, and it is their interest to do it, or take the risk of being bankrupt to the amount of the stock they hold in them. It is their interest to save themselves: and when they shall do that, they will prevent the deposit banks from insolvency—the fate of all, or certainly of a majority of them, if they are so imprudent as to be the agents of an administration that will not take counsel of the wise men of the nation, or those around it, and disdains to listen to the petitions and memorials of merchants, manufacturers, and artificers, only because it has determined to make an experiment whether the fiscal concerns of the Government cannot be performed by State banks—an excuse to justify its determined, rancorous hostility against the United States Bank. To gratify that, war is made against the industry of the country; and, to obtain a victory, it seems to be cared not what a whole people suffers. L."

Mr. S. continued. What did this paper say? It was directed to public opinion, and declared what the bank would do; and that was nothing, until the State banks should be prohibited by their stockholders from receiving the public deposits; thus causing them to be restored to the Bank of the United States. Let this be done, and every thing will go well; distress and anguish will no longer exist. All the evils so loudly complained of will at once be remedied, and confidence and security again prevail. But, if the stockholders of the State banks will not move, so as to prohibit their institution from receiving the deposits, why, then, things must grow worse and worse, the distresses of the country become deeper and deeper, until it ends in absolute ruin. He knew not who were authorized to use the language of this paper, but he believed they spoke from some authority; and that, if they did so speak, it was one which sought to control the councils as well as the finances of the nation. They say that not only deep distress is felt throughout the land, but that, unless the deposits are restored to the Bank of the United States, it will become still deeper. Much as he deplored the existence of distress of any kind, he had rather bear any that might arise from pecuniary causes, than submit to a declaration of the kind given in the paper he had referred to; and he well knew that the people of his State would endure the severest privations, no matter from what causes they might arise, sooner than be dictated to by an authority coming from a moneyed institution.

Mr. SPRAGUE observed that the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. SHEPLEY,] as he presumed, were intended to go to their constituents, who had come before Congress to inform them of the causes which had produced the evils they complained of. He differed with his colleague as to that cause, and had deemed it proper to make known to his constituents his views and opinions. The closing appeal of his colleague was not a little extraordinary: he tells our common constituents that they ought to bear the distresses under which they are laboring, and meet all the dangers which impend, because of an anonymous newspaper communication! He chooses, without evidence, or the shadow of authority, to make the bank responsible for the outpourings of an unknown newspaper scribbler, and then cries out against the bank, and declares that our oppressed and doomed constituents ought patiently to endure all, because of such declarations of the bank. That anonymous writer makes predictions as to the course of the directors, and my colleague asks from what authority this language emanated. He, in his turn, asked him the same question. Did he know from whence it came? and, if he did not, with what semblance of reason or justice could he make the bank responsible for it? Was it to be endured, that, because an unknown irresponsible scribbler in a newspaper chooses to utter sentiments not approved by the gentleman, an answer was to be sent home to his constituents who had respectfully addressed that body, that they had mistaken the cause of their distress; and that they should denounce the bank for the notions of an anonymous writer; and that then these logical assumptions should be very logically followed by the deduction that they are to submit to every evil rather than to suffer the dictation of a moneyed institution? Sir, (said Mr. S.,) I know my constituents too well to believe that they will be willing to receive this as a reply to their memorial, or that they will take these assumptions for the causes of the distress that prevails amongst them. It is in vain to attempt to make the bank responsible for the distress prevailing throughout the country. Recollect that this suffering is of recent origin; that although the bank has existed from 1816 until the present time, distress was never felt, the cry of distress was never heard, until the unhallowed arm of power, in violation of the spirit of the constitution and the laws, struck the blow that has been felt from one end of the Union to the other. And yet, although the blow had been struck, we were told that this institution, under which the country has arrived at an unexampled state of prosperity—that this institution, which was before known and felt only by the blessings it had bestowed, and against which not a murmur of complaint, not a whisper of dissatisfaction, had come to us from any portion of this vast and happy country, is alone responsible for all the misery present and prospective.

Sir, I deeply sympathize with my suffering constituents. I would make any sacrifice to afford them effectual relief. I have jeopardized all that was politically dear to me, to avert the present calamity. Exercising whatever of judgment or prescience I possessed, and firmly believing that the war which the President was waging against the bank would in its progress carry disaster, misery, and ruin, to thousands of my constituents, I did, at every hazard, and from no earthly motive but a high sense of paramount duty, give my voice and my vote for a re-charter of the bank, hoping thereby to terminate the war, and secure the continued and permanent prosperity of the country. The Executive repelled this measure of prevention—suppressed the re-charter by his veto. He has continued his assaults, even to this last unprecedented stretch of power; and now, when its disastrous effects are felt, when memorial after memorial come before Congress, complaining of an unexampled state of calamity and dismay, pointing out the true cause, and asking for relief, they were to be told that it was true, distress existed, but that it was not to be ascribed to the action of the Executive, but to the Bank of the United States. And how did the gentleman attempt to make this out? He made certain statements. I hope they rest upon some better authority than an unknown, anonymous newspaper writer. But, take them as he presents them. The bank owes about thirty millions, and has about ten millions of specie in its vaults, and it is insisted, (said Mr. S.,) that the bank might well increase its debt twenty millions, (although about to wind up,) because, in a former opinion of the president of the bank, that, with five millions of specie, they could safely owe a debt to a certain extent. What! because when in a time of profound peace with the Government and all local institutions; when, having the public deposits and patronage, and the strong arm of the Government pledged for its support, and ready in good faith to be stretched out for its relief, and in a time of general and unexampled prosperity, the bank could safely extend its debt, it can, now that it has felt the blow aimed at its life, intended to prostrate it at the feet of the Secretary of the Treasury, extend its debt to the amount of twenty millions more! Now that the strong arm of the Government has not only been withdrawn from its support, but raised against it, in deadly hostility, and the whole host of affiliated banks also in array to cripple and crush it, after having been told by the Fourth Auditor, the authorized agent of the Executive, that in forty days it could be laid low; that it was a feeble and defenceless reptile under the foot of the Secretary, is it to expand, and expose itself, as in time of profound peace and universal confidence? What! when the tempest howls, and the whirlwind is raging, spread all sail, as in the mildest summer breeze?

My colleague tells us that the bank can calculate the average amount of its deposits, and ought to keep up its discounts upon them. What! when the Government, the greatest of all depositors, has withdrawn its funds, when the President had declared the bank unsafe, when the Secretary had doubted its solvency, when friends of the administration, in both branches, have declared that it was insolvent, and could not pay its depositors—after all this, we are to be told—the suffering people are to be told, that the bank ought to discount as liberally, in this time of general danger and distrust, as it ever could under any circumstances, upon the faith of its private depositors!

Sir, if President Biddle had been so blind or infatuated as to listen to such advice, there is no doubt but the bank would have been insolvent long before this time. The predictions would have been verified. Do we not know, continued Mr. S., that the bank must take every precaution—have every post manned—every sail secured—because of the storm raised against it by the hostility of the Government? Are they not bound to make weekly returns of their condition—send to their enemies statements of their weakness or strength—and may they not apprehend, that if a weak point is thus made known, the fact may find its way immediately to the great reservoir of their notes—Wall street—and a sudden attack invited? Has it not actually happened? Was there not a sudden and unexampled run for near three hundred thousand dollars upon the remote and supposed feeble branch at Savannah—an instant demand made for specie, which, when produced, the agents of the Wall street brokers—the holders of the bills—did not want?

If, indeed, President Biddle had listened to the advice so gratuitously given him, and had not been fully prepared, the prediction would have been verified, in part, and one of the branches, at least, would have been prostrated. What was the object of sending on to Savannah to make this draft? Was it not the hope that the specie was not there? But it was there; and because the bank was ready to meet that demand, and endeavors to keep itself prepared elsewhere, all this outcry is made, that the distresses of the country are caused by the bank hoarding specie in its vaults. But suppose they had failed to get the specie? Why, the cry would have been, that the bank had extended its circulation for the purposes of unholy gain, and was, therefore, unable to meet the demands upon it, and was broken and insolvent.

But now the note is changed. Instead of bankruptcy and insolvency, it is too sound, too stable, too ready to pay—it will not consent to be broken. What had the bank done? It had made some curtailment of its accommodations, but only to about the same as had been withdrawn in the public deposits, taken from it in specie, or what is equivalent to specie—it had only called in to fill the vacuum which the Government had created. Was not this indispensable? Why have not the State banks, to which this money was transferred, extended their accommodations to the public to the amount of these transfers? They have not done it. And yet the United States Bank, from which the money, to the amount of millions, has been taken, is denounced for not keeping up their loans, made upon them, when in its possession; but the pet banks, to which the deposits have been transferred, are in no degree blamed for not discounting upon them when in their possession. The other State banks have contracted largely, probably five times the amount that the United States Bank has, and yet we hear no denunciations thundered against them—they are not charged with being the cause of distress; and if the State banks, upon which Government has made no demands, may thus strengthen themselves, may not the United States Bank, from which so much has been taken, call in enough to fill the void thus created? The Bank of the United States is the only institution that cannot call in its debts, when necessary for its own safety, without the most unlimited censure. It cannot fill up the vacuum occasioned by the withdrawal from its vaults of near eight millions of dollars, by a call on its debtors for a like amount, without being charged with having caused all the distress prevailing throughout the country.

It seemed that deep and all-prevailing distress did exist. The cause is palpable. It cannot be doubted or concealed. It is the blow struck by the Executive. To assign any other is as idle and irrational as it would be, if a man were to fall before our eyes from a dagger plunged into his heart, to suppose that he had come to his death by some other secret and unknown means. The cause was not to be mistaken; it was palpable, notorious as the open day. The memorialists who came before the Senate were men of intelligence and respectability. Many of them charge their distresses to the action of the Executive, under a Government which they have a right to look up to as paternal, protecting their rights and promoting their prosperity; but from which, on the contrary, they have been made to feel as severe a blow as despotism itself could inflict. Sir, if we could attribute the present unexampled condition of the country to some convulsion of nature, or some infliction of the elements, the sufferers would find a throb of sympathy here—nay, I would deeply regret if they did not find a ready response in every breast. And shall we listen with less sensibility, shall we be deaf and callous because it is traced to human agency—to the administration, to the President; bound as he is by the highest obligations, as the ruler of a free people, to avert from them calamity, to relieve their suffering, and advance their prosperity.

Mr. FORSYTH said that the example of the Senator proved how easy it was for an individual to fall into the very error himself which he condemns in another. The gentleman from Maine had accused his colleague of taking an anonymous paragraph in a newspaper as an authority on which to ground imputations against the bank, yet the gentleman had himself referred to a similar authority for the purpose of making a charge against those who were considered inimical to the bank. The gentleman had referred to the removal of money to the branch in Savannah. And where was his authority for the statement he had made? It was to be found in the columns of a newspaper, and a direct contradiction had been given to it, in the newspapers of his State, by persons who were concerned in the matter. The fact was simply this: some large bankers in the south had entered into a contract to deliver a certain amount of specie, at a certain time; and entering into an arrangement with the Government, by which they obtained this specie for a valid consideration in notes, they fulfilled their contract. He hoped the gentleman would not again level an accusation of offence against another, and then fall into the same error himself. He desired to add, that he had listened to both the Senators from Maine with some surprise. It would appear, from the observations of both of them, that the towns from which the petitions came were overwhelmed with gloom and distress. Where was their authority for this statement? He did not find it so in point of fact. He had looked into the two memorials. Neither of them stated that there was such extent of suffering as the gentleman represented. They said, indeed, that there was pressure, but not that there was suffering to the degree which had been described. He begged leave to call the attention of gentlemen to what the memorials really did say. He here read from the Portland memorial, to show that it contained no complaint of any present want of confidence, but merely the apprehension of it; but that, at present, there was money enough for the general wants. They applied for relief—let it be granted. It was effecting nothing, when gentlemen wasted the time of the Senate in discussing the nature and extent of the distress. Gentlemen ought to inform their constituents that it had never been denied by the President and his friends, that Congress had the power to provide a remedy. No blame ought to be cast upon the President, that a remedy had not been suggested. It was to Congress that the people must look. As to the petitioners from Bangor, they seemed to be in a more fortunate condition than those in Portland. All the evils, with them, were evils in perspective. No storm had burst upon them, and they only heard its howling at a distance. As to actual suffering, there seemed to be none. He ought to apologize to the Senate for not following the advice which he had given the other day. It was uselessly given, and he would not repeat it. He was tired of playing Cassandra, and would leave gentleman to talk on as much as they might think proper or profitable.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, that, if the gentleman from Georgia had enjoyed as good an opportunity as he (Mr. S.) had of inspecting the memorials, he would have found portions of them which clearly set forth the distress complained of. The Senator would find it asserted that "great and unexampled distress is felt by all classes." This (said Mr. S.) is some distress, and among some persons. "Great and unexampled distress by all classes," and yet the gentleman can find no distress mentioned in that memorial. It showed only that we see with different eyes, and hear with different ears—that sometimes distress produced by a cause which is dear and near to us, cannot be believed to exist; and when, at length, it has forced its way by its loud, reiterated cries, then it was to be charged to some other source. At first it was denied. Why was it denied? He (Mr. S.) did not speak of what the honorable Senator had just said. But when it was first announced here that the community were suffering, why was it that denial followed denial—that on every occasion, when the subject was mentioned, gentlemen rose in their seats, and stated, "all is calm and prosperous, and there is no sign of suffering or alarm?" It was because they knew that, if there was distress in the community, it arose from the action of the Executive, and they were then unwilling to believe the fact, because they would not censure the origin. And now, when the fact is ascertained, they are still reluctant to see it, when it is stated in a paper presented to the Senate. When, however, distress is found to exist on testimony so strong that the human understanding cannot resist it, then Senators turn it aside on the Bank of the United States, or upon overtrading, or the ignorance of the commercial community, or the foreign market, or any or every cause, other than that iron-hand which has struck down the prosperity and the hopes of the country. The gentleman from Georgia had assumed the office of adviser. He (Mr. S.) was willing to receive advice from any quarter, and from none more cheerfully than the honorable Senator who had been impelled to proffer it, undoubtedly from his greater experience, and his very advanced years, compared with himself, (Mr. S.) The advice, unfortunately, happened not to be applicable to the present case, and he therefore would not deprive the gentleman of so valuable a commodity. He had best retain it for a more suitable occasion. The gentleman had adverted to what he (Mr. S.) had said in regard to the anonymous newspaper article introduced by his colleague; and asserted that he (Mr. S.) had fallen into the same error, by relying on similar authority. He had stated a fact—a fact which the gentleman himself corroborates. What was it? That there had been a run on the Branch Bank of the United States at Savannah, for a large amount of specie. Did the gentleman deny it? No: he sustained it, and attempted to account for it. He (Mr. S.) did not state it on mere newspaper authority: he had it from a far higher source—it was unnecessary now to state it. What, he would ask, was the authority of his colleague, (Mr. SPRAGUE.) Why, it was a mere anonymous communication to a newspaper, stating what the directors of the bank would, or would not do, a mere speculation, contingent on what a body of men might, or might not do, and what motives or principle might operate upon them. Was there any parallel between those two cases. He stated the fact, for the purpose of showing that the Bank of the United States must at this period, keep all its posts manned and fortified; that it was liable to have runs on every branch. He stated, that there had been a large run on the branch bank at Savannah, and ascribed it to what he still believed to be the true cause—an attempt to break the branch bank. The motive for collecting so large an amount of bills, and demanding specie was, to see if they could not find a deficiency at a weak point, upon which to make an impression. Whether he was right or not as to the motive, the fact remained unchanged and unchangeable, and that was a sufficient reason why the Bank of the United States should fortify and strengthen itself at all points.

The honorable Senator from Georgia had gratuitously given him another recommendation—it was to tell his (Mr. S.'s) constituents that no one here denies that Congress have power over this subject. He should like to know the extent of that power which it is said Congress possesses, and no body denies. He would appeal to all around him, whether Congress had any practical power over this subject. What is the state of the question? Sixty days before the meeting of Congress, the President threw himself in advance, and removed the public moneys from the place in which they were deposited, and supposed to have been surrounded and secured by law. How, he (Mr. S.) would ask, are they to be restored? Did the gentleman mean to say, that nobody denies here that a vote of a naked majority of Congress would restore them, whether the President approved of the measure or not? Did the gentleman mean to say, that, if Congress did not approve of the reasons assigned by the Secretary—if either House disapproved—that that would of itself operate a restoration, by annulling the act? Will the gentleman say that the votes of a majority of Congress can effect a restoration of the depositories, without obtaining a vote of two-thirds of both branches to supersede the veto? And, even then, have we any assurance that he would carry it into effect, having pronounced the bank unconstitutional, and declared that he is to support the constitution as he understands it? It was the most solemn mockery of power that was ever offered to a grave and deliberative body like the Senate of the United States. Have we not seen the Executive, by acting in advance of the meeting of Congress, place himself in a position to take advantage of his veto power to prevent the restoration, when, if he had waited sixty days only, and submitted the question to the legislature, there would have been some power in Congress, nay, there would have been some power in this Senate, to have prevented the removal. But after the President has taken that attitude, and when it is known, as well as any thing future can be known, that, if there were to be a majority of the two branches, he stands ready to exercise his tremendous veto to paralyze their efforts to relieve the distress of the country, are we to be told here in mockery that we have the power? We ought to have the power, for it belongs to Congress legitimately, and by the constitution. It belongs to Congress to declare where the public moneys should be deposited, and how kept. The treasure of the nation was to be in the keeping of the representatives of the people; instead of which, one man—the Executive, has taken it into his own keeping. Will the honorable Senator tell me, he is not determined to keep them by the use of his veto power, if even both branches of the national legislature should demand their restoration? And yet Congress has power! The President has frequently recommended measures of legislation, and he is not backward in exercising all the privileges and prerogatives belonging to his station, if the subject should happen to be agreeable to his wishes. What measure does he recommend, what plan propose, for our adoption? Has he ever told Congress that they ought to be consulted as to the future disposition of those depositories? On the contrary, is it not the purpose and design of the President and his administration—I will not speak of his administration—of the President; he is the administration—he is the Government—having got possession of the money, to keep possession of it by the banks which he holds at his will, and can remove at his pleasure?

The people's money, it is said, is in the Treasury; and where is the Treasury? Just where the President chooses to make it. He may put it into a bank; he may put it into a cellar; he may put it under the care of the Postmaster General, or in the pocket of the Fourth Auditor—and that is the Treasury. The Treasury of the United States is wherever the President directs it shall be kept, and is changed from place to place, or from person to person, at his will or pleasure. And yet we are told that it is secured by the bolts and bars of the law—it is surrounded by the law, and you cannot get at it unless you conform to its requisitions; the warrant must be signed, countersigned, and registered; all forms and ceremonies must be gone through; but if the President wishes to reach it, he has only to command the officer to deliver it to him or his agent, and if he hesitates—"walk" is the word, and a complying instrument is instantly substituted in his place. Was it not worse than idle to talk about the public treasure being secured by the barriers of the law, when that law presented no obstacle to the uncontrolled will of one man? Was it not worse than a mockery to tell us that we are to act upon this subject, when the whole efficient action has been assumed by the Executive, and it is known, to a moral certainty, that he intends that no other action shall be had; that his experiment shall be tried, without interruption, interference, or advice?—when we are told here by those whose position and associations make their declarations authority, that no change is intended, no legislation desired; but that the Executive plan, the Presidential experiment, is, at all events, to be carried through? He hoped the Senator from Georgia would excuse him for not conforming to his recommendation to abstain from discussion, as he had followed his example rather than his precept.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that he would not only pardon the gentleman from Maine for again addressing the Senate, but he would follow his example. It was very true that the petitioners talked of unexampled distress, but in the next sentence they showed that it had not injured public credit. The petitioners talked of the future, not of the present. He had never heard it denied that distress existed, the only dispute was as to its extent, and not the fact, or the cause which had produced it. Every one, by this time, well understood that the removal of the depositories was not of itself sufficient to produce the distress, and the cause was to be looked for in the conduct of the bank. The dispute, then, was not about the cause, but the criminality. The friends of the bank alleged that it was the criminality of the Executive; while, on the other side, it was charged as the criminality of the bank. He had always denied that the existing distress was so great as had been represented, and here, he had the evidence to sustain him on that point. The fact was, that there was a considerable embarrassment in the country, in consequence of the bank refusing to do what it had been in the habit of doing. As to the causes, they were well understood; and the fact that every occasion was taken by gentlemen to present exaggerated pictures of distress, in order to excite a louder cry in their own State, proved that the distress was originated here. The gentleman from Maine would fain persuade himself that the people of his State were ready to stand by his side against the administration. If they were not ready, he wished them to be in readiness as soon as possible. Every gentleman on the same side entertained the same views. He did not complain of this. It was perfectly right that it should be so. Believing themselves to be correct in their opinions, they were actuated by the double motive of serving their country, and of promoting their own interests.

The gentleman said that the cases of the anonymous quotation of his colleague, and that which he (Mr. F.) had given, were not analogous. Now the fact was established as to the subject of the newspaper paragraph which he had quoted, and his concurrent testimony was not wanted. But the gentleman from Maine had taken, not merely the fact, but the motive. He had said that the removal of the money was done to break the institution. What authority had he for this statement? Had he any thing better than the authority of a newspaper paragraph? And had not that been contradicted by a more competent authority at Savannah?

As to the power of Congress, he desired to say a single word. The gentleman seemed to think this power a mockery, and asked what he (Mr. F.) meant by the power of Congress? He meant the power which the constitution had vested in Congress; nothing else. If it be nothing more than a mockery to carry into effect the powers conferred by the constitution, then he had yet to learn the fact, and he had been surprised to hear the gentleman rise and arraign the constitution. The gentleman asked, "Do we not know that there is a veto power?" By whom was this veto power used? By the President. Where did he derive the authority to use it? From the constitution, under the authority of which the gentleman himself had his seat on this floor. Let gentlemen get their majority in both Houses, and then they might begin to talk of their ifs and their buts. But if he at all understood the signs of the times, they would not be very speedily permitted such an opportunity.

Mr. SPRAGUE objected to the gentleman's selecting the weakest expression in the petitions, when there was to be found in them a statement of the fact as to the distress pervading the community. It had not been his intention to go through the Portland memorial, but he would refer the gentleman to another paragraph, in which it was stated that the present distress could not be borne, were it not for the hope of the beneficial interference of Congress. This language was not to be explained or equivocated away. As to the anonymous authority, the gentleman from Georgia had charged him with taking his motive from that paper. Now he must be permitted to claim for himself the right to judge as to motives. It was not necessary for him to go to any newspaper authority to determine what was the inference which he should draw from an established fact. He was competent to make his own deductions, and select his own course under such circumstances.

The gentleman says (continued Mr. S.) that I arraigned the constitution. No, sir. I have endeavored, by such feeble powers as I possess, to stand by and vindicate the constitution. I will tell him that it is not for us, or for such as we are, to arraign the constitution. It is our part to sustain and vindicate the constitution. He did not (he continued) complain that the constitution had given the veto power to the President. He knew for what purpose that power was given, from the contemporary expositions of the framers of the constitution. It was conferred on the Executive primarily for his own protection, to prevent encroachments on the Executive branch. He referred to the language of the Federalist on this subject, where it was stated that this power had been long disused by a King of England, and that a republican President would be much more cautious in its exercise. Yet we had found that, instead of being less frequently resorted to than it had been in the English monarchy, where it had not been exercised for more than 140 years, it has been brought into frequent, repeated, reiterated action, by the present Executive within the last four years. He had undertaken to express his sentiments of the arbitrary exercise of power which the President had committed. He had remarked that the Executive had, in this matter, taken a front position, when he withdrew the public money, in order that if Congress should disapprove the act, he might take advantage of the veto power to maintain it. It was of that course, founded on the anticipated action of the veto power, that he complained. Did any one doubt that, if the force and extent of the Executive influence were withheld from Congress, there would indisputably be a majority in favor of restoring the public deposits to the United States Bank? Could any one entertain a doubt on this point? He repeated that it was the Executive power and influence which now wielded and directed the destinies of the nation.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, that from the remarks which had fallen from the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FOSYTH,] when first up, he had flattered himself that light was breaking in upon us at last. When it had been said that "nobody denied the power of Congress over the Treasury of the nation," he had congratulated himself that Executive control of that Treasury would now cease. His hopes were blasted by the Senator's explanation. We are now gravely told that Congress must legislate, and when the Executive veto is applied to that legislation, we must again legislate by a vote of two-thirds of each branch, and when this process is accomplished, the President will yield. Indeed? What amazing concession!

Mr. C. denied that this was a case of just exercise of the "veto power," even on the most extended doctrine of the advocates of that power. The President did not obtain possession of the control he has, by the use of the "veto." The power had been greatly perverted, by applying it to matters in no way touching the Executive Department in its organization, its exclusive action, or in any way affecting any constitutional question, but to the most ordinary subjects of legislation—not as a conservative or defensive means, but as an agent to swell the executive authority of the President, and extend it even to a question of the proper mode of calculating interest on a debt. But this power was undoubtedly found in the constitution, and it was not now his purpose to discuss its proper or improper exercise. The power which had been exercised, and of which he did complain, was not in the constitution. Could the Senator show an article or section which intimated that the President, through an order subscribed by a Secretary whose subserviency was secured by the avowed power to expel him if his subscription was withheld—an order made while some members of Congress were on their journey from their residence to attend the session—an order made with no other apparent motive than to get the jockey word, to get the track, as was once said on this floor—can the Senator show where in the constitution the President can find such authority to direct, control, and manage the great interests of this nation? Ay, the greatest interest—the whole revenue of the country, every dollar of it. This was no case of veto. The action of that prerogative was not intended to confer power on the Executive, but to prevent its exercise by the two Houses of Congress. Here was a positive acquisition of power—immense, dangerous, and alarming power. It was a dispensing power, which, against the will of Congress, as well as without its assent, had enabled the President to take into his exclusive care, custody, and control, the whole revenue of the country, and place it where he pleased, and on what terms he pleased.

Sir, said Mr. C., is there any parallel attempt, in the whole history of this Government? I mean (said he) not to use the word Government in the now technical sense—I do not mean President Jackson. At no time before had the President, by anticipating the action of Congress, put himself in the possession and exercise of such a power, from which he could not be dislodged, so long as his personal popularity, or the influence of party, should prevent a vote by two-thirds in each branch. Did the Senator from Georgia doubt, could any man doubt, that if the action upon this subject had been postponed until Congress convened, and until a majority of each branch approved it, the purposes of the Executive would have failed? We all know, every body knows, that scarcely a voice would have been raised to recommend such a course; all would have said, as the Senator admits he would have said—forbear.

The motive for this act, Mr. C. said, was as censurable as the means of its accomplishment. This motive is known through some of the committees who have been delegated to present the petitions of their suffering fellow-citizens. They tell us the President and his Secretary are determined to "try fully their experiment." Yes, sir, try an experiment! A splendid scheme this, truly! The President of a great nation finds it in the possession of every rational, social, and domestic enjoyment, and he deliberately resolves to hazard the destruction of all, by "trying an experiment," on a subject which enters vitally into every great interest, which of all other subjects most intimately affects their feelings and their prosperity—an experiment upon the currency and finances of the whole nation. This is to be done, too, not only without consultation or advice with Congress, to whom we have all been taught to look as the great agent in producing changes in the great branches of commerce, agriculture, or manufactures—all dependent on a sound state of currency—but by an Executive action alone—an Executive action in anticipation, and in known violation of the will of Congress.

And this experiment, the Government—I now speak technically, meaning President Jackson—is determined to carry out. To the strong cries of a suffering people it is answered, “The experiment must be tried.” To the remonstrance that political friends, as well as adversaries, are falling under its frightful ravages—that all classes and conditions of men are becoming empoverished and ruined, and to their earnest supplication for relief against the further operation of this mad scheme—to the crowds of intelligent and experienced representatives who have come from various parts of the country to explain and enforce the absolute necessity for remedy to the daily increasing evils which oppress the thousands and tens of thousands who send them here—to the fact that commerce is stagnated, manufactures languishing and expiring, agriculture depressed, and its products, as well as all other property, daily depreciating in value—to all this, the Government—id est, the President—replies “My experiment must be tried.” When the experiment may be considered as fully tried, and what degree or extent of failure will befall to demonstrate its folly, we are yet to learn.

The Senator from Georgia had noticed a distinction which allowed a hope that he had looked to a limit, and that when the country was in deep distress, he would no longer encourage a perseverance in this “experiment.” It was not very certain what would constitute this “deep” distress. “Great and unparalleled distress” was now felt, said these memorialists; but, says the Senator, “great and unparalleled distress” is not “deep” distress. Well, sir, if the occurrence of “deep” distress, a grade less tolerable than “great and unparalleled,” will influence the Senator to unfold his arms and come to the relief of the people, we are taught by sad omens to believe we shall soon have his aid.

Mr. C. said, he rejoiced at the prospect of a more accurate conception of the real condition of the country. It had been heretofore denied that distress existed. The Senator from Maine [Mr. SWAZLEY] told us, all was flourishing in his State, and he proved it by referring to the price of the Maine public lands. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] had repeatedly said so of his people, and denied that agricultural products had decreased in price—indeed, he thought that their great mineral resources and manufacturing enterprise put them beyond the danger of distress. They had both retracted, and now the Senator from Georgia admits there is “great” distress, and denies only that there is “deep” distress.

Mr. C. said it was difficult to account for the infatuation that led to this wretched policy. The consequences were, no doubt, worse than they were expected to be, but surely practical and experienced men could have been advised with, from whom the authors of it might have learned how certainly destructive it would prove. Such men have predicted such results. Mr. C. here read a paragraph from a pamphlet on currency, published in 1828 or '9, the acknowledged author of which was the president of the selected bank in Baltimore, in which the writer states that the destruction of the national bank must result in a ruinous derangement of the currency. That this same writer had considerable agency in effecting the measure complained of, he would assert, not on newspaper authority, to which the Senator from Georgia objected, but on authority which he would at any time disclose to the private hearing of that Senator, and which would be deemed satisfactory by him. But, said Mr. C., of all the extraordinary features of this sad tragedy, none is so remarkable as the strange and novel object to be accomplished. It was to ruin and destroy the present race of our fellow-citizens of all classes, that posterity might be able to do without a bank, or paper currency. The idea seemed almost incredible that a Government should be insensible to the prosperity of its citizens of all classes. What was our own Government organized for? Was it not to promote the happiness, protect the liberty, and foster and reward the honest industry of our people? And were these objects to be forgotten, all to be abandoned to a ridiculous attempt at an “experiment?” Sir (said he) let the American people know this, let them know that their lands, and houses, and property may depreciate and be sold from them for almost nothing, that their industry is to be paralyzed and go unrewarded, and they and their families plunged into poverty, to enable the Executive to “try his experiment.” Let them know that Congress has not been consulted, nay, that it has been tricked and jockeyed out of the opportunity to speak with authority on the subject, let this be told, and further, that the resistance to this scheme which they, the people themselves make, has been announced to the Executive, and that the only response is, “the Government means to carry out the experiment,” and we shall see the mighty torrent of public indignation, which cannot fail to mark such proceedings. What nation before, has causelessly abandoned a condition of unusual prosperity, or put at desperate hazard all its means of social and domestic comfort, by an “experiment,” to gratify the curiosity, or he would say the passion, of one man?

We have been told the country must look to the moneyed men for relief—that all the money is still in the country which has been in it. Those who held this language surely could not know that money was worth eighteen, twenty-four, and even thirty-six per cent. He could tell them the fact was so. The best paper could be bought at one and a half, two, and even three per cent. a month. Men in business who had engagements, must meet them, even by procuring money at these prices; and they must, if they continued to procure money at these prices, be ruined by it. Does the Senator suppose that an honest, industrious mechanic can afford to get pecuniary relief on those terms? Not at all. His capital in trade, with all his industry, will not furnish him a profit to justify it. The money, therefore, is withdrawn from its legitimate purpose of aiding trade, and employed in a more profitable occupation.

A word as to newspaper authority. The Senator from Georgia will not rely on it. Now, sir, all that can be asked is the best evidence that can be had. We have tried to procure evidence of certain Executive transactions, by an application to the fountain head. It was refused. Where can it be found but in the newspapers, to which the Executive gave it, though he refused it to the Senate? This must excuse him for using the newspaper version of a letter not anonymous, but professing to be from a very notorious personage—one who was called an “agent,” but who had the mien and tone of authority. He might be considered, perhaps, one of the parts or fragments of the “Government.” The “Government” no longer, it is supposed, claims to be a “unit,” its divisibility was very fully proved. It seemed to be portable, too, for part of it appeared to have travelled with the agent, while part remained in this city. The instructions which were made here by the Secretary, no doubt by direction of the President, contained a series of inquiries, all based upon the idea of a mutual guaranty of the league banks, but, at the end of the first stage, in Baltimore, before these inquiries were presented to a single bank, the agent, under an authority to add any others, framed a whole new series of propositions, totally abandoning the fundamental notion of a guaranty, and, indeed, in the whole affair, talks of what the Government should require, and of what it should not require, as if he were not only a part, but much the most important part, of the "Government." The letter he alluded to professed the object of the "Government" to be, to bring the bank to the feet of the Executive—to break it up. Could the Senator tell whether the letter was genuine? [Here Mr. FORSYTH said he knew nothing about it.] "Non mi recordo," said Mr. C. Well, perhaps the Senator from Maine [Mr. SHEPLEY] knows all about it. He has given us his account of those who are said to come from the kitchen, in such terms as to justify us in believing he holds intercourse with those who can inform him on this point. The letter had been published, and he had no knowledge that it had ever been denied. It rested, therefore, on the same authority as the letter of the President to the Cabinet proper; and, as it was fair to adopt the rule "like master like man," he should use it as genuine. Now, by the aid of this letter, we might perhaps be enabled to understand the other facts connected with the attack on the Savannah branch, to which his friend from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] had alluded. Those facts, as he had heard them related, (and he submitted them to the correction of the Senator from Georgia,) were, that a broker in Wall street had assumed the task of executing the threat of the aforesaid letter. To this end he collected all the notes of the Savannah branch. The cashier of the New York branch, on a certain day, discovered that no note of the Savannah branch had been received; on the second day, he was surprised to find the same unusual occurrence; and on its recurrence on the third day, he announced the fact to the board at Philadelphia, as decisively ominous. It seems that the president of the bank, called, in a high quarter, "Emperor Biddle," has something of the vigilance of an animal that is seldom caught napping—"it's hard to catch a weasel asleep." The broker having very secretly, as he supposed, prepared the materials, started on the laudable duty of blowing up the Savannah branch. He presented his three hundred thousand dollars worth of notes, and asked for specie. It happened that the bank had just about $300,000 of specie more than usual. The cashier expressed his pleasure, and counted out the specie as a matter of relief to the bank. This was a damper. Mr. Broker had to put his wits in pretty rapid exercise, and soon determined that a draft on New York would, perhaps, suit him better than hard dollars—in truth, he did not know exactly what to do with such a load. The cashier expressed great sympathy for his dilemma, but, as the trouble of managing such a cumbersome article was the very cause of embarrassment, he declined giving the draft, which would, of course, throw the weight on the bank.

Finally, to show all the charity possible to the afflicted broker, he agreed to receive the hard money on special deposits, and the broker made his retreat. Whether he reported the journal of his mission, is not known; and, if we were to ask, the Executive might tell us it was a cabinet secret. Mr. C. said he would make no references, because the Senator did not agree that it was right to make them; but Mr. C. could not but think, when a large demand for specie was made, and, when offered, was not wanted, the demand could have had its origin in any very honest motive.

This was the end of one "experiment." His constituents were suffering all the embarrassments which they had heretofore avowed. They had no desire to see more "experiments" tried, at the expense of their fortunes, their comforts, and their very means of subsistence, nor would they be satisfied with distinctions between "great and unparalleled distress" and "deep distress." They believed the idea of forcing "confidence" in the "experiment" which was proposed, was idle and ridiculous. They had suggested the remedy for their sore afflictions: they knew it was in the power of the Executive to apply it, and he concurred with his friend from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] that an intimation from the Executive would, to-day, effect all that is required. A release from the shackles of party would result in a decided vote in Congress, and would be followed by one universal burst of joy and gladness throughout the Union. The magnanimity of the Executive would be applauded every where and men of all parties would join to swell the chorus of thankful applause, and say, as he did from the bottom of his soul, Amen—so let it be.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, that he retracted nothing that he had previously asserted—not having changed his former opinions. If he had been in error in regard to what he had said, yet he supposed his honorable colleague [Mr. SPRAGUE] would not question the authority which he had given—that of a newspaper friendly to the United States Bank. He (Mr. S.) was not aware that he was in error; on the contrary, he believed that the print from which he had quoted was correct. He felt himself bound to declare, that the first time he had heard there was any distress in the country, was some weeks ago, and in this chamber—nowhere else. And, since that note was first sounded here, it had been reiterated again and again; and, day after day, alarms and panics had been reported to exist. He imputed no purpose to it; though complaints had been daily made by honorable Senators, that there existed great distress—a report of which had gone forth to their constituents, who then made loud declarations in return, and forwarded their memorials to Congress on the subject, and that accounted for the tables of Senators being so crowded with documents of that character. He believed it was well understood by all commercial men, that, if it had not been for the constant interchange of opinion, the distress, if it had ever existed at all, would have existed in a very faint degree. If distress prevailed, the alarms that had been raised had been the cause of it. The Bank of the United States had manifested a disposition to show its power, and make it felt. It had been felt, and he must say, that it had evinced a desire to make it still further felt.

One word as to the use he had made of the newspaper. He could not at all admit that his course would be altered in the slightest degree, by any thing which might fall from any honorable Senator on that floor. He had good reasons for alluding to the paper which he held in his hand, inasmuch as he had found that it was upon the records of the country, and that it had been circulated by the funds of the bank throughout the Union. We had no occasion to call imagination to our aid as to this matter, for the truth of the statement could not be doubted. He conceived that when he possessed authority like this, favorable to the bank, he might be permitted to use it. He had other evidence too, and that was, that the bank had not only adopted this paper as its instrument through which to speak to the nation, but that it was greatly within the power of that institution. Thus, then, he considered that he had grounds for supposing that it does not speak what would be unfriendly towards the bank, what it would not wish it to speak. He thought that, when this subject should be looked into again at some future time, it would, in all probability, be proved, that this paper, containing the article to which allusion had been made, was sent abroad by the funds of the bank. In conclusion he would merely say, that he felt himself amply justified in alluding to it.

Mr. SPRAGUE congratulated his colleague on his having discovered a new cause of the public distress. It was not now the United States Bank alone. His colleague had formerly said that the bank was the sole cause of the public distress. [Mr. SHEPLEY: Not at all.] At least he had understood him as saying so: he undertook to give the cause, and assigned no other, and had read a paper to prove that such was the fact. But he had now discovered other causes. It was not the Executive—oh no, not the Executive! It was not the bank alone! But it was Congress—Congress and the bank. The debates here had suggested to the people that they were in distress, and the people began to believe it. It was Congress, it was the bank, it was any thing rather than the Executive, that had caused the pressure on the community. As to the newspaper which his colleague had said was circulated by the funds of the bank, he hoped that he did not intend to say that the National Intelligencer was circulated at the expense of the bank. If he did, he would ask him for the proof. What evidence of the truth of the assertion the gentleman might have, he knew not; but when it was produced, be it whatever it might, the Senate would be able to decide on its accuracy. But suppose it was the fact that a number of the Intelligencer, some years since, containing the speeches of distinguished members, had been circulated by the bank, what force would that fact contribute to the weight of his colleague's argument? Would it tend, in the least degree, to show that they were responsible for an anonymous communication, in a recent number, of which the bank had no knowledge? If the gentleman should circulate a newspaper containing a speech, would he be willing to be held accountable for all the articles which should ever afterwards appear in that paper?

Mr. FORSYTH said that the gentleman from Maryland had stated that, if the Executive influence had not operated in Congress to prevent such a result, the embarrassment of the country would have been relieved, and the question all settled.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Not a doubt of it.

Mr. FORSYTH. The gentleman could not allude to the Senate, for here the Executive influence was not of much avail. He must have meant the other House; and if so, the allusion was not very decorous.

Mr. CHAMBERS desired to be allowed to give his own language. He meant its influence on the whole country, on every man in and out of Congress, who had been in political alliance with Andrew Jackson.

Mr. FORSYTH resumed. The gentleman meant, then, nothing more or less than that the President had the confidence of the whole country. It was his distressing popularity which thwarted all the designs and wishes of gentlemen, and had caused all the evils which pervade the country, and it was intended to show that these evils would all continue until that popularity could be destroyed by the efforts made here and elsewhere.

Mr. F. proceeded to say, that he was not so conversant with the facts concerning the Savannah transaction as to be able to give the gentleman from Maryland any precise information concerning it. He doubted the correctness of the source from which the gentleman had obtained his knowledge. The money was transmitted to the banks, and the business was managed through a branch in Augusta. He did not know that there was any connexion between the individuals who had conducted this matter and the Government, but he knew that they were of the keenest order of money-makers, and would look to themselves in preference to others.

The gentleman had asked him as to the authority of a certain letter signed by the bank agent. He knew nothing of the transactions of this agent, but he presumed that, although such an agent, the letters which bore his signature were really written by him. He, however, disclaimed having any knowledge of the secrets even of the parlor cabinet, much less those of any other apartment. He asked why gentlemen continued to talk about what might or what might not be done; and why they told the country that Congress could have no power, because its action was controlled by the Executive? Why did they not test the sense of Congress, and see if they could do any thing? Why all the senseless cry about what ought to be done? Why not first try the question on some measure? It was enough for him to know, that Congress had not acted on the subject, and would not act. If Congress desired to do any thing, they had it in their power to settle this agitating question. And why was it not done? Let gentlemen introduce a bill, and try the sense of Congress on its passage. Did any gentleman believe that there would be found even the leanest majority to discountenance the acts of the Executive in the House of Representatives? If the experiment was to be made, it was for Congress to say under what circumstances the Executive should make it. Gentlemen asked if the public money was to be left in the State banks? He would answer—ay, until Congress shall come to some decision. Did any gentleman believe that if Congress should prescribe the regulations under which the public money should be deposited, that the President would set up his voice against them? He had no such purpose. An experiment to return to a specie currency was to be made. It was to be determined under what restrictions the Executive might make the trial. The present discussion was fruitless of benefit. It might continue for months, and, after all, leave things precisely where they were.

Gentlemen had complained that the President and Secretary of the Treasury had submitted no plan. How could they do so? With these questions pending before Congress, as to the approval or disapproval of his course, how could the Executive submit a plan? The Secretary was bound, by every sort of respect to Congress, to wait for their decision on these questions. Then it would become his duty to present a plan, which might be matured and carried into operation.

One thing more. By the manner in which the organization of the committees of the Senate had been made, there could be no official communication between these committees and the President or the Heads of the Departments. Heretofore, when any question in which either of the Executive Departments was concerned, was stirred, the Senate looked to the chairmen of their committees for the views of the Departments. But now there was no such thing. The new organization of the committees had removed this facility. Mr. F. concluded with a remark or two on the propriety of proceeding to act with decision, and to provide such guards for the safety of the deposits as might be deemed expedient.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed, the Senator from Georgia had used an expression which he must notice. "There had been a senseless cry," says the Senator. Now, if the loud and numerous calls for relief contained in the memorials with which our table is loaded, be intended as the "senseless cry," then was it a matter between the Senator and the people. If the remark was intended for those Senators who had endeavored to draw from the administration some plan of relief, he trusted it would be heard de die in diem. However unpleasant it might be to the Executive ear, or that of his friends, he hoped it would continue to annoy them until (like the unjust judge) they should be compelled to do what was right—if not from a sense of justice, at least from a regard to their peace.

Sir, is it "a senseless cry" to ask the Executive to restore the people to the prosperity and happiness they enjoyed so long and so abundantly, and which they would now enjoy but for Executive usurpation? Is it "a senseless cry" to ask him to forbear overshadowing the whole land with gloom and sorrow?—to remove the load of oppression under which they are groaning? They know that the Executive has brought these troubles upon them, through an order of the Secretary, bound to obey his mandates or suffer expulsion—that the scheme was devised in the Executive closet, without any agency or advice of Congress—they are told it is to try an experiment; and they have bitter experience of its fatal influence in blasting their fairest hopes and crushing them to the dust. Is it “senseless cry” to ask the Executive to desist—no longer to continue this experiment on their fortunes, their occupations, their happiness, their every thing dear to them? Stop the experiment, and the “senseless cry” will no longer be heard; but, until it shall stop, the cries of the people will grow louder and louder; and I venture the prediction, said Mr. C., it will become so loud, that no man in this country, however elevated his political station, will dare to disobey it. That is my opinion, sir; I believe it will be obeyed.

Mr. C. said he knew there was much speculation upon the “unyielding firmness,” as it was called, of one whose agency in this matter was necessary. He did not call that “firmness,” he did not consider it a virtue, which would impel a Chief Magistrate to look with aversion to the means of relieving a community which was every day going down, down, down to poverty and want and wretchedness. No, sir, a just conception of true magnanimity would lead to an acknowledgment of error, to a change of purpose, to rescue the country from the gloom and dependency which is daily increasing. Their condition was exciting the people to the loudest complaint, and would excite them to utter their griefs in such tones that nerves of iron, or feelings of brass, could not be insensible to them. The Senator from Georgia thinks we have no right to ask relief from the administration. “What can we give!—what can we give!” says he. Had the Senator forgotten what the President has said to Congress? Shall we not repose faith in an assurance contained in an Executive message? The President said he had a plan, one which, if we had asked, he would have furnished—a plan that would remove all constitutional difficulties. Where is this plan? The constitution enjoins it as his duty, to suggest matters of legislation on great exigencies. Surely, here is an exigency great enough to put him upon his duty. He will not, it is to be hoped, wait to have Congress bow the knee first—acknowledge its impotency, and implore favor. A magnanimous man, when about to do a magnanimous act, will never ask the intended object of his favor to humble himself before him. But the Senate have sinned in not making a selection of chairmen more orthodox in their political creed. This was not the first time the Senator from Georgia had complained on this subject. Perhaps, as far as the Senator was concerned personally, he might agree that was a fit subject for debate, if it had not been adjudged—the decision was made, and it was an adjudged case. But pray what right has the Executive to complain? Does the President want to have a hand in making our committees? If he does, he will find that “experiment” fail too. Is the fact, however, as the Senator supposes? If his recollection served him, there was not one of the political committees of the Senate which did not number amongst its members, some of the friends of the administration. Besides, are not Senators here, who are known to be warm supporters of the administration, in daily association with the Executive? Do they not know the Executive purposes? We know their ability to present those purposes in their most attractive form, and to sustain them with the most eloquent ingenuity. Or do these Senators find those Executive purposes to be such as they cannot recommend to us? If not, why is it that we hear nothing from them, as we certainly expected—as the country did and does expect? The Senator from Georgia suggests, that the most distressing portion of our grievance is, the “distressing popularity” of the President. Sir, said Mr. C., I agree that the popularity of the President is distressing. I hope never to see another President who shall impress the whole country with a feeling of devotion, not for virtues or qualities, actual or imputed, that indicate a fitness for the station, but for military services. I am willing never again to place the country under the rule of one who can, by the nod of his head, the wave of his hand, or the stroke of his pen, command the shouts of millions to applaud either or both of two antagonist measures, or both sides of each. Yes, sir, the President can, by a nod or a wink, restore the deposits to-morrow—can, I believe, re-charter the bank to-morrow—and no man could have been tolerated for one hour in the course of lawless attack upon the chartered rights of the bank, and upon the happiness and prosperity of this whole people, but that man whose distressing popularity has emboldened him to try the “experiment.” But, sir, popularity is a fleeting bubble. The Ides of March have not passed by; they are approaching, and, although no bloody tragedy is to be enacted—notwithstanding the ridiculous flourish—the scarecrow in the “Government” official—there is a revolution going on, which, however it may be scoffed at, as “senseless cry,” will, through the ballot box, remove that distressing load of popularity which the Senator confides in. The people are overloaded—they cannot, will not submit; and he would, in conclusion, repeat, that, however the ears of the Executive and its friends may be offended with their senseless cries, it is exactly the sort of music which will salute them till they relieve the people, or till the people relieve them of their distressing popularity.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that it was the custom with our ingenious fellow-citizens, when they applied at the Patent Office for the right of a monopoly for a new invention, about which they wanted to try an experiment, to accompany their application with a paper denominated a specification. The gentleman from Georgia had furnished the specification for the experiment of the Executive, in relation to the finances of the country; he had stated more distinctly than on other occasions, what that experiment would be. There were some other remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, particularly those relating to the constitution of the committees—and as he was desirous to make some reply, and did not feel disposed to go on at that late hour, he would move that the Senate adjourn. If, however, any gentleman wished to propose an adjournment over to Monday, he (Mr. W.) would, for the present, waive his motion.

Mr. W. then gave way to Mr. POINDEXTER, who suggested that there was some pressing Executive business; and, on motion of the latter gentleman, the doors were closed until the hour of adjournment.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

VIRGINIA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TYLER presented resolutions recently adopted by the two Houses of Assembly of the State of Virginia, expressive of their opinions and views relative to the conduct of the Executive with regard to the Bank of the United States and the deposits of the public revenue. Mr. T. proposed to abstain, at this time, from making any remarks on the subjects embraced in the resolutions, other than to say, that, concurring as he did most fully in the views expressed by the legislature of his State, he should use all the means in his power to carry them in effect. Mr. T. should, at another time, more convenient to the Senate, make such remarks as the importance of the subject required. For the present he should merely move for the printing of the resolutions, and their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. RIVES rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The Senate will indulge me, I hope, standing in the position I do, with a few remarks on the subject of the resolutions just read. It is very far from my intention to attempt to impugn, in any manner, the force of those resolutions, or to derogate, in the slightest degree, from the high respect to which they are entitled here and elsewhere. On the contrary, I recognise them as the legitimate expression of the opinion of my State, conveyed through the only authentic organ known to her constitution and laws.

The Senate will have perceived, from the reading of the resolutions, that it is my misfortune to entertain, and to have expressed, on the grave questions now occupying the public mind, opinions very different from those asserted by the resolutions. Notwithstanding this difference of opinion, I should feel it my duty, as one of the representatives of Virginia on this floor, to conform to the views expressed by her legislature, if, in the circumstances in which I am placed, I could do so without dishonor. I hold it, sir, to be a vital principle of our political system, one indispensable to the preservation of our institutions, that the representative, whether a member of this or the other House, is bound to conform to the opinions and wishes of his constituents, authentically expressed; or, if he be unable to do so, from overruling and imperious considerations, operating upon his conscience or honor, to surrender his trust into the hands of those from whom he derived it, that they may select an agent who can better carry their views into effect.

On all occasions involving questions of expediency only, it is, I conceive, the bounden duty of the representative to conform explicitly to the instructions of the constituent body, where those instructions are to be carried into execution by a legislative act, which, as a mandate of the public will, prescribes and directs what shall be done for the public good. But where the instructions contemplate a declaration of principles or opinions, which are contrary to the sincere and honest convictions of the representative, as there is no means of forcing the assent of the understanding to abstract propositions, the only course left to him is, by the surrender of his commission, to put it in the power of his constituents to confer it on another whose opinions correspond with their own.

To apply these principles to my own case, I do not hesitate to say, that, if the instructions of the legislature of my State had required me specifically to vote for a law, or other legislative act, providing for the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, however highly inexpedient I deem such a measure to be, I should nevertheless have felt it my duty to give the vote required. Such, it will be recollected, was the precise demand of the memorial of the citizens of Richmond, presented a few days ago by my honorable colleague, and which concluded by asking, that Congress "would provide by law for the immediate restoration of the public moneys to the Bank of the United States." But, sir, this is not the shape in which the question is presented to me, by the resolutions of the General Assembly of my State, or by the proceedings pending in this body. Those resolutions instruct the Senators of Virginia, in general terms, "to use their best exertions to procure the adoption by Congress of proper measures for restoring the public moneys to the Bank of the United States." Now, sir, I am bound to inquire, what are those proper measures, in the contemplation of the legislature of Virginia.

We all know, that the only measures proposed or contemplated, in this body, are the two declaratory resolutions offered by the Senator of Kentucky; the first affirming that the conduct of the President, with reference to the removal of the public deposits, was a dangerous and unconstitutional assumption of power; the second, declaring the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for that removal, to be unsatisfactory and insufficient. When the latter of these resolutions, together with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was referred some days ago to the Committee on Finance, that Committee did not report a bill or joint resolution for the restoration of the deposits, but simply a recommendation that the Senate adopt the declaratory resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. In short, it is now avowed and understood, on all hands, that all that is deemed necessary, or will be proposed here, to effect the restoration of the public moneys to the Bank of the United States, is a mere declaration, by Congress, of the insufficiency of the reasons assigned for their removal.

The only measures, then, on which I shall be called to carry into effect the institutions of the legislature of my State are, the declaratory resolutions moved by the Senator from Kentucky, and now depending before the Senate. That these resolutions are, in the estimation of the General Assembly of Virginia, proper measures—that the opinions and principles declared by them are believed by the General Assembly to be correct and well founded—it would be unpardonable blindness to the language and tenor of their instructions not to see. At the same time, it is well known to the Senate that, on each of the propositions declared in these resolutions, I had (and I will take leave to add, after the most careful and anxious investigation) come to opposite conclusions, which I had earnestly asserted and maintained on this floor. I am, therefore, placed, by the instructions of the legislature of my State, in this dilemma—either to vote for the declaratory resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and thereby express opinions which I not only do not entertain, but the reverse of which I have sincerely and earnestly maintained on this floor; or, by voting against them, to oppose the only measures which are likely to come before this body, having in view the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, and thus appear in the attitude of disregarding and thwarting the declared wishes of the General Assembly of Virginia. I am sure I but respond to the honorable feelings of all who hear me, in saying that the first branch of the alternative is impossible, while the latter is no less forbidden by my principles, and a proper sense of duty to the constituted authorities of my State. The only course left to me, then, is one which the Senate can be at no loss to anticipate.

Before I close the few remarks with which I have felt myself called on to trouble the Senate, I beg leave to say, that, while I recognise implicitly the resolutions just read as the legitimate and constitutional expression of the opinion of my State, I wish not to be understood as saying that they express the real public opinion of the State—that of the people. On the contrary, my firm and clear conviction is, that the sentiments of the people, in the present instance, are not in unison with the proceedings of the legislative authority. The manifestations of popular sentiment already commencing in various quarters of the State—the principles and opinions heretofore steadily cherished by Virginia—multiplied communications received from the most respectable sources—and my own knowledge, I may be permitted to add, of a people with whom I have been connected, in the relations of public service, for now near twenty years—assure me that they are not; and the revolution of a few months will, I confidently believe, render the fact manifest to all the world. But, in the regulation of my official conduct here, I am not permitted to look beyond the constitutional expression of the opinion of the State, by its regular and proper organ. If a Senator were allowed to set up against the public opinion of his State, as officially and solemnly declared by her legislature, a hypothetical public opinion, which may or may not be that of the people of the State, it is obvious that a door would be opened for the total evasion of all effective responsibility of this body to public opinion. It is on the legislatures of the States that the constitution has devolved the choice of members of this body, and the same legislatures must be the interpreters of the public opinion of their respective States to the Senators chosen by them, whenever an occasion shall arise which may call for a solemn manifestation of that opinion.

This is indeed the only practicable mode of bringing the opinion of the sovereign community, represented in this body, to act, with authoritative influence, on its proceedings; and when it is considered that the Senate is, by the greater permanency of its official tenure, farther removed from the salutary controls of the representative system than any other branch of the Government, all will see the necessity of keeping open a clear and designated channel by which public opinion may promptly reach it, in an authoritative form, and be made effectual on its deliberations. It is thus essential to the practical supremacy of the popular will itself, that the State legislatures should be recognised as the authentic and constitutional exponents of the popular opinion of the respective States, in all relations with this body. If, in any instance, the legislatures of the States shall mistake the opinions of the people, it is, as I conceive, for the people themselves, and not for us, to correct the mistake.

These, Mr. President, are, very briefly, the opinions I entertain on the delicate questions presented for my consideration by the instructions of the legislature of my State, just read; and the only alternative they leave me, in the circumstances in which I am placed, is to surrender the trust with which I have been honored, as a member of this body, into the hands of those from whom I received it. I know well, Mr. President, and I feel, how much of honor and of satisfaction I give up in abandoning my seat on this floor. I abandon what I have ever regarded the highest honor of my public life—an honor than which none higher, in my opinion, can be presented to the ambition of an American citizen. I sacrifice social and kindly relations with many members of this body—I would fain hope with all—which have been the source of the highest satisfaction to me here, and the remembrance of which I shall cherish with sincere pleasure in the retirement whither I go. I know and feel the weight of these sacrifices, but, great as they are, I make them without a sigh, as the most emphatic homage I can render to a principle I believe vital to the republican system, and indispensable to the safe and salutary action of our political institutions.

The resolutions were then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

THE PETITIONS FROM MAINE.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion to refer the memorials of the citizens of Portland and of Bangor, Maine, on the subject of the deranged currency and distress of the country, consequent upon the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States; when

Mr. WEBSTER rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: The honorable member from Georgia stated yesterday, more distinctly than I have before learned it, what that experiment is, which the Government is now trying, on the revenues, and the currency, and, I may add, on the commerce, manufactures, and agriculture of this country. If I rightly apprehend him, this experiment is an attempt to return to an exclusive specie currency, first by being able, through the agency of the State banks, to dispense with any bank of the United States, and then to supersede the use of the State banks themselves.

This, sir, is the experiment. I thank the gentleman for thus stating its character. He has done his duty, and dealt fairly with the people, by this exhibition of what the views of the Executive Government are, at this interesting moment. It is certainly most proper that the people should see, distinctly, to what end, or for what object it is, that so much suffering is already upon them, and so much more already in visible and near prospect.

And now, sir, is it possible—is it possible that twelve millions of intelligent people can be expected voluntarily to subject themselves to severe distress, of unknown duration, for the purpose of making trial of an experiment like this? Will a nation that is intelligent, well informed of its own interest, enlightened, and capable of self-government, submit to suffer embarrassment in all its pursuits, loss of capital, loss of employment, and a sudden and dead stop in its onward movement in the path of prosperity and wealth, until it shall be ascertained whether this new-hatched theory shall answer the hopes of those who have devised it? Is the country to be persuaded to bear every thing, and bear patiently, until the operation of such an experiment, adopted for such an avowed object, and adopted, too, without the co-operation or consent of Congress, and by the Executive power alone, shall exhibit its results?

In the name of the hundreds of thousands of our suffering fellow-citizens, I ask, for what reasonable end is this experiment to be tried? What great and good object, worth so much cost, is it to accomplish? What enormous evil is to be remedied by all this inconvenience and all this suffering? What great calamity is to be averted? Have the people thronged our doors, and loaded our tables with petitions for relief against the pressure of some political mischief, some notorious misrule, which this experiment is to redress? Has it been resorted to in an hour of misfortune, calamity, or peril, to save the State? Is it a measure of remedy, yielded to the importunate cries of an agitated and distressed nation? Far, sir, very far from all this. There was no calamity, there was no suffering, there was no peril, when these measures began. At the moment when this experiment was entered upon, these twelve millions of people were prosperous and happy, not only beyond the example of all others, but even beyond their own example, in times past. There was no pressure of public or private distress throughout the whole land. All business was prosperous, all industry was rewarded, and cheerfulness and content universally prevailed. Yet, in the midst of all this enjoyment, with so much to heighten, and so little to mar it, this experiment comes upon us, to harass and oppress us at present, and to affright us for the future. Sir, it is incredible, the world abroad will not believe it—it is difficult even for us to credit it, who see it with our own eyes, that the country, at such a moment, should put itself upon an experiment, fraught with such immediate and overwhelming evils, and threatening the property and the employments of the people, and all their social and political blessings, with severe and long-enduring future inflictions.

And this experiment, with all its cost, is to be tried—for what? Why, simply, sir, to enable us to try another "experiment;" and that other experiment is, to see whether an exclusive specie currency may not be better than a currency partly specie and partly bank paper. The object to which it is hoped we may arrive, by patiently treading this path of endurance, is to banish from the country all bank paper, of all kinds, and to have coined money, and coined money only, as the actual currency of the country.

Now, sir, I altogether deny that such an object is at all desirable, even if it could be obtained. I know, indeed, that all paper ought to circulate on a specie basis; that all bank notes, to be safe, must be convertible into gold and silver at the will of the holder; and I admit, too, that the issuing of very small notes, by many of the State banks, has too much reduced the amount of specie actually circulating through the pockets of the people. It may be remembered that I called the attention of Congress to this subject in 1832, and that the bill which then passed both Houses, for renewing the bank charter, contained a provision designed to produce some restraint on the circulation of very small notes. I admit there are conveniences in making small payments in specie; and I have always not only admitted, but contended, that if all issues of bank notes under five dollars were discontinued, much more specie would be retained in the country, and in the circulation; and that great security would be derived from this. But we are now debating about an exclusive specie currency—and I deny that an exclusive specie currency is the best currency for any highly commercial country; and I deny, especially, that such a currency would be best suited to the condition and circumstances of the United States. With the enlightened writers and practical statesmen of all commercial communities, in modern times, I have supposed it to be admitted, that a well-regulated, properly-restrained, safely-limited paper currency, circulating on an adequate specie basis, was a thing to be desired—a political public advantage to be obtained, if it may be obtained; and, more especially, I have supposed, that in a new country, with resources not yet half developed, with a rapidly-increasing population, and a constant demand for more and more capital, that is to say, in just such a country as the United States are, I have supposed a safe and well-regulated paper currency to be allowed to produce particular and extraordinary advantages; because, in such a country, well-regulated bank paper not only supplies a convenient medium of payments and of exchange, but, also, by the expansion of that medium, in a reasonable and safe degree, the amount of circulation is kept more nearly commensurate with the constantly-increasing amount of property—and an extended capital, in the shape of credit, comes to the aid of the enterprising and the industrious. It is precisely on this credit, created by reasonable expansion of the currency in a new country, that men of small capital carry on their business. It is exactly by means of this, that industry and enterprise are stimulated. If we were driven back to an entire gold and silver currency, the necessary and inevitable consequence would be, that all trade must fall into the hands of large capitalists. This is so plain, that no man of reflection can doubt it. I know not, therefore, in what words to express my astonishment when I hear it said that the present measures of Government are intended for the good of the many, instead of the few—for the benefit of the poor, and against the rich—and when I hear it proposed, at the same moment, to do away the whole system of credit, and place all trade and commerce, therefore, in the hands of those who have competent capital to carry them on, without the use of any credit at all. This, sir, would be dividing society by a precise, distinct, and well-defined line, into two classes—first, the small class who have competent capital for trade, when credit is out of the question—and, secondly, the vastly numerous class of those whose living must become, in such a state of things, a mere manual occupation, without the use of capital, or of any substitute for capital.

Now, sir, it is the effect of a well-understood system of paper credit to break in upon this line, thus dividing the many from the few, and to enable more or less of the more numerous class to pass over it, and to participate in the profits of capital, by means of a safe and convenient substitute for capital; and thus to diffuse, vastly more widely, the general earnings, and therefore the general prosperity and happiness of society. Every man of observation must have witnessed, in this country, that men of heavy capital have constantly complained of bank circulation, and a consequent credit system, as injurious to the rights of capital. They undoubtedly feel its effects. All that is gained by the use of credit, is just so much subtracted from the amount of their own accumulations; and so much the more has gone to the benefit of those who bestow their own labor and industry on capital in small portions. To the great majority, this has been of incalculable benefit in the United States; and therefore, sir, whoever attempts the entire overthrow of the system of bank credit, aims a deadly-blow at the interest of that great and industrious class, who, having some capital, cannot, nevertheless, transact business without some credit; and can mean nothing else, if it have any intelligible meaning at all, than to turn all such persons over to the long list of mere manual laborers. What else can they do, with not enough of absolute capital, and with no credit? This, sir, this is the true tendency and the unavoidable result of these measures, which have been undertaken with the patriotic object of assisting the poor against the rich.

Sir, I am well aware that bank credit may be abused. I know that there is another extreme, exactly the opposite of that of which I have now been speaking, and no less sedulously to be avoided. I know that bank paper may become excessive, that depreciation will then follow, and that the evils, the losses, and the frauds consequent on a disordered currency, fall on the rich and the poor together—but with especial weight of ruin on the poor. I know that the system of bank credit must always rest on a specie basis, and that it constantly needs to be strictly guarded, and properly restrained; and it may be so guarded and restrained. We need not give up the good which belongs to it, through fear of the evils which may follow from its abuse. We have the power to take security against these evils. It is our business, as statesmen, to adopt that security—it is our business not to prostrate, or attempt to prostrate, the system; but to use those means of precaution, restraint, and correction, which experience has sanctioned, and which are ready at our hands.

It would be to our everlasting reproach—it would be placing us below the general level of the intelligence of civilized States—to admit that we cannot contrive means to enjoy the benefits of bank circulation, and of avoiding at the same time its dangers. Indeed, sir, no contrivance is necessary. It is contrivance, and the love of contrivance, that spoils all. We are destroying ourselves by a remedy which no evil called for. We are ruining perfect health by nostrums and quackery. We have lived, hitherto, under a well-constructed, practical, and beneficial system—a system not surpassed by any in the world—and it seems to me to be presuming largely, largely indeed, on the credulity and the self-denial of the people, to rush, with such sudden and impetuous haste, into new schemes and new theories, to overturn and annihilate all that we have so long found useful.

Our system has, hitherto, been one in which paper has been circulating on the strength of a specie basis; that is to say, when every bank note was convertible into specie at the will of the holder. This has been our guard against excess. While banks are bound to redeem their bills, by paying gold and silver on demand, and are at all times able to do this, the currency is safe and convenient. Such a currency is not paper money, in the odious sense. It is not like the continental paper of revolutionary times; it is not like the worthless bills of banks which have suspended specie payments. On the contrary, it is the representative of gold and silver, and convertible into gold and silver on demand, and, therefore, answers the purposes of gold and silver; and so long as its credit is in this way sustained, it is the cheapest, the best, and the most convenient circulating medium. I have already endeavored to warn the country against irredeemable paper; against bank paper, when banks do not pay specie for their own notes; against that miserable, abominable, and fraudulent policy which attempts to give value to any paper, of any bank, one single moment longer than such paper is redeemable on demand in gold and silver. And I wish most solemnly and earnestly to repeat that warning. I see danger of that state of things ahead. I see imminent danger that more or fewer of the State banks will stop specie payments. The late measure of the Secretary, and the infatuation with which it seems to be supported, tend directly and strongly to that result. Under pretence, then, of a design to return to a currency which shall be all specie, we are likely to have a currency in which there shall be no specie at all. We are in danger of being overwhelmed with irredeemable paper—mere paper, representing not gold, nor silver; no, sir, representing nothing but broken promises, bad faith, bankrupt corporations, cheated creditors, and a ruined people. This, I fear, sir, may be the consequence, already alarmingly near, of this attempt, unwise, if it be real, and grossly fraudulent, if it be only pretended, of establishing an exclusive hard money currency.

But, sir, if this shock could be avoided, and if we could reach the object of an exclusive metallic circulation, we should find in that very success, serious and insurmountable inconveniences. We require neither irredeemable paper, nor yet exclusive hard money. We require a mixed system. We require specie, and we require, too, good bank paper, founded on specie, representing specie, and convertible into specie on demand. We require, in short, just such a currency as we have long enjoyed, and the advantages of which we seem now, with unaccountable rashness, about to throw away.

I avow myself, therefore, decidedly against the object of a return to an exclusive specie currency. I find great difficulty, I confess, in believing any man serious in avowing such an object—it seems to me rather a subject for ridicule, at this age of the world, than for sober argument. But if it be true, that any are serious, for the return of the gold and silver age, I am seriously against it.

Let us, sir, anticipate, in imagination, the accomplishment of this grand experiment. Let us suppose that, at this moment, all bank paper was out of existence, and the country full of specie. Where, sir, should we put it, and what should we do with it? Should we ship it, by cargoes, every day, from New York to New Orleans, and from New Orleans back to New York? Should we encumber the turnpikes, the rail-roads, and the steamboats with it, whenever purchases and sales were to be made in one place, of articles to be transported to another? The carriage of the money would, in some cases, cost half as much as the carriage of the goods. Sir, the very first day, under such a state of things, we should set ourselves to the creation of banks. This would become immediately necessary and unavoidable. We may assure ourselves, therefore, without danger of mistake, that the idea of an exclusive metallic currency is totally incompatible, in the existing state of the world, with an active and extensive commerce. It is inconsistent, too, with the greatest good of the greatest number; and, therefore, I oppose it.

But, sir, how are we to get through the first experiment, so as to be able to try that which is to be final and ultimate? That is to say, how are we to get rid of the State banks? How is this to be accomplished? Of the Bank of the United States, indeed, we may free ourselves readily; but how are we to annihilate the State banks? We did not speak them into being—we cannot speak them out of being. They did not originate in any exercise of our power; nor do they owe their continuance to our indulgence. They are responsible to the States; to us they are irresponsible. We cannot act upon them; we can only act with them; and the expectation, as it would appear, is, that by zealously co-operating with the Government, in carrying into operation its new theory, they may disprove the necessity of their own existence, and fairly work themselves out of the world! Sir, I ask once more, is a great and intelligent community to endure patiently all sorts of suffering, for phantasies like these? How charmingly practicable—how delightfully probable, all this looks!

I find it impossible, Mr. President, to believe, that the removal of the deposits arose in any such purpose as is now avowed. I believe all this to be an after-thought. The removal was resolved on, as a strong measure against the bank; and, now that it has been attended with consequences not at all apprehended from it, instead of being promptly retracted, as it should have been, it is to be justified on the ground of a grand experiment, above the reach of common sagacity, and dropped down, as it were, from the clouds, "to witch the world with noble policy." It is not credible, not possible, sir, that six months ago, the administration suddenly started off to astonish mankind with their new inventions in politics, and that it then began its magnificent project by removing the deposits as its first operation. No, sir, no such thing. The removal of the deposits was a blow at the bank, and nothing more; and if it had succeeded, we should have heard nothing of any project for the final putting down of all State banks. No, sir, not one word. We should have heard, on the contrary, only of their usefulness, their excellence, and their exact adaptation to the uses and necessities of this Government. But the experiment of making successful use of State banks having failed, completely failed, in this the very first endeavor, the State banks having already proved themselves not able to fill the place and perform the duties of a national bank, although highly useful in their appropriate sphere, and disastrous consequences of the measures of Government coming thick and fast upon us, the professed object of the whole movement is at once changed, and the cry now is, Down with all the State banks! down with all the State banks! and let us return to our embraces of solid gold and solid silver!

Sir, I have no doubt, that if there are any persons in the country who have seriously wished for such an event as the extinction of all banks, they have not, nevertheless, looked for the absence of all paper circulation. They have only looked for issues of paper from another quarter.

We have already had distinct intimations that paper might be issued on the foundation of the revenue. The Treasury of the United States is intended to become the Bank of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury is meant to be the great national banker. Sir, to say nothing of the crudity of such a notion, I may be allowed to make one observation upon it. We have, heretofore, heard much of the danger of consolidation, and of the great and well-grounded fear of the union of all powers in this Government. Now, sir, when we shall be brought to the state of things in which all the circulating paper of the country shall be issued directly by the Treasury Department, under the immediate control of the Executive, we shall have consolidation with a witness!

Mr. President, this experiment will not amuse the people of this country. They are quite too serious to be amused. Their suffering is too intense to be sported with. Assuredly, sir, they will not be patient as bleeding lambs under the deprivation of great present good, and the menace of unbearable future evils. They are not so unthinking—so stupid, I may almost say—as to forego the rich blessings now in their actual enjoyment, and trust the future to the contingencies and the chances which may betide an unnecessary and a wild experiment. They will not expose themselves, at once, to injury and to ridicule; they will not buy reproach and scorn, at so dear a rate; they will not purchase the pleasure of being laughed at, by all mankind, at a price quite so enormous.

Mr. President, the objects avowed in this most extraordinary measure, are altogether undesirable. The end, if it could be obtained, is an end fit to be strenuously avoided; and the process adopted to carry on the experiment, and to reach that end—which it can never attain, and which, in that respect, wholly fails—does not fail, meantime, to spread, far and wide, a deep and general distress, and to agitate the country beyond any thing which has heretofore happened to us in a time of peace. Sir, the people, in my opinion, will not support this experiment. They feel it to be afflictive, and they see it to be ridiculous: and ere long, I verily believe, they will sweep it away, with the resistless breath of their own voice, and bury it up with the great mass of the detected delusions and rejected follies of other times. I seek, sir, to shun all exaggeration—I avoid studiously all inflammation, and all emblazoning; but I beseech gentlemen to open their eyes, and their ears, to what is passing in the country; and not to deceive themselves with the hope that things can long remain as they are, or that any beneficial change will come, until the present policy shall be totally abandoned. I attempted, sir, the other day, to describe shortly the progress of the public distress. Its first symptom was spasm, contraction, agony. It seizes first the commercial and trading classes. Some survive it, and some do not. But those who, with whatever loss, effort, and sacrifice, get through the crisis without absolute bankruptcy, take good care to make no new engagements, till there shall be a change of times. They abstain from all further undertakings; and this brings the pressure immediately home to those who live by their employments. That great class now begin to feel the distress. Houses, warehouses, and ships, are not now, as usual, put under contract in the cities. Manufacturers are beginning to dismiss their hands on the seacoast, and in the interior; and our artisans and mechanics, acting for themselves only, are likely soon to feel a severe want of employment in their several occupations. This, sir, is the real state of things. It is a state of things which is daily growing worse and worse. It calls loudly for remedy; the people demand remedy; and they are likely to persist in that demand till remedy shall come. For one, sir, I have no new remedy to propose. My sentiments are known. I am for re-chartering the bank, for a longer or a shorter time, and with more or less of modification. I am for trying no new experiments on the property, the employments, and the happiness of the whole people. Our proper course appears to me to be as plain and direct as the Pennsylvania avenue. The evil which the country endures, although entirely new in its extent, its depth, and its severity, is not new in its class. Other such like evils, but of much milder form, we have felt in former times. In former times we have been obliged to encounter the ills of disordered currency, of a general want of confidence, and of depreciated State bank paper. To these evils, we have applied the remedy of a well-constituted national bank, and have found it effectual. I am for trying it again. Approved by forty years' experience, sanctioned by all successive administrations, and by Congress at all times, and called for, as I verily believe, at this very moment, by a vast majority of the people, on what ground do we resist the remedy of a national bank? It is painful, sir, most painful, to allude to the extraordinary position of the different branches of the Government, but it is necessary to allude to it. This House has once passed a bill for re-chartering the present bank; the other House has also passed it, but it has been negatived by the President; and it is understood that strong objections exist with the Executive to any bank, incorporated or to be incorporated by Congress.

FEB. 22, 1834.]

Sir, I think the country calls, and has a right to call, on the Executive, to reconsider these objections, if they do exist. Peremptory objections to all banks, created by Congress, have not yet been formally announced. I hope they will not be. I think the country demands a revision of any opinions which may have been formed on this matter, and demands, in its own name, and for the sake of the suffering people, that one man's opinion, however elevated, may not oppose the general judgment. No man, in this country, should say, in relation to a subject of such immense interest, that my single will shall be the law. It does not become any man, in a Government like this, to stand proudly on his own opinion, against the whole country. I shall not believe, until it shall be so proved, that the Executive will so stand. He has, himself, more than once, recommended the subject to the consideration of the people, as a subject to be discussed, reasoned on, and decided. And if the public will, manifested through its regular organs, the Houses of Congress, shall demand a re-charter, for a longer or a shorter time, with modifications to remove reasonable and even plausible objections, I am not prepared to believe, that the decision of the two Houses, thus acting in conformity to the known will of the people, will meet a flat negative. I shall not credit that, till I see it. I certainly shall propose, ere long, if no change or no other acceptable proposition be made, to make the trial. As I see no other practical mode of relief, I am for putting this to the test. The first thing to be done, is to approve or disapprove the Secretary's reasons. Let us come to the vote, and dispose of these reasons. In the mean time, public opinion is manifesting itself—it appears to me to grow daily stronger and stronger. The moment must shortly come, when it will be no longer doubtful, whether the general public opinion does call for a re-charter of the bank. When that moment comes, I am for passing the measure, and shall propose it. I believe it will pass this House—I believe it cannot be, and will not be, defeated in the other, unless relief appear in some other form.

Public opinion will have its way, in the houses of legislation and elsewhere; the people are sovereign, and whatever they determine to obtain, must be yielded to them. This is my belief, and this is my hope. I am for a bank, as a measure of expediency, and, under our present circumstances, a measure of necessity. I yield to no new fangled opinions, to no fantastical experiments. I stand by the tried policy of the country. I go for the safety of property, for the protection of industry, for the security of the currency. And, for the preservation of all these great ends I am for a bank; and, as the measure most likely to succeed, I am for continuing this bank, with modifications, for a longer or a shorter period. This is the measure which I shall propose, and, on this question, I refer myself, without hesitation, to the decision of the country.

Mr. FORSYTH next addressed the Senate. The gentleman from Massachusetts, he said, seemed to think he spoke by authority. He did not. He spoke only his own opinions, formed, not from a knowledge of the opinions of the administration, but from a careful observation of things around him. With regard to the measures of the Executive, it seemed to him there could be no mistake as to the result; it was the use of the State banks for the deposits of the public revenue, instead of the Bank of the United States; and this was all that could be said of it. But, he asked, was it not a prevailing opinion throughout the United States, that the Bank of the United States was a dangerous institution? Have we not heard from honorable gentlemen that, although they are opposed to the measures of the Executive in regard to the bank, they would strain every thing rather than have it re-chartered? Have we not heard two or three honorable gentlemen say, they are pledged to do every thing in their power to bring about a hard money currency? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts said that a national bank was necessary; that we must have one, with some modifications. But, suppose that experiment fails, what then is to be done? Will the gentleman propose some other? He had also said, that the people of the United States would not permit the funds of the country to be consolidated in the hands of the Executive. Mr. F. denied that this was, or ever could be, the case; he denied that the Executive or the Secretary of the Treasury could have any control over the national funds other than that provided by the constitution and the laws. If any more guards were necessary for the security of the public treasure, he (Mr. F.) would cheerfully and readily go for them. Was it ever pretended that the President and Secretary had any power over the finances, other than that sanctioned by law? or that they would dare to exercise the power to pervert any legislative action of Congress in regard to the public funds? And yet gentlemen assumed that the Executive had done what he had not; that he had grasped at powers which he never attempted to exercise. His sentiments, Mr. F. said, were well known; he thought that the re-charter of the bank, with proper modifications, would be highly beneficial to the country; but, said he, it is not for us to decide; the proper time has not arrived for the decision of that question; and the people of the United States have already decided, by a large majority, that the bank shall go down. But gentlemen say that a scene of distress prevails throughout the country, and the time has arrived when relief should be afforded, instead of trying an experiment. Sir, this experiment must be endured, or our institutions will cease to exist. What is the duty of statesmen? It is to prevent, by all the means in their power, the approach of evil; and, when they see that the course by which they propose to remedy it, cannot be pursued, either by the want of a constitutional majority of Congress, or the sanction of the Executive, it is also their duty to acquiesce, and propose some other.

Although he did not believe that the experiment of the Executive would be productive of evil, he had no doubt of its result. Although the experiment had been commenced against his wishes, he believed the country would live through it, and go on and prosper. The Bank of the United States was chartered in 1816, and every body recollected the condition of the country at that time. All the banks had stopped payment; the country was flooded with the paper of the State banks; they laughed at the Government when demands were made by it, and the Government was obliged to take their notes in payment of the revenue. He (Mr. F.) listened to the gentleman from Massachusetts then without conviction, though the evils now complained of are nothing compared with those existing at the time he said a bank of the United States could not relieve the country from the evils of a deranged currency. In a speech made by the honorable gentleman when the charter of the bank was pending, one position he assumed was, that gold and silver was the currency of the world; that the bank of the United States was not necessary; that the Government could, by its collections, control the currency, and that a bank ought to be regarded, not as the means to rectify the currency, but as the agent of the Government. He thought, in reference to the affairs of 1816, that if the interests of the country sustained no injury from the want of a national bank, we could do without one now. We can control the State banks now as well as then, and we have all the power now we then had. While he agreed with the gentleman that a recharter of the Bank of the United States, with proper modifications, would be useful, he looked forward without alarm to the result of the recent measures of the administration, and believed that the country would continue to prosper. He respected the opinions of those who attributed the present embarrassed state of the currency to the measures of the administration, but he believed that the loudest complaints of distress and censures of the Executive were made with a view to justify the renewal of the charter of the bank. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. CHAMBERS) said he had a right to expect a plan of the President of the United States, to relieve the distressed condition of the country; but Mr. F. thought one ought rather to be expected from the gentleman himself, and those who acted with him: for the President had already given a plan which the gentleman did not approve. He (Mr. F.) had no reference to any plan but that of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the management of the deposits, and the control of the State banks. This plan had not yet been presented to the Senate; but, he said, we have a right to have it, and the Secretary ought to be called on for it. He would make the call himself, if no other gentleman did. Perhaps the Secretary had already prepared it; and, if so, he was perfectly excusable for not sending it in until called for: he is on trial, and is not bound to speak until the trial is over. One expression of his had been noticed by the Senator from Maryland, though not in the sense he intended it should apply. When he spoke of "senseless cries," he did not speak of the cries of the people, but the senseless cries of those on this floor who complain so loudly of distress, without being ready to relieve it. He reminded the gentleman of the fable of Æsop, Hercules and the Wagoner, and would leave to him the application. The censure ought to fall on those who complained so loudly of distress, while they never attempted to relieve it. Mr. F. begged pardon of the Senate for occupying so much of their time.

Mr. WEBSTER said, the gentleman from Georgia had referred to remarks of his (Mr. W.'s) in 1816, on the passage of the present bank charter. No doubt the gentleman had intended to state their substance fairly, but he had not stated the words, but only what he supposed the import. It was not possible for him (Mr. W.) to state, upon his recollection, all that he had said on that occasion but took it for granted, however, that, taken together, it was all in full accordance with the sentiments which he had more recently expressed. He would take this opportunity of saying a few words on the occurrences of that time, as a mistake, or misapprehension, had arisen the other morning between an honorable member from New York and himself. That honorable member was understood as saying that he (Mr. W.) voted against the bank bill of 1815, to which remark he had dissented.

By the gentleman's printed observations, however, it appeared that he was speaking, or intended to speak, of the bank bill of 1816, in relation to which his remark would have been true. He believed that, in every session, except perhaps the first, after he became a member of Congress, a bill to incorporate a bank had been discussed, until the present bank was established. For some of them he had voted, and for some he had not. They came forward, under very different characters. Some of them authorized, in terms, a suspension of specie payments. All such, he had steadily opposed. Some of them very nearly resembled the bank incorporated in General Washington's time; and these he had uniformly supported. In some cases the proposed capital he thought unnecessarily large, being fifty millions. This great amount of capital he was not willing to agree to. To a well-constituted specie-paying bank, with a reasonable amount of capital, he had been favorable in all times, and under all circumstances, in peace and in war. The bill constituting the present bank underwent many changes after its introduction into the House of Representatives: the object of those amendments being to make it as far as possible a sound specie-paying bank, and to remove from it all undue influence of Government. In pursuance of this general object, a section was introduced by a gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GASTON,] with whom he was always proud to act, imposing on the bank a penalty of twelve per cent. interest, if it should, at any time, refuse to pay its notes in gold and silver on demand.

[SENATE.]

This was for the security of the public. And the section which had now been the subject of so much discussion, that respecting the deposits, was introduced on his (Mr. W.'s) motion. This was intended for the security of the bank, as well as of the public. The direct object of this was, that the Secretary should not be at liberty to remove the deposits from the bank, at his own mere will and pleasure; but only for substantial and necessary causes. Another amendment proposed by Mr. W. was to give the bank a right to bring suit in the courts of the United States. This was thought to be of some importance, and experience has proved that there was no mistake in that opinion. The general object of all these amendments was, to insure, on one hand, the full performance of all its duties by the bank, and, on the other, to give the bank itself security for all its rights, so that respectable and substantial men might be willing to take the stock, and become interested in the corporation.

There remained one other amendment, which was attempted without success; and that was, to leave out altogether the directors to be appointed by the President. No precedent for such appointment of directors had existed in the former bank, and it was easy to argue then, as he thought it was easy to perceive now, that, while, they were not likely to do much good, they might, not improbably, do some harm. He had placed a good deal of weight on this objection, perhaps more than it deserved, but, with other friends, he insisted on the omission of this provision. But other friends, again, were willing to take the bill as it stood, after the other amendments had been effected, and it became a law by the aid of their votes. Throughout the whole of these discussions, he had supported the policy of establishing a bank, on the general model of the first bank; and had constantly maintained the convenience of a national institution of that kind in peace, as well as in war. All that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Forsyth] had now stated, as having been remarked by him, was true and just, he presumed, as applied to the bill in the state in which it actually was when the remarks were made. He had heard nothing quoted, and remembered nothing, at all inconsistent with any opinions recently expressed, or now entertained by him.

Mr. W. asked pardon for having occupied even so short a time, in referring to subjects not immediately connected with the present great question, to which he would now return.

The gentleman asks, said Mr. W., what could be done if this House should pass a bill, renewing the bank charter and the other House should reject it. Sir, all I can say to this is, that the question would then be one between that other House and the people. I speak, sir, of that honorable House with the same respect as of this. Neither is likely to be found acting, for a long time, on such a question as this, against the clear and well-ascertained sense of the country. Depend upon it, sir, depend upon it, this "experiment" cannot succeed. It will fail—it has failed—it is a complete failure already.

Something, then, is to be done, and what is it? Congress cannot adjourn, leaving the country in its present condition. This is certain. Each House, then, as I think, will be obliged to propose something, or to concur in something. Public opinion will require it. Sir, negative votes settle nothing. If either House should vote against a bank to-day, nothing would be determined by it, except for the moment. The proposition would be renewed, or something else proposed. The great error lies in imagining that the country will be quieted and settled, if one House, or even both, should pass votes approving the conduct of the Secretary in removing the public deposits. This is a grand mistake. The disturbing and exciting causes exist, not in men's opinions, but in men's affairs. It is not a question of theoretic right or wrong, but a question of deep suffering, and of necessary relief. No votes, no decisions, still less any debates, in Congress, will restore the country to its former condition, without the interposition and aid of some positive measure of relief. Such a measure will be proposed; it will, I trust, pass this House. Should it be rejected elsewhere, consequences will not lie at our door. But I have the most entire belief, that, from absolute necessity, and from the imperative dictate of the public will, a proper measure must pass, and will pass, into the form of law.

The honorable gentleman, like others, always takes it for granted, as a settled point, that the people of the United States have decided that the present bank shall not be renewed. I believe no such thing. I see no evidence of any such decision. It is easy to assume all this. The Secretary of the Treasury assumed it, and gentlemen follow his example, and assume it themselves. Sir, I think the lapse of a few months will correct the mistake, both of the Secretary and of the gentlemen.

The honorable member has suggested another idea, calculated, perhaps, to produce a momentary impression. It has been urged in other quarters, and it is, that, if the bank charter be renewed now, it will necessarily become perpetual. Sir, if the gentleman only means that if we now consider the necessity, or utility, of a national bank, we must always, for similar reasons, have one hereafter. I say, with frankness, that, in my opinion, until some great change of circumstances shall take place, a national institution of that kind will always be found useful. But if he desires to produce a belief, that a renewal of its charter now would make this bank perpetual, under its present form, or under any form, I do not at all concur in his opinion. Sir, nobody proposes to renew the bank, except for a limited period. At the expiration of that period, it will be in the power of Congress, just as fully as it is now, to continue its charter still further, or to amend it, or to let it altogether expire. And what harm or danger is there in this? The charter of the Bank of England, always granted for limited periods, has been often renewed, with various conditions and alterations, and has now existed, I think, under these renewals, nearly a hundred and fifty years. Its last term of years was about expiring recently, and the Reform Parliament have seen no wiser way of proceeding than to incorporate into it such amendments as experience had shown necessary, and to give it a new lease. And this, as it appears to me, is precisely the course which the interest of the people of the United States requires, in regard to our own bank. The danger of perpetuity is wholly unfounded, and all alarm, on that score, is but false alarm. The bank, if renewed, will be as much subject to the will and pleasure of Congress, as a new bank with a similar charter, and will possess no more claim than a new one, for further continuance hereafter.

The honorable gentleman quotes me, Mr. President, as having said, on a former occasion, that, if Congress shall refuse to re-charter the bank, the country will yet live through the difficulty. Why, certainly, sir, I trust it will live through it. I believe the country capable of self-government, and that they will remedy not only such evils as they cannot live through, but other evils also, which they could live through, and which they would bear, if necessary, but which, nevertheless, being great evils, and wholly unnecessary, they are not disposed to endure. Is the gentleman entirely satisfied, if he can only persuade himself that the country can live under the evils inflicted on it by these measures of the Executive Government? Sir, I doubt not the people will live through their difficulties; and one way of living through them is, to put a speedy end to them. The people have only to will it, and all their present sufferings are at an end. These sufferings flow from no natural cause. They come not from famine or pestilence, nor from invasion or war, or any external public calamity. They spring directly and exclusively from the unwise and unjustifiable interference of the Secretary of the Treasury with the public moneys. By this single act, he has disordered the revenue, deranged the currency, broken up commercial confidence, created already a thousand bankruptcies, and brought the whole business of the country into a state of confusion and dismay. This is a political evil, and a political one only. It arises from mismanagement, entirely and exclusively. This mismanagement, this sole cause of the whole distress, the people can correct. They have but to speak the word, and it is done. They have but to say so, and the public treasure will return to its proper place, and the public prosperity resume its accustomed course.

They have but to utter this supreme command, these words of high behest; they have but to give to the public voice that imperative unity which all must hear, and all must obey, and the reign of misrule and the prevalence of disaster will expire together. Public sufferings will then be removed, by removing their cause. Political mischiefs will be repaired by political redress. That which has been unwisely done, will be wisely undone; and this is the way, sir, in which an enlightened and independent people live through their difficulties. And, sir, I look to no other source for relief; but I look confidently to this. I dare not, indeed, under present appearances, predict an immediate termination of present trouble; that would be rash. It may take time for the people to understand one another in different parts of the country, and to unite in their objects and in their means. Circumstances may delay this union of purpose and union of effort. I know there are powerful causes, now in full activity, which may not only prolong, but increase the commotion of the political elements. I see indications that a storm is on the wing. I am not ignorant of the probable approach of a crisis, in which contending parties, and contending passions, are to be intensely excited—in which the great interests of the country are all to be deeply convulsed; and which, in its consequences, may even touch the action of the Government itself. In preparing to meet such a crisis, should it come, I found myself on those great truths, which our own experience and the experience of all other nations have established. I yield to no new-fangled theories, to no wild and rash experiments. I stand, too, upon those high duties which the constitution of the country has devolved upon us; and thus holding on, and holding fast, by acknowledged truth and manifest duty, I shall take events as they come; and although these black and portentous clouds may break on our heads, and the tempest overpower us for a while, still that can never be forever overwhelmed, that can never go finally to the bottom, which truth and duty bear up.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose to make his acknowledgments to the Senator from Georgia, for the notice he had been pleased to take of his remarks. There was no great misunderstanding between them. He had asked for a plan to take the place of the one now in the course of experiment. As to any scheme of the Secretary to patch up or sustain the "experiment," he wanted none, the country wanted none. It had failed—totally failed, and he regretted exceedingly to learn that the administration considered it yet in fieri. If it would not be deemed another "senseless cry," he would ask another question of the Senator—a question to which an answer would be anxiously looked for by a suffering, distracted community. He would ask, when would the administration and the friends of the administration consider the "experiment" sufficiently tried?

Even now, we have, from those who should best know, assurances that whole classes of the community, as well as individuals, are going or have gone to ruin—that they are experiencing "great and unparalleled distress." The Government—meaning the Government proper—is believed to be travelling the same broad road. We have put the Finance Committee upon the inquiry as to the probable influence of this "experiment" upon the revenue of the nation. He supposed there could be little doubt what would be the result. If the expenditure of more than its receipts constituted national insolvency, then would this experiment produce national insolvency. Yes, sir, from an overflowing treasury, which we were not able to keep down, it is to bring us back to taxes or loans, to carry on the Government.

Now, sir, if a rapid approximation to national and individual insolvency was not considered as evidence, what, he desired to learn, would be considered sufficient evidence of the failure of the "experiment?"

He could not allow the Senator to put him into the attitude of hostility to the Presidential scheme of a Government bank, founded on the faith and revenue of the nation. He assured the Senator of his entire disposition to stand by any measure of the President which his principles would allow him to support; even any measure to secure a sound currency. As to this bank proposal, he could not have condemned it for the best possible reason, that he never was able to understand what it was. The Senator would add to the obligations already acknowledged, if he would instruct him, and the Senate, and the American public, by telling us what the scheme was—its details and particulars. He solemnly asserted, he had never conversed with an individual who could tell, and he had no very singular opinion, he believed, in doubting whether the President himself ever understood his own scheme.

Mr. C. said, it might not be amiss to put away from himself imputations currently made against members of this body, who held opinions which he avowed. He was no bank man, in the offensive sense of the term, and never was. He had never had any accommodation of the Bank of the United States, nor did he ever endorse a note discounted by it. He never held a share in it, nor had he, for something like fifteen years, ever kept an account there. Prior to that time he had made "his depositor" in the Baltimore branch—not large of course—but, from causes not necessary here to state, he had transferred them to one of the State banks.

He would further say, he was no man's man. He stood pledged to no man, and was ready to take any candidate the people might present, whose moral and political character gave assurance that he would administer the duties of office on those principles which he approved, and on which he believed depended the liberty, the prosperity, the moral and political happiness, of this great republican family. He did not expect or desire office, let who would be President; there was no office in his view—no, sir, not even "a mission to Russia," which it has been said is the common price of common political service. The Senator, censuring our continued demand for a system of relief, refers to the fable of Æsop, about Hercules and the wagoner.

Sir, that fable has no application. Not only, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has said, has Hercules put upon us the load, but we have called. The last Congress sent up their petition in the shape of a bank bill. If he had put his hand to that he would have got our vehicle out of the mire. But no, sir, Hercules was not deaf nor dumb, but very unpropitious. He was in a bad humor, and, like other angry men, turned his resentments against all around him—even against us and our supplications.

Mr. C. said there was another fable of that venerable philosopher which might be more applicable—that of the Dog in the Manger. The President will not give us a measure of his own, and he puts his veto upon ours, and when we complain that we are starving, this self-constituted ed guardian of the hay, by his friends here, calls our complaints of hunger a "senseless cry."

As, however, he had a very especial reverence for the sage whose authority was invoked, and who, he thought, had left more instruction for actual practical life than almost any other author, he would be generous to the Senator and give him two fables for his one. He would ask his serious attention to the moral of the fable of the Cat, the Fox, and the Chestnuts.

Now, said Mr. C., I do not say who is the fox. No, sir, I won't say. Nor will I say whether the chestnuts are to be burned up. But I will venture to say, that, if the chestnuts are got out of the fire, the cat will most certainly have its paws burned; and, sagacious as he is known to be, if the fox is not vastly careful, he will have his fingers scorched too.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he could tell the honorable Senator [Mr. CHAMBERS] how he could come at the result of that which he had wished to obtain; and that was, by looking to the popular elections in all the States, and in all portions of all the States. He would then discover that the people are right and he is wrong. The Senator had said that, since the establishment of this bank, he had had no dealings with it, except to make it the depository of his money, and the gentleman had said, that the sum he had deposited there was not large. He (Mr. F.) wished that he could say he had been as fortunate. He had obtained loans from the bank.

[Mr. CHAMBERS here said, that he meant nothing personal in his allusion to bank dealings—far from it.]

Mr. F. resumed. He did not consider that there was any impropriety in applying to banks for loans. When such applications are made, a premium being paid for the loan, the bank had the benefit of the premium, as much as the borrower had benefit from the use of the capital. It is therefore a contract perfectly fair between the parties.

But the honorable Senator had said, that he is no man's man. Now, how long had that been? A very little while. And he (Mr. F.) believed that he should find, before long, that the gentleman is again another man's man—in a political sense, of course, he meant. He says he has never been actuated by a love for office, or to promote the political advancement of any particular person in the State. If the honorable Senator, however, has been unfortunate in his first love, he apprehended that the honorable Senator might be actuated by a feeling of an opposite character, just as powerful, just as strong—he would not call it hatred to a particular object, for he trusted such a feeling had not entered his breast. The gentleman, like many other honorable Senators, had used this expression: "We are no man's men—we stand upon the law and the constitution." So do we all.

If the Senate would pardon him for infringing on the gravity becoming this discussion, he would relate an anecdote. In a battle with some Indians, a man of uncouth aspect was observed dodging about a tree, and firing away upon the Indians with the greatest success. He was accosted by one of his party, and asked, "Who do you belong to? Do you belong to Captain A?" "No," he replied. The battle raged on. He was observed still firing with the same success, and he was again asked, "Who do you belong to? Do you belong to Captain B?" The reply was still "No." "Then who in the devil do you belong to?" "Why, I am fighting on my own hook." They fight on their own hook.

Now he (Mr. F.) would be the last man in the Senate to attribute any thing of a personal character as operating on the conduct of the honorable Senator. But when he saw him, and other honorable members, acting in parties, disclaiming all ambition, all desire for power, he must be allowed to enter his protest against such an opinion as that other men may not be properly actuated in supporting the elevation of this or that person or party. This could not be a correct doctrine. What is the object of the honorable Senator, and those who act with him, and who say that they are "no man's men," and are fighting on their own hook? Their object is to support the true principles of the Government; their object is to obtain what they are struggling for, and they equally desire to secure the true principles of constitutional liberty.

The Senator says, he does not seek for office—nor to be the head of a department—nor even for an embassy to Russia. He, Mr. F., should think that, if through his exertions, he and his friends should be elevated into power, that it would not be improbable that the gentleman would be appointed, if not to office or to that court, to some other court or office to which his appointment would equally do honor.

It was impossible not to understand all this. Every expression that fell from honorable gentlemen went to show that a struggle for power is at the bottom of it. "The wheel is turning rapidly," says the honorable Senator from New Jersey. I am inclined to think that the gentleman will find it is not turning quite as fast as he anticipated.

Mr. F. said, honorable Senators would no doubt recollect the beautiful lines of Sir Walter Scott:

"Fortune, they say, flies from us:
She but circles, like the fleet sea bird,
Round the fowler's skiff—one moment lost in the mist,
The next, brushing the white sail with her whiter wing,
As if to court the aim: Experience watches,
And has her on the wheel."

I recommend gentlemen to watch carefully, coolly; to take good aim: neither to hold their pieces too high nor too low, and especially to take care not to overload them, lest they should be knocked down, or, as the phrase is, kicked overboard.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he was happy to find the Senator from Georgia had not received his remarks as attributing any improper motive to those who differed with him. He would repeat, that he was most sincere in disclaiming any such purpose. He was aware of the moderation and respect due to gentlemen on this floor, and to the Senator from Georgia, especially, he would be very unwilling to manifest the least unkind feeling. His proper and courteous manner claimed all respect.

Mr. C. was only on the defensive. It required no great sagacity, in looking at the signs of the times, to perceive, that one means of getting rid of the strong feelings of censure, directed against recent measures, is to cry Bank! bank! bank-man!

The Senator says the people are opposed to the bank, and the ballot-box is the index, and the "experiment" is to proceed until the ballot-box condemns it. What ballot-box was intended? Heaven forbid that we should wait until the close of the next Presidential election. Why, sir, to a business man, it is a life-time—our people can't stand it—the "experiment" will kill them dead before that day. To use the Senator's expression, we shall all be "kicked overboard" and drowned, sir, in a sea of poverty and insolvency.

But let us look to the ballot-box. There had been but one popular election since the country had the full benefit of the "experiment," and that deserved the grave attention of the Senator and his friends. He wished, with all his soul, the Senator would take care that such facts should come to the ears of the Executive. He feared there was an awful responsibility resting on those who could, but would not, carry light and knowledge into that house where he feared darkness, gross darkness, now prevailed. In the critical condition of this nation, it was of the last moment to keep open every avenue to truth, the most unpleasant truth; and wo to him who blinds the eyes or stops the ears of men in power. The election he alluded to, was held in Pennsylvania.

nia—faithful, loyal Pennsylvania. In one of the central counties, at the regular election last fall, a Jackson member of the legislature was returned, by a majority of more than three hundred votes. A vacancy having required another election, a gentleman presented himself, as the open, undisguised, avowed adversary to the administration in all its late measures, and has been elected by a majority of more than five hundred. To use the old adage, "straw shows which way the wind blows;" and he hoped the lesson would be remembered in any future speculation about the ballot-box.

Mr. KANE said he thought gentlemen treated the petitions of their constituents badly. The question was upon the reference of two memorials from Maine, addressed to Congress, and asking something to be done by that body. The general character of most of the memorials presented on one side of this question, was impressed with the belief that the deposits should be restored, or that the Bank of the United States should be re-chartered, or that both these things should be done. How have gentlemen treated these petitions? Have they proposed that either the one, or the other, or both of these measures should be adopted? So far from it, that after so much time had elapsed, there is not (said Mr. K.) the semblance of any such proposition before the Senate. These memorials and resolutions are used as the pedestals upon which gentlemen mount and shake their fists at the Executive. It seems to be considered, that, because the President has the power to direct the deposits to be returned, that therefore this body is released from all responsibility with regard to it. As to re-chartering the bank, no effort in either House has been made. The return of the deposits is a grave question. Its effects upon the present distresses, upon the local banks, upon the currency, have not been even investigated. Do gentlemen admit, that they can ask the President to do that which they themselves are unwilling formally to propose and adopt?

Mr. K. said he did not rise to go into any discussion, but to remark upon the confident predictions of the future which had been made, especially by a Senator from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS.] That gentleman has said that a state of things would arise, when no person, however elevated, would dare to act so and so. When we look into the future, and attempt to decide upon coming political results, we play the part of "little wanton boys, that swim on bladders far beyond their depth." These predictions are not very respectful to the rest of mankind, who have judgments to form, and decisions to make for themselves. Besides, sir, the destiny of all things, present and future, is in the hands of the Author of all things. The fallacy of all human predictions, as to future political results, has been abundantly shown, by the fact, that they cannot be ascertained by the use of the most reliable of all human agents—figures. A gentleman, some years ago, of high character for virtue and intelligence, the equal in all respects to the honorable Senator from Maryland, after speculating mathematically upon a political result, became so satisfied that he had arrived at the "quod erat demonstrandum," that he made not an arithmetical, but a geometrical bet upon the subject; and the issue proved that figures failed him. How vain, then, are all human calculations upon the future. And after such a failure, mathematically, we should be extremely cautious how we rely on inferior agencies.

Mr. CHAMBERS said: I made the bet, sir. I lost the bet; and, what may appear strange to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE,] I paid the bet. I do not say this because I know any thing in his private history which would lead me to suppose it strange to him, that a man should pay what he owes. I have inquired nothing about his private history. I do not occupy myself in prying into the history of members, that, after a night's sleep, I may amuse the Senate with the incidents in their private life, which my communion with the tattle or the slander of the day may have procured. This honorable occupation I leave to the honorable Senator, [Mr. KANE.] I will now tell the Senator why I made the bet, and how I lost it. I was educated in the belief, that the moral integrity and political honesty of the people were incorruptible—that they would stand by their principles in opposition to the seductions of party and office. I knew, if they redeemed this expectation, my bet could not be lost. I was confident, and staked my money on the issue: that's the why, sir. Now, sir, a gentleman just of the dimensions of the Senator from Illinois—precisely of his calibre—of his appearance—of his moral and intellectual properties—just such a gentleman, and others exactly like him, failed to redeem my expectations of their integrity and honesty, and I lost my bet: that's the how, sir.

The memorials were then referred to the Committee on Finance.

The orders of the day having been announced, Mr. FORSYTH moved that the Senate adjourn, but gave way to Mr. PORTER, who suggested that a large amount of private business had accumulated upon the table, and he therefore gave notice that he should on Friday and Saturday move, to the exclusion of all other matters, that the Senate should proceed to such business.

Mr. WEBSTER, adverting to the fact of some members having been sick, which led to the suspension of Executive business, gave notice that he should, on Wednesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, move the Senate to proceed to Executive business.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Senate then adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. SMITH said, that he had had committed to his care, with a view of their being presented to the Senate, sundry petitions and resolutions. Two of these petitions were from the town of New Haven, one signed by about 700 citizens of that place. This memorial described the sufferings and the distress under which the petitioners labored, but without going into further detail. Some delay had occurred in the reception of this petition. Finally, another meeting of the citizens was called, and took place at the City Hall, at which sundry resolutions were passed, describing the severity of the public sufferings, ascribing these sufferings to the removal of the deposits, and expressing the opinion of the meeting that the Bank of the United States ought to be re-chartered. To this last petition were attached the signatures of about 900 citizens of New Haven.

Another of these petitions was from the city of Hartford, in Connecticut, and was signed by about 300 citizens of that place. He held, also, in his hand, resolutions adopted by the Hartford Bank, in which the directors of that institution ascribed the sufferings under which the community were laboring, to the removal of the public deposits; and expressed it as their grave opinion, that the Bank of the United States should be re-chartered, with modifications.

From the Phoenix Bank he had received resolutions similar in their purport. The Connecticut River Bank, established in the same place, had transmitted to him resolutions of the like character. And he had received resolutions, looking to the same object, from the Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, a corporation of great business and high respectability.

With respect to the character of the nine hundred signers of the New Haven petition, he would beg leave to say, that they included all classes; that they were respectable citizens, and engaged in all kinds of business; and that they were economical, contented, and industrious. It was to the enterprise and industry of those citizens that the town of New Haven was indebted for its prosperity. No population of the same size through all the limits of this country were more prosperous than were the people of this town, at the moment when the removal of the deposits was made. If the gentleman from Georgia would take the trouble to go with him to the shops of the mechanics, and to the manufacturing establishments, he would find that the people there were not very great politicians; he would discover them in their stores, their warehouses, their manufactories, their shops, conducting their business with a skill which was not surpassed by that of any people under Heaven. And if the gentleman would go with him to the houses of the mechanics, if he did not find them to be splendid palaces, he would find dwellings neat in their construction, and domestic in their arrangement, as comfortable as palaces; houses reared by their own hands, painted white, and their courtyards tastefully adorned with shrubbery; and he would find these residences kept by the wives and daughters in a state of the most attractive neatness and cleanliness. Pass from the town of New Haven to the city of Hartford, and compare the habits, the manners, and the morals of the citizens, said Mr. S., and you will be convinced that a neater, a more industrious, and a more enterprising race of people cannot be found any where.

He would now say a word on the subject of the banks and the insurance company which had transmitted the resolutions he had to offer. They are institutions doing a very extensive business throughout Connecticut and the adjoining States. They are conducted by men of the first respectability, and, from long-tryed experience, fully conversant with the business and currency of the country. They speak, as it were, professionally and disinterestedly; they surely would not attempt to create alarm by joining in a conspiracy to destroy the business men of the country. They would not destroy the millions due to their institutions by creating a false alarm. They speak from a full conviction that the present measure of the administration will destroy the currency of the country, and bring incalculable evils on every class of our citizens.

Nothing short of the sense of duty imposed on me by the charge of these memorials (said Mr. S.) would have induced me to trouble the Senate, and, in the discharge of this duty, it is not my intention to give offence to any one. I shall not trouble the Senate at this time with any remarks on the resolutions introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but will confine myself to a few observations growing out of the testimony now before us.

And first: That there is great distress prevailing almost every where, can hardly be denied by any one who will open his eyes to passing events. That confidence is every where impaired cannot be disputed. All banking institutions rest more or less on confidence; and business transactions between man and man rest essentially on the same foundation. Impair confidence, and distress in the business of the community must follow. You perceive sure indications of distress in the well-established facts that those who want money cannot borrow it; in the depreciation of stocks and property of every kind; in the derangement of the currency; in the stagnation of business; and in the high price of money.

This state of things is only advantageous to the usurer, who is ready to take advantage of the distresses of others to make immediate gains. I cannot better illustrate this branch of the subject than by stating the mode of doing business in Connecticut. Our importing merchants sell the principal part of their cargoes in New York for negotiable paper at 2, 4, and 6 months. This paper is discounted at our banks. By thus anticipating the avails, they are enabled to fit out their vessels on other voyages.

Our manufacturers ship their goods to Southern ports, and draw on their agents for the probable amount, payable at a future day. These drafts are discounted at our banks. By these means they are enabled to supply their manufactories with stock, and to pay their workmen. When the notes and drafts come to maturity, they are paid in full. This course of business is mutually beneficial to the banks and to their customers. In the present derangement of business, the merchants in New York dare not purchase and give their notes payable at a future day, fearing they may not be able to honor them when due. And, if sales could be effected, confidence is so much impaired, that our merchants would not dare to sell on credit. And further, if their notes were given and received, our banks could not, in the present state of things, discount them. Nor can they discount the drafts of our manufacturers. The whole course of our business is thus interrupted, and business itself, in a great measure, destroyed. It is impossible to see such a condition of things without being convinced that distress prevails, to a very great extent, among our citizens in Connecticut.

Again: The direct testimony on the subject of the universal prevalence of distress, coming by way of petitions, under the weight of which your table groans, must be sufficient to satisfy every body that great and unparalleled distress prevails throughout the country.

That the distress thus described has been caused by the removal of the deposits, no one can well doubt. At the time this order for the removal of the deposits was given, the country was in an unequalled condition of prosperity. Every branch of business flourished in a manner beyond any former example. Immediately after the order of removal was given, confidence was shaken; alarm was excited, and the business of the country was entirely paralyzed. To what cause are we to attribute this sudden change? Gentlemen seem to suppose that it is impossible such disastrous events could result from the mere removal of the money from one side of Chestnut street to the other. He would remind these gentlemen that a few sparks of fire, applied to a mass of combustible matter, would soon mount into a blaze, and, extending with the rapidity of lightning, would wrap a whole city in flames, thus illustrating the passage, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." No other cause exists; and this is quite sufficient to produce the effect. The call was sudden, and well calculated to force in upon the bank the vast amount of its indebtedness, in bills and deposits, amounting to not less than sixty millions of dollars. The bank would be unable to meet this vast amount upon a call so sudden. The Government assumed a hostile attitude towards the bank, manifesting a total want of confidence in that institution. The people took alarm. The State banks, and all others, put themselves in an attitude of defence to resist the storm. Individuals also took the alarm, and carried in their bills to the State banks for redemption. Who can reflect upon this state of things without astonishment, that an act so calculated to destroy the bank, with its immense indebtedness, did not accomplish the object? I can tell you the reason why it failed. The bank had been, before that time, assailed from the same quarter. Its affairs, in consequence of these attacks, had been fully investigated by Congress; and the bank had been guilty of the enormous offence of causing reports and speeches, made by distinguished members of Congress, to be printed and distributed among the people. From these circumstances, the great body of the people had been enabled to examine the concerns of the institution, and had become satisfied that it was founded on a rock and could not be shaken. In my judgment, it was, in a great measure, owing to these circumstances, that the premeditated effort whereby this bank failed. Without looking at all into the question, whether these publications did treat the President kindly or not; whether the bank can or cannot find a justification for all parts of these productions, I may be permitted to remark, that, in the minds of all candid men, the bank will find an apology for a course, without which, its own ruin must have been inevitable. To my mind, it is evident that, if there had been no former attack on the bank, and the bank had not been thus put to the necessity of declaring its true condition, such an attack must have destroyed it. Many of the most intelligent men considered the act of removing the deposits as a violation of the charter of the bank, and of the faith of the Government. This circumstance gave a tremendous shock to all confidence, both public and private. Those who wanted money could not borrow it except at exorbitant interest; every article was depreciated in value, there was a general stagnation of business, and nothing but wide-spread ruin was presented to our view. When the fact was announced, that it was the intention of the Executive to commit the funds of the Government, and the finances of the country, to the management of the State banks, and that this was determined on as a permanent measure, the public mind received an additional shock. The people saw that we should be soon involved in all the distresses which were felt prior to the creation of this bank.

They were fully satisfied that the State banks were wholly incompetent to manage the fiscal concerns of the Government, and still more incompetent to sustain a sound currency; that the State banks would multiply; and, without the restraining influence of the United States Bank, would flood the country with an unsound and depreciated paper currency; that they would soon cease to redeem their bills in specie, and that the whole country would be speedily reduced to ruin. The apprehension of these evils produced great alarm, and had contributed, in no small degree, to the state of things now experienced. And believing, as I do, that the like causes will produce the like results, I cannot doubt that the time is not far distant, if this policy should be pursued, when all the evils now apprehended will be most distressingly realized. Honorable Senators, however, seem unwilling to admit that the evils of which the people complain have resulted from the measures of the Government. They say that the bank has produced the distress, by applying its screws to the people. I have sought in vain for the evidence to sustain this grave charge. I find that the Government has withdrawn from the bank about eight or nine millions of dollars—I do not pretend to speak with precise accuracy—and that the bank has called in from its debtors about the same amount. Did gentlemen suppose that the directors, acting like discreet men, could remain silent and suffer the bank to be ruined? How do gentlemen suppose the bank could pay its debts without calling on its debtors to enable it to do so? The Government have suddenly withdrawn from the bank the large amount stated, and the bank is called a monster for being prepared to meet the call. The truth is, every body must understand the bank had not called in from its debtors an amount equal to that which had been so unceremoniously withdrawn from its vaults. When the bank calls on its debtors to pay eight millions, a considerable portion will, of course, be paid in deposits and in notes of the bank. I presume, therefore, in calling in eight millions, the bank could not be furnished with available funds to meet more than half the amount so withdrawn. To meet the call of the Government for eight millions, the bank would be compelled to call on its debtors for a much larger amount, probably sixteen millions. In this view of the subject, it appears to me the bank has conducted with great lenity. Some gentlemen seem to have imbibed the idea, that it was the object of the bank to involve the whole country in ruin. I have not been able to find a single fact to support this charge. It would, indeed, require strong evidence to convince me that the directors of this bank, with an indebtedness to them from the business men of the country of about sixty millions, would enter into a conspiracy to destroy their debtors and the whole community, and thus involve themselves in utter ruin. Every motive which was ever supposed to actuate men, in refutation of such an idea. I might be induced to believe that a body of men could be so wicked as to combine to destroy others, but it would take much to convince me that they would so coalesce to destroy themselves.

It is urged, again, that the bank has grossly offended by going into the business of President-making, as it is called. I have already alluded to this subject, and have elucidated the motive of the bank in causing certain pamphlets and speeches to be printed; and I think they have already experienced the benefit of enlightening the public mind in regard to their situation. It is by this means the bank has saved itself from ruin, by the sudden act of the Government. But if the bank was really guilty of improper conduct, the charter had provided a remedy by seire facias. The President or Congress might have ordered the writ. The bank, then, would have had a fair trial before a jury; if found guilty, the charter would have been decreed forfeited; but, without judge or jury, the bank is now condemned. In other words, the President is accuser, judge, juror, and executioner. This state of the case shows rather more power than I should relish any where. Again: If the President does not choose to adopt the legal remedy, and try the bank, on account of the shortness of its existence, is it not strange that it should never have occurred to him that humanity seemed to require that a little time should be allowed the bank to make preparation for death? Nothing, it seems, would satisfy him, but an instantaneous and a violent death. Again: I should require some evidence to convince my mind that these directors have engaged in President-making. If they have been charged with a design to make fat dividends, as had been alleged, or that their whole powers were engaged in money-making, I should more readily believe such a charge, because I should know that the prevailing propensities of such men would be more likely to lead to such a result. The directors of banks are not generally found engaged in party conflicts, or in President-making; they are usually occupied in looking after their debts, and making dividends to their stockholders. A very different class of men are found engaged in President-making—men who are too lazy to work, and who wish to live by office. Suppose you should observe a miser intent on counting his bags of gold, would it ever occur to you that the man's mind was intent on President-making, or on any but the one absorbing topic? Without detaining the Senate any longer on these points, I think it is sufficiently apparent that great distress prevails, and that this distress has been brought upon the country by the removal of the public deposits.

I now wish to examine the evidence which is before the Senate and the country, as to the true reason which has induced the President to make the order which has caused such wide-spread ruin. I shall not go into the examination of the reasons which the Secretary has assigned for the measure. Those reasons belong to the discussion on the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which had already occupied so much time. I have considered the examination of those reasons of no importance, because I consider it as clear that the Secretary, in carrying this measure into effect, was not governed by any one of them. I do not wish to consume time in examining reasons which we must all know, from the facts before us, could have had no influence on the measure. Those reasons may divert the public mind from the true reason. And for this purpose, it exhibited no small ingenuity in the Secretary to throw them out. A measure attended with consequences involving a great and prosperous nation in universal distress, must require, for the justification of the Secretary, evidence that some great good was to be gained, far overbalancing all the evils which have been described, so that, on the whole, the people would be gainers. Or he must show that some great national calamity was impending, which would be averted by the measure; and that, on the whole, the people would be gainers by taking the present suffering, to avert evils of more serious importance. A wise statesman in such a crisis, would conduct like a skilful surgeon, when called to amputate a limb. He would inquire whether the limb could not be saved, and the life of the patient preserved; if not, it would be the part of prudence to amputate the limb, and save life.

The Secretary of the Treasury, then, fully acquainted with the whole business of the community, and standing in an elevated position, overlooks the whole community, and observes that the country was enjoying as sound a currency as any people ever possessed, and that they were in the possession of a state of prosperity never before experienced by any people. He further discovered that, if he signed the order for the removal of the deposits, the people would be at once precipitated into a situation of gloom and distress never before felt since the days of the revolution. He pauses and inquires "What great national calamity will be avoided by the measure?" On an attentive examination, he finds none such will be avoided. The next inquiry, I presume, made by the Secretary at this interesting crisis, was, "What good can result from the measure?" Upon carefully examining this part of the case, he would doubtless be satisfied that the bank had, at all times, conducted as fiscal agent of the Government, with the utmost fidelity; that the deposits were perfectly safe, much more so than they could be in State banks, which were of uncertain stability, and over which he could have no control. At this point of the inquiry, I have no doubt the Secretary came to a solemn pause and asked, "Shall I sign this order, which is to bring such wide-spread ruin on the whole community, and this, too, when no possible advantage can be gained and no one evil avoided by it?" Yes, most unfortunately for the country, the bank had incurred the displeasure of an individual, who had declared that he took the responsibility. That individual required the act to be done for the gratification of his own feelings, and it was done in obedience to his mandate, and the people were thus involved in ruin and distress.

In the midst of these sufferings, the people are crying for relief; they think that the restoration of the deposits will tranquillize the public mind, and restore confidence. The feelings of the same individual will not permit any alteration or relaxation of the measure; it must be sustained, although the whole country is ruined. I have heard of the appearance of One in our world who laid down his life to save his people, but I have never yet heard of a great and prosperous people willing to be destroyed to gratify the feelings of a single individual. All the facts and circumstances attending this case plainly show, that the act of the Secretary was not voluntary, but that it was done on compulsion. If, instead of writing a book of reasons, the Secretary had simply stated to the community that it was with the greatest regret that he had been compelled to inflict so deep a wound on the public prosperity, but that it was not his own act, he would have gained universal credit with the people. I have no doubt the Secretary is an able lawyer, and such is the character I have always heard of him; but the best lawyers are sometimes in the habit of consulting counsel in their own cases. If the Secretary had done so, I have no doubt that his counsel would have told him to put his defence before the people on the plea of duress. The question, then, would have presented a case in law of a novel character. If a man is compelled to sign a deed to save his life, the act is void, and the person not responsible. I will not say that the principle involved in the case which I have put, is precisely parallel with the Secretary's case. In both cases, however, the act was done by compulsion; but here the difference arises, if, indeed, there be any difference: the act is done, in the one case, to save life, and in the other, to save political existence. If the Secretary had not put his name to the order, he would have become politically dead. Political life is as dear to some men, as natural life is to others; and why an act done to save the former should not be entitled to as much protection as if done to save the latter, I cannot understand. I do not mean, however, to give any opinion on the law arising in this case, but only to ascertain the facts, which I trust I have done.

Again: There is another view of the subject arising out of the facts in this case, which, I have no doubt, will go far in exculpating the Secretary. Without meaning to decide anything myself, I will only state it. The fact is this: the Secretary was blown into existence by the breath of power, for the sole purpose of performing this act, and if he had not performed it, he would not have answered the end and purpose of his being, but must have departed from the law of his nature. Here the Secretary might say, "I have conformed, in all things, to the law of my creator, and this is much more than my accusers may say."

In every view of the subject, I have no doubt the Secretary has mistaken his plea, and so palpable is this error that I think justice can never be done without granting him a new trial.

One word on another point, and I have done. It is said the Government is about to make an experiment—to return, as far as possible, to a hard money system. Return to a hard money system, with a host of State banks, over which the Government has no control, and that without the check of the United States Bank to prevent immoderate issues. Such a thing is preposterous. Hard money will not be degraded by circulating in the same community with a depreciated paper. It will be hoarded. An experiment to return to a hard money system. Was there ever a period when we have enjoyed more of a hard money system than during the existence of the United States Bank? The system which we have enjoyed has given us hard money if we preferred it, or bills if we preferred them, for the convenience of remittance. That system which gives at all times to the people hard money when they require it, and bills when they require them, is a hard money system good enough for me, and I think the people will consider it good enough for them. If the honorable Senators who have spoken with so much rapture upon the experiment about to be tried of returning to a hard money system, had told the people that they were returning to a rag money system, they would have obtained universal credit. It is my most ardent desire that the people may be deterred from any experiment which is so calculated to bring distress and ruin upon them.

But we are to try an experiment to return to a hard money system. Even the sound is most delightful. If Senators, engaged in trying experiments, will stay the current of this beautiful river which is flowing by us, I may become a convert to the project of returning to a hard money system—but not till then.

The petitions and resolutions were then laid on the table—Mr. SMITH postponing his motion to read them, in consequence of the arrival of the hour for the special order.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order being Mr. CLAY's resolutions, &c., when

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[FEB. 24, 1834.]

Mr. TYLER rose, and began by saying, that if any man expected that the chief Executive officer of any country, whatever the form of Government over which he might preside, or whatever his conduct, would want supporters and advocates, he was blind to the lights of history, and ignorant of the nature of man. In other countries, the reverence habitually paid to the monarch, and the fact that he is the copious fountain from which honor and profit alike flow, would never fail to surround the throne with supporters. Here, while these considerations operate to some extent in producing similar results, the spirit of party comes in as a powerful auxiliary, and many who have assisted in elevating the President by their suffrages to his high office, can but with difficulty bring themselves to question the wisdom of his acts, or soundness of his policy. Thus it is, sir, that men of great moral worth and of unquestioned patriotism have been found, in all that has passed of our history, as they will be in all that is to come, rallying to the defence of the President whenever his conduct of public affairs shall be brought into question. Every expedient will be resorted to that honor can sanction, if not to justify, to excuse his conduct. His past services will be recounted, and if he has won renown in the embattled field, his battles will be fought over again and new lustre be given to his exploits, and every effort made to obscure the errors of the present by the splendors thrown around the past. To render inaudible the voices of those who call into question his conduct, and complain of violated law, they are assailed in their turn, and when argument fails, the war of appellatives begins. They are called alarmists and agitators, and are charged with being actuated by unwholy motives. These expedients but too often succeed, and errors in the administration of affairs come to be ratified which but too frequently destroy the very foundations of free government. In this country, happily for the human race, these expedients have failed on two memorable occasions—in the ever memorable era of the revolution, and in the great civil revolution of 1800. In regard to the first, that illustrious man who has been referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOSTER] as the great ancestor of my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. PIERCE], upon whom his mantle descended, when Lord Dunmore, the then royal governor of Virginia, seized upon the arms which had been provided for the use of the colony, and Henry at the head of his volunteers demanded their restoration or an equivalent in money, there were not a few who denounced him as a Catiline or a Cromwell. But, sir, his warning voice was heard throughout a continent, and the chains forged for America were shattered into atoms. So too, when violent hands were laid upon the press, and an effort was made to abridge the freedom of speech, those who called into question the constitutionality of these proceedings were denominated alarmists and agitators, and in my own State it was said from high authority that there existed a party "that must be crumbled into dust and ashes."

And now again, when a complaint is urged of proceedings new in our history—of the assumption of powers not conferred by law—of laws abrogated and annulled, and of a Treasury under Executive control, established by no law, and sustained only by his will, we are told that there is no danger, and a lullaby is sung to lull the people into repose. Sir, in every violation of law there is danger; but when that violation amounts to a breach of the public faith—no matter to whom pledged—when it grasps the exchequer and places it under Executive control—when the trial by jury, guaranteed by the constitution, and the judicial authority, are set at naught, who can doubt but that there is danger—the greatest of all possible danger? What more is left to be done which will not speedily follow to change the whole character and structure of the Government?

If such be the nature of the late proceedings of the Executive Department, can any man find his apology for ratifying them in the mere fact, that the Bank of the United States is a great evil—that it ought never to have been created, and that it should never be re-chartered. For one, I say, if it is to die, let it die by law. It is a corporate existence created by law, and while it exists, entitled to the protection which the law throws around private rights—if its privileges can be lawlessly seized upon, what security exists for individual rights. The rights of the bank are the rights of individuals—and shall it be held to be a justification for violent proceedings against it, that in the estimation of the President it is dangerous to the community—a monster of such powers that it should be suppressed. For the President to make this the ground of his proceeding is truly alarming. To ratify his claim to powers on this score is to arm him with all power—with the power over life and death—to punish all offenders whose offences he may consider dangerous to the community. No one can doubt but that treason is most dangerous, and that the traitor is a monster in human form, who has forfeited all claim to existence; but who would dare propose to confer on the President, by direct action, the power to punish him with death, without a trial before a court and jury? and yet if there be any thing in the argument, he is already armed with that power.

This, sir, is the aspect in which I regard this question; and this, I am instructed to say, is the light in which Virginia regards it. If this be its true light, need any advocate of human liberty—any friend to the institutions handed down by our ancestors, be surprised that the State I represent should remonstrate against it in the most solemn terms? When was it that her people ever failed to raise their voices under similar circumstances? Examples of her devotion to principle might be cited without end, but one will suffice, as it will most fully show with what tenacity she has opposed arbitrary proceedings in a case where the best and the purest erred. A banditti prowled over one of the counties of that State, headed by a man of the name of Philips; they committed every manner of enormity—concealing themselves by day, they reappeared, like ravenous wolves at night to glut on crime—houses in flames lighted their way to rapine and to murder. The helplessness of infancy and of old age—the accents of supplication and prayer proceeding from the lips of innocence, furnished no security. The civil authority had lost its power—nor was the military more successful in its efforts to arrest these monsters. The legislature felt itself called upon to act, and it passed an act of outlawry against this audacious and criminal leader, and set a price upon his head. Tell me, sir, if here was not a case calculated to test the devotedness of that people to the great trial by jury—to the forms of regular judicial proceeding. Tell me, if you can well conceive of a case which more fully justified the assumption of extraordinary authority on the part of the legislature, or was better calculated to enlist a people in its advocacy; and yet that people clung to the trial by jury—the fair and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage, and the sentence of the legislature was reversed by public sentiment as dangerous to civil liberty, and Philips underwent his regular trial in a court of competent authority. And now, sir, when that same people complain of the assumption of power by the Executive—when they complain of a chartered privilege seized upon and forfeited without trial and without cause, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania talks of new Virginia, and advises all who want to change their opinions to migrate thither. Will the Senator pardon me for urging him speedily to migrate thither, not for the purpose he has stated, but a far different one. If he will permit me to be his political doctor, I advise a change of climate as necessary for the honorable Senator to render him fixed in his opinion either in favor or against the bank. Two years ago the honorable Senator voted to re-charter this very odious monster, the bank, and his State legislature was unanimous in favor of the re-charter. Now, sir, the Senator is against the bank, unless it is made a question between Chestnut street and Wall street, then the Senator would act as lieutenant to Commodore Biddle, and stand up boldly for Chestnut street and give up the whole fleet of bank canoes without hesitation. Now, sir, Virginia is exactly where she has always been, against the assumption of power by the Congress or by the President. Her instructions to me convey the information that she is against the bank, as she has always been—and she is pleased to find that Pennsylvania will stand by her side, so long at least as the wind blows from the quarter it now does. What effect a change of wind will produce I leave the future to determine.

We have been furnished, sir, with numerous citations, which gentlemen have called precedents, to justify the late proceedings. If a Secretary of the Treasury has introduced into his report, made years ago, a single expression which, by construction, could be made to bear on this matter, it has been paraded. Every hiding place of the Treasury Department has been ransacked for the purpose of discovering some Herculean manuscript which might bear on this question. If gentlemen had been successful in prosecuting their researches, they would have accomplished nothing worthy of their labor. Precedent is the poorest reliance under any circumstances. It may be found to justify every act, however bad, in private or in public life—and yet, what would be thought of a private citizen, who, upon being arraigned in a court of justice for an offence against the law, should rest his defence upon the fact that this or that man had done the same thing before him? If a private individual should not be permitted thus to excuse himself, shall a public agent be permitted to do so? Sir, the strict accountability of public agents is one of the securities of the people against mal-administration: and if one Secretary is permitted to do wrong because another may have done wrong before him, wrong is heaped upon wrong, and error upon error, until propriety and truth and virtue shall have been buried under the foundation of the pyramid thus erected.

This cannot, must not be. To admit precedents to explain away the constitution and law, is to elevate the act of the mere agent above both the constitution and the law.

The argument derived from precedent, and used by gentlemen, is suicidal. How would the question of the constitutionality of the bank stand if precedent is to be relied on? What becomes of the praises bestowed upon the President for his veto of the bank bill two years ago? Twice has the bank been chartered by the approbation of all the constitutional organs of Government. Thrice has it passed the two Houses of Congress—and not to speak of subordinate tribunals, once, if no more, has it received the solemn sanction of the highest court known to our judicature. If, sir, the mere obiter dicta of Secretaries, added to the loose expressions of members of Congress in debate, be sufficient to ratify the recent proceedings of the Executive, how shall I and others who think with me upon the constitutional power to create a bank, be sustained? What a solemn farce are we guilty of when we commend the President for the exercise of his veto. For one I utterly renounce this argument as unsound—and the President, who has more cause than any living man to remember the adage, "Save me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies," should utterly repudiate it.

Sir, he came into office on the principle of reform. He was to be a very Thesaurus, destined not only to pierce the labyrinth of error, but to destroy the monster—to draw his vigor from the stream of change—to collect from the past the scattered fragments of defeated innovation, and lead them against the future. And yet, how ludicrous the figure he is made to cut; drums and trumpets announce the coming of this great reformer. His banner waves above his head with Reform inserted in large characters upon it, and yet, when he opens his lips, the only cry which issues from them is Precedent, precedent, good or bad, sound or unsound—still Precedent, precedent.

I will not stop, then, to examine the precedent which gentlemen have hunted up. To one, and to one only, shall I allude; and that, because my humble name is connected with it. I mean the report made by a committee of the other House in 1819, of which I was a member. I stand here to justify the course adopted by that committee. Two of the five who composed it, are long since gathered to their fathers, and, let me add, that two more estimable men never lived. Of the remaining three, I am alone in a situation to rescue our motives and intentions from the misconstruction which has been attempted to be cast upon them. Nothing in that report justifies the effort which has been made to convert a sentence of it into the declaration, that the Secretary possessed unlimited power over the deposits. No, sir, we looked only to the safety of the deposits when we declared "that the committee have not recommended the adoption of any immediate measures to correct the many evils they have depicted, because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy whenever the situation of the bank shall require it;" and in the next sentence, we express the opinion that the exertion of his power will be called for, unless a change of directors shall be made by the stockholders connected with a change of measures; and such is still my opinion. The situation of the bank, at that time, was one of extreme peril. Of the $15,000,000 of public stock subscribed, all had been parted with but $500,000, and the mother bank, and all the branches, had less than $3,000,000 in specie. The discounts to individuals were of the most enormous character, and nothing short of a change of policy, and a change of directors, could have saved it from bankruptcy. To this we looked when we spoke of the power of the Secretary, and nothing else. Our subsequent conduct places this beyond all question. Numerous, flagrant, manifest violations of the charter had taken place, and to correct these, we looked only to Congress. The chairman (Mr. Spencer, of New York) and myself advocated the issuing of a scire facias, never for a moment believing that the Secretary of the Treasury could do more than watch the condition of the bank, with a view to decide on its safety as a place of deposit.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] has referred to the speech which I delivered on that occasion as justificatory of the course pursued by the Secretary upon this occasion. Nay, sir, I understood him as representing me as having conceded to the Secretary absolute power over the subject. Now, I deny that there is a single expression in the whole speech which countenances such an idea. I regret that the honorable Senator had not read it with more attention. My poor opinion can have no influence over the opinions of others; but if a single sentence in that speech can be arrayed against me on the present occasion, then, sir, I am willing to acknowledge myself guilty of inconsistency. There is no such sentence.

These are the false lights which are exhibited by gentlemen here to decoy our footsteps, and to mislead the people. I shall notice but one other, before I enter upon the only question which we are called upon to decide. That claims attention because of its having emanated from the President himself. I mean the anonymous letters addressed to the President, and which could have found their way to the press only by his consent and approval. This must be manifest to all men; they were letters addressed to him—belonging to him—and could only have been obtained for publication from him. Why has this been done, sir? What could have led the President of the United States to have made public these miserable letters? Could they have excited his fears or apprehensions? Or did he feel himself so hedged in by the difficulties of his situation, as to seek to awaken the fears or the sympathies of the people in his behalf, by the exhibition of such “a raw head and bloody bones?” What a reproach upon the people of this country, to suppose that any man of sane mind would play the assassin; or that a man intending assassination, would apprize his intended victim of his purpose, and of the very day selected for its accomplishment. Sir, if this expedient is to have any effect over the public mind, how remarkable is it, that my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had not thought of resorting to it last winter. How many converts to nullification might he not have made. Sir, I have understood that he was daily threatened, and that on one occasion, by way of intimating to him that the President’s doctrine of constructive treason for opinion’s sake, as put forth in his proclamation, would be executed on him, a parcel of hemp was forwarded to him under envelope, and I am not sure but that Haman’s gallows was drawn at full height, with a nullifier dangling in the air.

I am done with these expedients, and proceed to the examination of the true and only questions which are properly before us; and the first is, Has the Secretary proceeded justifiably in having removed the public depositories from the Bank of the United States?

In examining this question I shall proceed upon admissions universally made. It is conceded on all hands, that the moneys were entirely safe in the bank; that no change could benefit the treasury; that the bank had fulfilled all its engagements to the treasury; that the currency was in the soundest possible state; that the Government holds $7,000,000 of its stock; and that its notes were receivable every where, in payment of Government dues. Now, sir, with these facts, would not a foreigner of intelligence, unconnected with party, be surprised to learn that it was seriously contemplated by the Secretary of the Treasury to change the place of deposit? Would he not naturally inquire into the object or motive which could influence a financier in executing such an intention? But, sir, how much would his surprise be increased when he should look into the provisions of the act of 1789, and have therein developed to him the reasons which influenced Congress to create the Treasury Department, and to call into existence the Secretary himself. Let us look into that act. [Here Mr. T. read from that act.]

He continued: It is made the duty of the Secretary to superintend the Treasury, and to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and better management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit. Mark you, sir, to prepare plans—not to adopt them, of himself. This is the law of his creation: the act which called him into existence. By it a limited sphere is prescribed for his action: the Treasury Department is his only theatre; and his only character is that of a financier. Has this law ever been abrogated, or repealed by legislative sanction? No, sir, never. It stands now upon the statute book, unpealed; but its provisions and requisitions have been trampled upon by the Secretary. In what particulars has he obeyed or fulfilled it? Instead of submitting his plans to Congress he has put them in force of his own mere will; and in the very face of this law, claims authority to have done so. For the sake of the argument, let this be conceded to him. Has he adopted measures to improve the revenue? So far from this, he has diminished the revenue, and incurred the hazard of devolving on the Treasury an annual debt of $350,000. Heretofore the dividends on bank stock have amounted to somewhere about $400,000 annually. What will they be in future? Does any man believe that the bank will or can declare a dividend of any amount after the next six months, unless its relation to the Government be changed? In the mean time an annual interest is paid by the Government on its stock held by the bank, of $350,000; and this result is produced at the very moment that the Secretary tells us that we may expect a deficiency in the revenue next winter, and that new taxes must be resorted to in order to supply it. Nor does the mischief stop here: the value of the stock itself is diminished 20 or 30 dollars in every hundred in value; thus bringing on the Government and country a loss of $2,000,000 of its capital, and loading it in all probability with an annual debt of $350,000.

Has he introduced a better system of management? Will any man pretend to say so? Could any facilities be desired, not actually furnished by the bank? It only required that the Government should intimate its wish in regard to any portion of the revenue, and that wish was obeyed. The large funds annually collected in New York were, by the silent and unseen operations of the bank, distributed all over the country, at the pleasure of the Secretary. The waters of this copious fountain were conveyed, by the conduits of the bank, in their utmost freshness, to the remotest parts. Could more have been desired by the Secretary? Has he, I repeat, improved upon this state of management? Let the experience of the country answer the question. That he has introduced a much worse condition of things, no impartial man can doubt.

Has he given greater stability to public credit? That can only be done by a rigid adherence to public faith. If a man violate a contract into which he has entered for a valuable consideration, all confidence is lost in him by the public; so it is with Governments, in a more especial manner. Public faith is the very breath of their nostrils; public credit rests on public faith, and confidence in the fidelity in which a Government fulfils its contracts, is the life-blood that nourishes and sustains its credit. Sir, that confidence is as sensitive as the spider in his web to every passing gale; the breath of suspicion agitates it, and the hand of violence destroys it. I put it to every man to say, if confidence in the good faith of the Executive department has not been shaken by the recent proceedings? Submit this bank charter anew to Congress—should we adopt it with the 16th section unexplained and unamended? Submit it to the people in its present form—would no reluctance be felt in subscribing to its stock, with the experience of recent movements staring them in the face? But, sir, is the same confidence felt now in the Treasury operations as formerly? Are the Treasury agents which have been adopted by the Secretary, possessed as fully of the public confidence as those which he has displaced? No man will say so—no man can say so.

Take his own assumptions over the currency and the public convenience into the view, I ask emphatically, if he has improved the currency or advanced the public convenience? Let the distresses which are every where complained of, answer the question. Let the depression in the price of all domestic products, the gloom which surrounds us, the lamentations every where heard, respond to the inquiry. Sir, they do respond in a voice of the deepest reproach. They charge, and truly charge, this financier with having failed to effectuate any single object of his existence—with having wholly disregarded the very act of his creation, and that alone by which he exists—instead of being a prop to the currency and Treasury, with having made war upon both. Sir, it has been said that there is no new thing under the sun; but when, before, was a systematic warfare made upon the public Treasury of a country, by the man standing at the head of the finances. Sir, for his conduct in reference to the currency, I admit the existence of a memorable example in history—Wood's miserable half-pence for Ireland, in the reign of Queen Anne—a scheme which was exposed and ridiculed, and finally put down by the celebrated Drapier's letters; but the attempt to destroy the Treasury, by measures calculated to overthrow it, is exclusively due to the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Under what pretences have these things been done? I can scarcely approach this part of the subject with becoming gravity. Not content to move in his legitimate sphere, he quits the orbit prescribed by law, throws aside his account books, lays down the financier, and assumes the judge. After adjusting himself in his new position, he takes up the bank charter, and, in all form, passes a judgment of outlawry and excommunication against it, and rests upon the sixteenth section for his justification. And what a spectacle for a law-loving people to contemplate is the court thus constituted: the proceedings altogether ex parte—the Secretary, judge and juror—the testimony, scraps from newspapers and secret reports—the prominent charge, an interference with newspaper editors and designs to bring the President into disrepute—and the President of the United States, the accuser. To render the proceedings every way more imposing, the judge has his opinion already written in his pocket; and to render its production more certain, the President whispers in his ear, "Mine is the power of removal," and flourishes in his eyes his letter dismissing Mr. Duane. Truly, an august tribunal—verily, a proceeding worthy the admiration and approval of a free people; doubtless it will be ratified by the Congress, as a decided improvement in judicial organization. Sir, when we can bring ourselves to condemn the trial by jury as too old fashioned to be longer observed—when we shall have blotted from our memory the whig principles of our illustrious ancestors, then we shall approve it, and not before. No, sir, we want no innovations upon our customs; they are identified with all that is glorious in history, and the people of my State, at least, will be ready to exclaim, I trust, as one man, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutare.

Do I not insult your understandings, by asking if Congress, by the sixteenth section of the bank law, could have intended to have invested the Secretary with these powers, and thereby to have changed his character from that of a mere financier, into that of a judge? The question is answered by the inquiry whether it was intended to 'abrogate the act of 1789. Sir, the two acts cannot stand together under the construction attempted to be placed on the last. The very end and object of the first is annulled and abrogated by these few words, "unless the Secretary shall otherwise order and direct," if he right in his assumption of powers under them. He may diminish the revenue as he has done—he may substitute mismanagement of the finances—abolish public credit, and affect the currency, all of which he has done to a greater or less extent; unless those words are construed as a means placed at his disposal to accomplish the objects of the law of 1789. Any other interpretation is contradicted by the fact that the charter has denied to the Secretary all means of arriving at a correct knowledge of the operations of the bank, except in connexion with the revenue. The means to enable him to decide upon the solvency of the institution, are ample, but they go no farther. He may require statements of the amount of the capital stock and of the debts due—of the money deposited therein—of the notes in circulation and specie on hand. This is the information for which he may call, and this information enables him to decide upon the solvency of the institution—but what can he know officially beyond this? Nothing more than any other man in society. He can appoint no agent to inspect the books, institute no official inquiry beyond this—and if he acts with any other view than to inform himself of the condition of the bank, he acts with no more authority than a mere private individual. Congress retained to itself the power of a grand inquest, and to originate a proceeding by scire facias. It would not trust itself to pronounce a final judgment against the bank for violations of charter. It recognises two parties to this contract, the Government on one side, the stockholders on the other. For either party to decide absolutely, was to place the other at its mercy, and it wisely left controversies which might arise, to be settled by an impartial jury. It must have been foreseen that to place the bank at the mercy of Congress was to make it a political engine—and to render it the mere creature of party. How much greater the danger to invest the Secretary of the Treasury with unlimited control over the deposits? Sir, even in case Congress ordered a scire facias against the bank, the Secretary would act most unadvisedly to withdraw the deposits, so long as they were perfectly safe. What if there were a final decision in favor of the bank, where would the Secretary find his justification? It would be hanging before trial—the punishment of the guiltless.

To show more forcibly, if possible, the consequences to which ex parte decision of violation of contract might lead, let gentlemen reverse the picture. What if the bank stood before us in the situation in which the Secretary stands this day? What if it had declared a violation of contract on the part of the Government; and under pretext thereof, had refused to make a transfer of funds to some exposed part of our territory, when they were wanting under circumstances of the greatest emergency—should we be at any loss to foresee the consequences? How would the indignation of gentlemen boil over against it: how loud would be the denunciations which would be uttered; and yet, the Secretary seizes with strong hand on one of its most valuable franchises—deprives it of a privilege guaranteed by its charter—dispenses with the trial by jury—disappoints in so doing the very object and end of the law creating him, and without which he would have no existence, and we, the representatives of the faith and justice and honor of the country—the vigilant sentinels over the laws, are required to pat the Secretary on his back and pronounce the sentence of "Well done good and faithful servant."

Sir, I have been reared in an abhorrence of arbitrary power; and whether exerted by the imperial monarch on his throne, surrounded by his myrmidons, or by an official agent in our free republics, that feeling still predominates. I conclude, then, that the Secretary had no authority under the law to have acted as he has done, and that he has therefore been guilty of a flagrant assumption of power. The examination of his reasons in the view which I have taken becomes wholly unnecessary. There are one or two of his accusations against the bank manifesting so much of fatuity that I cannot pass them over in silence. He complains loudly of the discretion vested in Mr. Biddle over certain funds of the bank for the publication of such documents as he might think necessary to have printed in defence of the institution. Although the expeditures thus made are to be regularly accounted for to the directors, and have been so accounted for, yet the Secretary is horror-struck at the magnitude of the power with which Mr. Biddle was invested. When the Secretary urged this as a dangerous power—as of great and alarming magnitude, he had forgotten the length, breadth, and depth, of his own discretionary power, according to his construction of it: a power to change the Treasury established by law—to regulate the currency—to alter, regulate, and control all the moneyed affairs of the country—to effect commercial exchanges—to diminish the profits of industry in all its departments—to deposit where he pleases the immense revenues of the United States. What operation of industry but has felt the effects of these tremendous powers claimed by the Secretary, and put, upon his sic volo, into practice? The ship upon the high seas—the farmer with the implement of husbandry in his hand—the loom and shuttle—nay, every walk of life, has been visited by his policy, and yet, he to mouth that men as honest as himself, or as any others, should have control over a penny-post affair. “Upon what food hath this our Cæsar fed, that he hath grown so great.” Financier—judge—juror—executioner; and yet declaiming against the directors of a bank as guilty of great misconduct for investing their president with a prescribed control over their moneys. I desire not to speak harshly of the conduct of any one, but I could not fail to be struck with this feature in his report.

Nor is the charge against the bank, of a design to corrupt the press, of a character less extraordinary, as emanating from any member of this administration. I do not mean to approve the loans which have been made by the bank to two or three editors—I would not have the press tampered with from any quarter. It is the medium of communication between the Government and the people, and should be kept free from improper influences. But did the Secretary reflect on what he was urging? Had he eyes, or was he blind to the course adopted by this administration, in regard to newspaper editors? Had he not heard of the fat bonuses—the many snug, fat federal offices bestowed upon editors? Why sir, “their name is legion.” They swarm over the whole land—you can scarce walk the streets but that you encounter them at every corner. So much are they the decided favorites, that if one be nominated to this body for office, and rejected, no matter for what cause, the newspapers speedily announce the fact of his appointment to some other station, not rendering it necessary that he should be again nominated to the Senate. The charge brought against the bank is similar to that brought against the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] when he filled the State Department, for having turned out half a dozen public printers. The very welkin was made to resound again with the clamor which was raised. The liberty of the press was to be destroyed, and freedom overthrown—and now, those “by authority” gentry constitute an elite corps from Maine to the Gulf of Mexico. No, sir, no tampering with the press—let it be what it should always be, the sentinel on the watch-tower—unawed by fear, uncorrupted by money. To the people, and to the people alone, should it look for support. It is their sentinel; and if they suffer it to be approached by Executive favors, or awed into silence by Executive frowns, they will indeed be their own worst enemies. If, however, the hated alternative be money or force, I would prefer the latter. The first corrupts, the last can but intimidate, and a man relying on a jury of his countrymen might mock at any effort to frighten him from the conscientious discharge of his duty. But I quit this branch of the subject, and pass on to an examination of the subsequent conduct of the Executive. The Secretary has assumed the power of establishing at his own will and pleasure Treasury agents; in other words of establishing a Treasury of himself. Whence has he derived this power? Does he derive it under any statute of this land? When I turn to the act of 1789, I find no such authority. By that law the Treasurer is directed to receive and keep the public moneys, and for the faithful performance of his duty he has to execute bond with security, conditioned not only for his own fidelity, but for that of the agents to be by him appointed. He is responsible for the safe keeping of the public funds, no matter where he may place them. The treasure is placed under bolts and bars, which he alone can remove. This was the law up to 1816, when his responsibility ceased as to all such sums as were placed in the bank; but the moment the Secretary ordered that the moneys should no longer flow into the bank, that act was again revived and put in force as to all the revenues of the country. Upon this subject I indulge in no speculation. Here is the statute book and here is the law. Is this law now in operation? If not, who has repealed it? Let facts decide. An agent is appointed to inquire into the terms on which contracts can be made. Contracts are made by the Secretary, and the money committed to such banks as he has thought proper. Is the Treasurer responsible for their safe keeping? If not, of what force is his bond, or for what purpose is it taken? Is it taken to ensure that he shall at the hour of ten in the morning take his comfortable arm chair and occupy it until three? Can such things pass by us as a summer cloud and not affect us? Every State in this Union requires bond and security of its Treasurer, and yet the immense revenues of this country are committed to the Secretary's hands without security, and for aught I know without responsibility.

It is urged, I know sir, that the Treasurer's bond is too small in amount to furnish any substantial security. If there be force in this, I demand to know by whose act has it been rendered too small; was it not large enough while the bank was the Treasury? No man doubts it. But sir, if the Secretary believed the security insufficient, should he not have considered of that before he moved the deposits from a place of acknowledged security? He makes them unsafe and then it is gravely urged as a reason for the assumption on his part of legislative power that they are so.

These things are done by command of the President, and he takes all the responsibility which arises from them. I care not who takes the responsibility; I must declare it as my firm persuasion that powers have been assumed which the constitution no where confer, and acts committed without sanction of law. By these assumptions the President holds in his hand the public purse. He places it where he pleases and appoints such subordinate agents to keep the public money as he pleases. In reply to this, we are told that there is no danger, no danger—that he has used none of the public money for his own purposes. Sir, we are discussing these questions as statesmen and looking only to political effects. I speak of the President, not Andrew Jackson, when I ask if it be true, that he has used none of the money for the advancement of Presidential power. Sir, all the revenues of the country are devoted to this object by these proceedings—an army of retainers is created in the officers and stockholders of the State banks. Is the Presidential power only to be considered dangerous when he is at the head of an army? Patronage is the sword and the cannon by which war may be made on the liberty of the human race. Is power won only by armies; money is more powerful than armed men. So long as the spirit of liberty exists, there is no danger from the last. If driven from the plains she has still a retreat in the mountains. In their gorges and fastnesses she may still make good her cause—and not until those gorges and fastnesses shall be filled with the bodies of the dead, will her glorious flag be struck. But what can brave men do to guard against the effects of money and patronage? They work silently and almost unseen. They make sure their advances by corruption. They gradually undermine the public virtue, the match is then applied and the mine is then safely sprung, and the edifice of human liberty scattered into atoms. Can any thing serve more strongly to demonstrate this power thus assumed by the President, than the conditions into which many banks have entered in order to obtain a small pittance of these revenues—or if you would see the influence of money over the concerns of the world, go to your distressed and suffering cities, and inquire out the man of the greatest power and influence there at this moment—you will be pointed to the rich broker and money lender—men look up to him for salvation from bankruptcy and ruin. Sir, give the President control over the purse—the power to place the immense revenues of the country in any hands he may please, and I care not what you call him, he is "every inch a king." Republics have been overthrown by causes apparently small. Cæsar paved his way to power by distributing from his immense private resources largesses among the people. Pisistratus presented himself in the midst of the Athenian people, covered with wounds which he had voluntarily inflicted. His countrymen surrounded his person with a body guard of but thirty men, and they paid the forfeit of their liberty. But, if history fails to enlighten us, let us go to fiction, and from the melancholy tale of King Lear learn the lesson of true wisdom, and never voluntarily surrender into other hands the public power.

I have argued these questions without reference to the power of removal. Upon the nature of that power great differences of opinion have always existed. I find, in No. 47 of the Federalist, p. 437, Alexander Hamilton reasoning upon it as an admitted fact, that the consent of the Senate was required both to appoint and remove. And in the debate which took place in 1789, exalted names are found on both sides. I mean only so far to express an opinion upon it to as say, that if properly exerted to get rid of incompetent or unfaithful agents, it is beneficial in its results. But if used merely to bestow rewards on favorites and to punish opponents—if the offices of the Government shall be considered but as "spoils" to be distributed amongst a victorious party, then, indeed, sir, the consequences are most fatal—all stability in government must be at an end—novices are introduced in the place of long-trying, experienced, and faithful public agents; and the public interests necessarily suffer, and suffer severely. Nor is this all: the acrimony of political conflicts increases to an extent truly alarming. The public mind is kept continually agitated, and to obtain a little quiet, the people may sooner or later be brought to change their form of government. The Presidential power is thereby swollen beyond all just bounds—operating perpetually on the hopes and fears of men, his will comes to take the place of law; nor would there be a secure refuge even in the courts of justice. True, he could not evict the judge, but by his power over the marshal he could pack the jury. If a man was charged with high treason, no matter upon what charge, whether because he was a seceder or nullifier, or had propagated other doctrines not suited to the President's taste, and such interference with the marshal took place, what are we to expect would be the course of his partisans? Instead of a condemnation of his course should we not probably have denunciations against treason and the traitor, as we have now against the bank? At the moment we are called on to concede to the President a control over the Treasury and over the currency—when we are called upon to ratify acts committed in violation of law, we are told of the monster, the bank. Its want of popularity is to be played off in justification of all this. Sir, if a federal officer, under the President's orders, had entered the bank, throttled Mr. Biddle, and turned him and the directors out of doors, the same cry might have been raised. Do gentlemen think that they can blind the people to the true question at issue. They deceive themselves, in my opinion, most grossly.

I am against the bank, not because it deals in exchanges to the amount of $250,000,000. No, sir, I should as soon complain of the ocean for furnishing facilities of intercommunication between distant nations, or of the ships which bear the rich freights of industry from our own to distant lands, as to complain of any other agent employed in furnishing similar facilities to the exchanges of the country. Nor am I insensible to the beneficial influences it has had over the currency of the country; but I oppose it because it is unconstitutional, and that is reason enough. If the constitution authorized its creation, no man, with the experience of the past, could well doubt the propriety of a well-regulated and well-guarded bank, due reference being had to the condition of the banking system; but no benefit, however great, should lead us to make an inroad on the constitution, except by amendment in the manner pointed out by that instrument. Although no system resting on the State banks for its execution can be as well executed as through the agency of the United States Bank, yet sir, I would prefer to rest on them to acting without constitutional sanction. If my opinion could have any influence over the country, my advice would be, restore the deposits and amend the constitution. Such amendment is called for by numerous considerations. This contest has continued long enough; its agitation has never failed to produce disastrous results; whatever affects the currency affects every interest of society. Why shall this dispute be periodically continued; let it be settled in one way or the other by the States; and settled permanently. The question of bank or no bank has been always made a political stepping stone—ambition seeks to vault into the Presidential saddle through its influence. Sir, it is the last subject which ought to be handed over to politicians; there is too much of distress produced by its agitation; the interests of the country are too nearly connected with the currency to be eternally made the subject of political speculations. Another happy consequence would result: peace and tranquillity would be imparted to the public mind, particularly to the South. That region can never acknowledge the mere majority-principle in this Government—that principle which may at its pleasure elevate expediency above the constitution. Other reasons equally powerful will be found to operate when this subject comes to be examined. Sir, no injury can accrue by submitting the question to the States. Such States as already consider the power legitimate might adopt amendments, with declarations to that effect, in a spirit of harmony and conciliation. Restore the deposits and thereby repair the violated faith of the country, and the constitutional amendment may be obtained, if the States so will it, in due season.

Sir, I am not to be frightened by the declaration, that a restoration of the deposits leads to a recharter. I believe no such thing. The removal of the deposits has done more to produce a recharter than all other causes combined. If the President had rested on his veto, the bank was dead, dead beyond the reach of surgery. He held its destiny in his own hands. The charter expires in March, 1836, while General Jackson continues President until March, 1837. What becomes of the reason assigned for the removal under this view of the subject? Was it necessary, after the Percy was dead, for the President to imitate the conduct of Falstaff, and inflict a new wound upon its lifeless body, lest it should rise again?

Yes, sir, this was esteemed necessary. More justly speaking, he saw it in its last agonies, produced by the exertion of his constitutional authority, and yet he is not content. He rushes upon it—seizes upon one of its privileges, one of the limbs of its corporate existence, and throws it into convulsions. If a man be permitted to undergo gradual decay, he sinks into the arms of death almost without a struggle—but introduce a subtle poison into his veins when he is in perfect health, and he writhes in agony. Such has been the effect produced upon the community by the violence against the bank. The President, in his first inaugural, pledges himself to consult the lights held out by the examples of those who had preceded him in the administration of the Government. Has he done so, sir? He had the bright, the glorious examples of Jefferson and Madison before him, and yet he rejected them both. The old bank expired in 1811—Mr. Jefferson went out of office in 1809, only two years before the charter expired. His opinions relative to the constitutionality of the bank were firmly fixed, and yet did he order his Secretary to adopt hostile measures against it? Did he deem it necessary to forestall public opinion, by curtailing its beneficial influence? Did his Secretary make war upon it two years and a half prior to its expiration? Did Mr. Madison adopt any such policy? No, sir, exactly the opposite. The best understanding was entertained with it. Mr. Gallatin used it advantageously to the public, even after the charter had expired. A considerable amount of the public money continued with it after that period. Every expedient was adopted to give it an easy and tranquil death. The interests of the community were thus best consulted, and so quietly and peacefully did it expire, that scarcely a paroxysm attended its exit. I know that it has been said, that that bank was nothing to this in its power over the country. This is a mistake, designedly put forth to mislead the public sentiment. Our population was then but half what it is now, and a debt then of 20 or 30,000,000, was equal to a debt of 50 or 60,000,000 now, so far as the community is concerned. Sir, the course of the President has raised up friends to this bank, which otherwise it would not have had. Every day that the deposits are withheld, their number increases. There is a principle in the heart of man which causes him to revolt at injustice and violence. Moreover, a state of deep distress has been produced, which is but too well calculated to drive men into an advocacy of the bank, who would otherwise be opposed to it. The torture of the mind is more insufferable than the torture of the body. A brave man may bear with fortitude the pain and anguish inflicted by the engines of destruction, but he may start back from the image of bankruptcy. He may not be able to endure the picture of a distracted wife, and of starving children. Men laboring under bodily or mental torture, are but too apt to fly to any expedient for relief. Let us remember the reply of Felton, who, being subjected to torture, to force a discovery of his accomplices, exclaimed to the judges, "Apply not the torture to me, lest, in my agony, I accuse even your lordship."

In answer to all these considerations we are told of the great power of the bank. Sir, is there no danger from power in any other direction? Are gentlemen blind to the power of the President? In its mildest form it is immense—look into the Blue Book—count up the numbers of his retainers—of those who live only by his smile, and perish by his frown—here are 40,000 public officers of the Government. The Dukes of Burgundy who agitated Europe in the times of the Henrys of England and the Philips and Louises of France, could not count so many. The Earl of Warwick, the king-maker of England, had not one-fourth so many. Shall we swell this enormous list by adding the power over the purse and the currency? Do so, and no limited monarch in the world is more powerful. What then would it avail me to go back to my constituents with the declaration that the bank is powerful and must be strangled per fas aut nefas—and that, in doing so, I had by my vote added kingly powers to the Presidential office? No, sir, my answer is, as is that of Virginia, spoken through her legislature, If the bank must die, let it die by law. Then sir, if sacrifices are to come, we should be prepared to meet them. They would come, not as a consequence of violated law—not to swell executive power—but in vindication of the constitution. By that will I stand. But I will justify or answer for no act of misrule—no violation of a charter solemnly granted.

The first and prominent step taken by the President, in order to accomplish these unfortunate purposes, was the eviction of Mr. Duane from office, under circumstances which can find no justification. It is the duty of the President to see that the laws be faithfully executed. How has this duty been fulfilled? The law invested the Secretary with a discretionary power. He was required to exert a full and free discretion over the subject; and, while forming his opinion, the President was bound to see that no obstacle was interposed to prevent a free and unbiased judgment. If any private citizen had intruded into Mr. Duane's office, and by threats of violence, or offers of reward, had sought to control his judgment, it would have been the duty of the President, if necessary, to have caused his expulsion from the office. The law then would have had its full force, and the free unbiased judgment of the Secretary would have been pronounced. But no private individual commits the intrusion. The President himself interposes; and, as far as was in him, operates on the Secretary's discretion, seeking to make it subservient to his will. Shortly after Mr. Duane came into office, he exacts a promise from him to resign, should he not be able to agree with the President in opinion. Was this calculated to leave him a free and unbiased agent of the law in making up his opinion? How was it likely to operate, and what must have been Mr. Duane's reflections upon it? By differing with the President, he forfeited a high office. Station, and rank, and power, all were to be surrendered, in the event of non-compliance. I speak not of the mission to Russia, which was offered in the event of a resignation, but of the actual fact of an interference on the part of the President, with the free and deliberate formation of an opinion by the Secretary, by and through the influence which the promise to resign was calculated to produce. Was this to execute the law in its spirit and meaning—to see that the Secretary was untrammelled in forming his judgment? I speak not now of the power of removal, after judgment formed. I speak only of that uncontrolled deliberation, necessary to the formation of an unbiased judgment. This was what the law required, and this was what the measures I have adverted to, were calculated to prevent. Gentlemen may make the power of removal as broad as they please, yet it will not shelter the President from the consequences of an abuse of that power. The results which have flowed from it, show that it was a power greatly abused. There is a wide difference between the power to do a thing, and the rightful exercise of that power. And if I have demonstrated that the removal of the deposits has taken place in violation of law, and it be conceded that Mr. Duane was removed in order to produce that result, the abuse of the power of removal is rendered flagrant and manifest.

Sir, the King of England, being regarded as the fountain of justice, had full power to remove the judges of England at his will and pleasure. They decided but in his name, and were his substitutes on the bench—and yet what has been the sentiment of all mankind in regard to Charles the Second, for having exerted that power in order to obtain a forfeiture of the charter of London. I regret most deeply and profoundly that that cause should form so exact a parallel with this as it does. The King had arbitrarily prorogued Parliament. The corporate authorities of London sent in an humble petition to His Majesty, remonstrating against the prorogation and ascribing many of the evils under which the kingdom labored to that act. For this the king resolved to obtain a revocation of the charter, which could only be done through the courts. The means by which it was effected are thus described by Burnet, in his History of his own Times:

"When the matter was brought near to judgment, Sanders, who had planned the whole thing, was made chief justice—Pemberton, who was not satisfied in the point, being removed to the Common Pleas on North's advancement. Dolben, a judge of the king's bench was found not to be clear: so he was turned out, and Witkins came in his room—with such instruments and by such means, was the charter of London declared to be forfeited." Here, sir, McLane is advanced from the Treasury to the State Department, and Duane for a season brought in, but like judge Dolben, is speedily removed for obduracy, and Taney is appointed in his place. Nor does the analogy stop here. The main charge urged against the corporation of London was an attempt to bring the king's government into disrepute. Here, the charge against the bank is an interference in elections and an attempt to bring the President into disfavor—the analogy between the cases is almost perfect. Sir, the king and his sceptre, with all his glittering train, have passed away, but history, true to itself, has recorded this case of the king against the city of London, along with the sentence of the court, to testify to future generations, that power wrongfully exerted, is tyrannical, odious, and unjust.

Mr. Jefferson's name has been introduced into this debate, for the purpose of giving countenance to these proceedings. Let me rescue the memory of that great man from these imputations. I have been reared from my earliest infancy in the deepest reverence for him. From the period of his being a student of William and Mary College, to the moment of his death, he opposed himself to arbitrary power in its every form—and to quote his name in support of these strange proceedings is almost enough to wake him from the grave. I have already commented on his course in relation to the bank, during his administration—and exhibited a striking contrast to the courses adopted by this administration. He was the enemy of arbitrary power. To quote his name in justification, or even in excuse, of these proceedings, is to do his memory the greatest injustice. One illustrious instance of the great indisposition he had to enlarge his powers, is to be found in the history of the times in which he lived.

A predatory war had been made on our commerce in the Mediterranean, by the corsairs of Tripoli, until, at last, a public armed ship of the United States was attacked by a public armed ship of that Government. The battle was sanguinary, but victory decided in favor of our gallant tars, and the Tripolitan ship was captured. Here was a case in which no one would have been apt to have questioned the conduct of the President, if he had treated her as a prisoner of war—but far different was his conduct. He restored her and her crew to Tripoli, because Congress had not exerted its power by declaring war, and making known his proceeding, sent in a message to Congress, recommending a declaration of war forthwith. Such was that great man's respect for the power of Congress, that even in a case like that, he felt himself restrained from acting without their formal authority. But here, within sixty days of its regular meeting, for no one good reason which has been or can be given, this strong proceeding has been adopted by the President, and that too, when the vote of the previous Congress had given him full reason to believe that it was opposed to the measure.

No man ever came to the administration of public affairs with brighter prospects of success than General Jackson. He was borne into office upon a popularity sufficiently strong to have enabled him to have placed on an enduring basis the institutions of his country. In the language of command he might have written upon them in imperishable characters, Esto perpetua. The times called for a man incapable of fear, yet under the control of no passion—bold in his course, yet meditating the best means of advancing the public good—resolute in his purpose, yet calm and deliberate in council—soaring above the petty views of party, and looking out upon the wide expanse of domestic affairs with an eye undimmed by prejudice—leaning upon the shoulders of no favorite, a policy fatal to all who have been called to high trusts, but summoning to his aid the highest grade of talent which the country could afford—rebuking and holding in check every effort to introduce a system of mere personal warfare—elevating to a pure and cloudless region the constitution and laws above the petty cavils and carpings of the hour. How in all these the President has acquitted himself, an impartial posterity will determine. My own opinion is that the proceedings of the last and present winter have not added to his fame. The principles contained in his celebrated proclamation, so utterly at war with all his previous declarations—the demand for armed men to put down a State, and to desolate her fair fields with war and death, before every peaceful expedient had been resorted to to quiet and appease her well-founded discontents—armed by the Constitution with patronage and power, as if for the very purpose of bringing them to bear in such a crisis, and yet no effort made to dissipate the gloom which had settled upon the country—and instead of the olive branch, a naked dagger and a bloody bill. To the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) and to him alone, are we indebted, for dissipating the deep gloom which hung upon the country—I might say for the preservation of the Union. A blow struck, and it would have resounded throughout the world—a drop of blood shed, and its stain would have been so deep that all the future could not have erased it. In this glorious work that Senator had able coadjutors. He who had been charged with the disposition to dissolve the Union, [Mr. CALHOUN,] met his advances, and peace was restored to a distracted country, and when those clouds had dissipated and new hopes had unfolded their blossoms, they are nipt and withered by these uncalled for and unwise proceedings. Sir, these things are calculated to make us pause—to wean us from idolatry.

We are continually told of the necessity of preserving the republican party. Such, sir, has been my constant effort since I have been in public life. I regard its preservation as connected with the preservation of the Union and of liberty. To its principles, I have continued to cling with all my soul and with all my strength. But I will tell the Senate and the country, to what republican party I do belong—to that which brought Mr. Jefferson into power—which rests upon the federative principle—which rebukes every assumption of authority not warranted by the constitution—which proclaims the inviolability of law, and the strict observance of public faith. To this party do I belong, not to that nondescript, patch-work, mosaic party, which meets in conventions, and calls itself the republican party. Not to that party which changes its principles as the chameleon its color, with every cloud or ray which proceeds from the Presidential orb—which is one thing to day, another to-morrow, and the third day whatever chance may make it—nor to the republican party which plays off names against men, calling one the father of the American system, for the purpose of affecting him in a particular quarter, and yet goes in advance of him upon that very system—denounces the tariff, and yet votes for and sustains the tariff of 1828; that bill of abominations—not that republican party which denounces the bank and upholds the proclamation—which denounces the bank and sustains the force bill—which denounces the bank, and even now sustains the President in his assumption of power conferred neither by the laws or constitution. No sir, I belong not to that "republican party." Its work is that of President-making. Even now it is in motion. Before the President is scarcely warm in his seat—not yielding to what decency would seem to require—not even permitting one short year to elapse, that party is in full march—calling conventions, organizing committees, and seeking by all manner of means, at this early day, to commit the people. But I will tell them, Mr. President, in the language of holy writ, that "the race is not to the swift." They are too much in advance of that question. The people will demand some short breathing time, and when the proper time arrives for them to act, I trust sir, that they will look only to high considerations in selecting an agent to fill the highest office in the world, because conferred by a free and intelligent people. I hope that they will select the individual most capable of advancing the public good, whether he be the favorite of this or that man who may be high in office. With that business, I have nothing to do, I hope the country will have nothing to do with it, until the vital questions which now engage us shall be settled on a proper basis. And sir, I, as one of that people, express it as my opinion, that, unless those questions be properly settled, we may talk of a constitution, but we shall have it not—we may boast of our laws, but they will be impotent and feeble—we may sing of liberty, but it will be the song of the bird in the cage.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the several petitions and resolutions presented yesterday, by him, from the State of Connecticut, on the subject of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and the state of the currency, were read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

NEW JERSEY RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the resolutions adopted at a county meeting of the citizens of Cumberland county, in the State of New Jersey, and the memorial of the same meeting, containing eight hundred and ten signatures, on the subject of the distressed condition and deranged currency of the country, which they ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration.

Mr. F. said: This memorial is signed by eight hundred and ten of the respectable citizens and voters of the county of Cumberland, in the State of New Jersey, composed of both political parties. The county meeting, to which the resolutions refer, also consisted of supporters of the President, and of those opposed to him, without party distinction. Sir, I believe the people of the United States are now satisfied of the true character of the issue that is put before them for trial. The clamors and misrepresentations of the press cannot longer disguise it. It is the most eventful struggle that has met us since the day of the revolution. The people are rising in their strength to try this momentous issue. It is not the mere question of bank or no bank; but, whether the constitution and law of the country, or Executive will, shall prevail. Sir, I am willing to stand or fall with the result. If the people shall yield up their palladium to the control of Executive discretion—if they consent to be defeated, I have no wish to represent a fallen, humiliated community—I should greatly prefer the honor and the consolation of a private station, and would, of choice, flee to such a refuge. And I, therefore, heard, with some surprise, from the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORRESTH,] whom I regret not to see in his seat, the expression of his fears, that the wheel would not turn fast enough for me. Sir, I do not feel that I need the sympathy of the gentleman's fears. I am satisfied with the motions of the wheel; and, whether whirled off, or held on, I am content. I would advise the honorable Senator to regard other revolutions. I think a wheel is turning at the South also—and, if gentlemen do not heed its motions, they may be left where the champion in an Indian battle, according to the Senator, once stood, "fighting on their own hook."

Mr. F. then moved that the memorial and resolutions be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON referred to the remark of the Senator from New Jersey, in reference to the conviction that had now become general in the public mind, as to the true cause of the public distress. I think, sir, said he, that not only are the sufferers now satisfied that the removal of the public treasure from its proper depository has brought ruin and bankruptcy upon them, but, from a recent development, it is evident that the eyes of the President himself are, and always have been, fully open to the consequences of his own favorite measure. We all remember, that more than twenty gentlemen of the first respectability in that city which is the proudest ornament of Pennsylvania, after bearing to Congress the memorial of more than ten thousand of its citizens, praying that the public deposits might be restored to the Bank of the United States, waited on the President, for the purpose of explaining the grievances of their constituents; and that they have published to the world the result of their interview, in a detailed report made to the freemen of that city on the 22d inst. They state in that report, sir, that, at their interview with the President, he "admitted that considerable distress had followed the action of the Government, in relation to the deposits. He had never doubted that brokers and stock-speculators, and all who were doing business upon borrowed capital, would suffer severely under the effects of the measure; and that all such people ought to break." Henceforth, sir, let all those who, on this floor or elsewhere, have denied the existence of any pressure on the country, or who, confessing its existence, have assigned the wrong cause for it, to protect the miserable purposes of party, learn, that they have mistaken their cue; that the object of their idolatry himself, disclaims their defence, denounces their subterfuge, boldly avows that he foresaw all the consequences of his act, and that the very object of it was, that "all who were doing business upon borrowed capital," should be ruined. They "ought to break," says he. He "never doubted that they would suffer, and suffer severely." He felt no sympathy for any but those who, rolling in wealth, are the "cankers of a calm world and a long peace;" doing nothing; or those who, placed by fortune above the disasters of the times, are doing business on their own capital.

Sir, in my opinion, a more aristocratic sentiment never disgraced any branch of this Government. Who are all those who were doing business on a borrowed capital? The Executive denunciation includes three-fourths of all the laboring men in the nation—the mechanics, the tenantry, the manufacturers, and all but the office-holders, and that portion of society which, if there be such a thing as an aristocracy of wealth in this country, can be classed most properly under that designation. As one of those who, like most of my associates here, began life on a borrowed capital, and who are not now, and never will be, ashamed to acknowledge it, I avail myself of this, the earliest possible opportunity which has offered since I read this report, to express in my place, and in the face of the whole country, my utter abhorrence of the sentiment which the President has so unblushingly avowed. The Chief Magistrate has ventured to class the whole mass of the real workmen of the nation with the stock jobbers of the times, and to express his satisfaction at the distresses he has caused them. Who is that member of this body that shall dare to stand forth and defend this sentiment? No man here doubts that it is truly reported. If there be any such as will either defend this sentiment, or deny that it was uttered, let us hear him. It is time the people understood the true issue they are about to try. It is time, sir, that an opportunity should be fairly given to the poor and the middle classes of men, in this nation, to prove to the world whether they lack gall to make oppression bitter. Whether they merit the taunts of an oppressor who has dared to tell them they ought to break. If that issue shall be fairly understood, I have no fears for the result of the trial which such jurors shall decide, and I anticipate, with a degree of pleasure which I will not now venture to express, the approaching determination of the freemen of New Jersey herself, by which it shall be refused to my honorable friend, who offered this memorial, to retire from that station which he has so highly honored and adorned, since his first introduction on this floor.

The memorial was then read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

[SENATE.]

TROY (N. Y.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Troy, New York, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and deranged currency of the country, which they attribute to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States.

Mr. W. said he would not detain the Senate by making any remarks whatever on the subjects embraced in the memorial, other than to say that it was couched in highly respectful language; that it contained the signatures of one thousand seven hundred and thirty persons, and from his acquaintance with many of them, he believed them to be highly respectable. He had submitted the memorial to a member of the House, who represented that district, and who, from his knowledge of the memorialists, testified to their respectability.

Mr. CLAY suggested that the names be also printed with the memorial. While he was up, he would take the occasion to say that he had received information from the most authentic sources as to the character of the memorialists who signed the memorial. He understood they comprised the great body of the business men of one of the most thrifty places he had ever seen; that they comprehended men of all parties. The vote of the city of Troy was 2,200, and this memorial contains 1,730 signatures. From this simple fact, the inference would be irresistible, that it must comprise a great portion of men of all parties.

He (Mr. C.) thought it proper to say thus much as to this memorial; and if an opportunity should present itself to-day, he would make a few observations in connexion with this subject. Whilst up, he would take the occasion to express a wish that the gentleman who had the floor to-day would waive his right to it, in order that the Senate might proceed to the consideration of the various memorials which were now on the table, relative to the deep distress that is now pervading the country.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that, as to the respectability of the memorialists, he had made as strong a remark as he could make; he accorded to them all the respectability that the Senator from Kentucky could desire. He wished it to be fully understood that this matter was not to be viewed exactly as had been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky. He (Mr. W.) had submitted the names of the memorialists to a member of Congress from Rensselaer county, State of New York, who had looked them over carefully, and told him (Mr. W.) that he knows at least nineteen-twentieths of the individuals, and that he should think a large portion of them had signed the memorial from political feelings. That gentleman had authorized him (Mr. W.) to state that of the 1,730 individuals who had signed the memorial, there could not be more than 100 who had voted for the present administration.

The memorial was then read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

NORTH CAROLINA MEMORIAL.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM, the memorial presented by him some days since from the citizens of North Carolina on the subject of the finances and the distressed condition of the country, was taken up; the question being on the printing of the memorial, and its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. M. rose and said, that he had, upon a former occasion, moved to lay this memorial and resolutions upon the table, to enable the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed in the debate upon the principal question. Remarks having been made by several gentlemen, which, in his judgment, required a specific notice, he gave that direction to the subject with the view of resuming the consideration of it, at as early a period as the state of the business and the convenience of the Senate would allow. No earlier occasion having offered, he would now proceed to bestow that brief notice on the subject, which the remarks of gentlemen seemed necessarily to suggest. The resolutions came in a form so usual, and withal so unpretending, that he had not expected they would receive more than a passing notice. They had, however, elicited much debate, and had been assailed on various grounds; and especially that they had emanated from partisan zeal, and had been vindicated, if not conceived, by a disappointed political character. Something was said of "pot-house politicians," and "miserable petitions." Mr. M. said he had stated, upon the presentation of the resolutions, that they had been adopted, as he had been informed, without distinction of party, and that they might be regarded as embodying the sentiments of a large majority of the intelligent and substantial freemen of that fine and prosperous region of North Carolina. He had, since that statement was made, availed himself sedulously of all the means of information within his reach, and he had seen letters that morning; and the result had been to add strength to his first impressions, in reference to the state of public sentiment in the mountain region of North Carolina, and to enable him to state, with confidence, that a similar sentiment pervaded a large majority of the entire State. The resolutions did not, therefore, in his opinion, emanate from partisan feeling and party prejudice, but were the result of a strong sense of the general inconvenience, not to say distress, brought upon that portion of the country by the usurpation and abuse of power on the part of the Executive.

Mr. M. said his information deceived him most grossly, if, throughout the whole State of North Carolina, the approach to unanimity in opposition to the administration upon the deposite question, is not wholly unparalleled upon any other great question emanating from an Executive of their own choice.

The remark in reference to a supposed disappointed political character, he could not misunderstand, and was compelled to regard it as exceedingly unjust, and still more unkind. He understood it to refer to his honorable and most excellent friend, Mr. Carson, lately a member of the other House. He had hoped that his friend was so well known here, and so truly appreciated, that no hand would be found to aim a shaft unkindly at him. It is true, the remark was accompanied with the admission that he was an honorable man, well entitled to all respect, but yet it sounded in his ears as harsh and unkind. Mr. M. said he had known Mr. Carson long and intimately, and he believed the estimate he had formed of him, was held in common by all who knew him—that a man of higher honor, purer principles, and a warmer heart, perhaps does not live, and of whom it may be said, truly and emphatically, that he is "without fear, and without reproach." That he is wholly incapable of assailing this or any other administration, for acts that his sound judgment does not disapprove. If there be any ground for the imputation that these resolutions emanated from mere partisan efforts, we shall probably have evidence of it in another branch of Congress. Let us, before we make too certain of it, see what will be the vote of the member representing that district.

Mr. M. said he knew that honorable member well; he knew him to be a warmly-attached friend to the administration, and that he would regret the adoption by it of any line of policy, from which a sense of duty to his constituents would compel him to depart. That he was well acquainted with the sentiments of his district, and would truly represent them, did not admit of question. Mr. M. said he knew the honorable member, by his firmness of purpose, and the sterling character of his virtues, was equal to any exigency—to the performance of every duty. We shall see what his course will be, and if I am not greatly mistaken, (said Mr. M.) it will fully vindicate all that I have said on this subject.

North Carolina Memorial.

So firm (said Mr. M.) is my belief, that the state of public sentiment in the western part of North Carolina is as I have represented it, that I do not believe a tittle of conflicting testimony can be produced from a source that may be regarded as wholly impartial. I know, sir, that if you look to those who live and make profit by the offices, the contracts, or the bounties of the Government, you may get any sort of testimony. The Blue Book can furnish you with those whose "name is legion," to defend any and every act of this or any other administration. It is their vocation. It may be regarded at headquarters as a part of their duty. Those tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars, in the shape of extras to mail contractors, that deface and blacken the Blue Book, and that have contributed to cripple the whole Post Office establishment, so as nearly to put it on the parish, would be a rich equivalent for a good word or good service in moment of need. It is not to those who live by Government pay, that I look for public sentiment; rain or shine, they get their pay; and the harder the times, the more they buy for their money. It is to the people, the real people; not office holders or contractors; but to the people, who have nothing to ask from the Government but justice and moderation and a wise economy, that I look for the public sentiment. I do not mean (said Mr. M.) to convey the idea, that there is no party in North Carolina that supports with zeal and anxiety the whole course of the administration in reference to the depositories. I know full well there is such a party; small I believe it to be; but by force of a severe drill and exact discipline, it will be felt in all its evolutions, and is by no means to be despised—a party animated by a principle of ambition, as active and almost as dangerous as poison, with its eye steadily fixed upon the elevation of the Executive favorite, and its heart upon the loaves and fishes, and flesh-pots, and all those good things, that come in the train of power. That party defends the violent and lawless seizure of the depositories, as it will continue to defend every act of the administration, so long as there is a fair prospect that it will ride out in safety and in triumph the storm of the public indignation.

Nor do I mean to say that there are not others, not in the pale of this party, honest and honorable men, who support this measure. I know that there are some, influenced by strong prejudices against the bank or strong attachment to the Chief Magistrate, who are as incredulous of merit on the part of the former, as they are slow to admit error on the part of the latter. But, sir, if I do not mistake the signs of the times, this party, active, indefatigable, and concentrated, as it is; sustained, as it is, by the countenance and patronage of the federal Government, will be beaten and overwhelmed by that great undisciplined corps of militia, the free and sovereign people. Sir, we are unaccustomed to that political discipline by which, in other States, whole communities change front at the word of command, with the celerity and precision that a battalion may be wheeled in the open field. We are mere militia; we refuse the drill, and hold in contempt the political tactician. We have no central agency which kindly takes from the shoulders of the people the burdens of self-government. We have no junto of patriots who kindly assume the toils of Government for the paltry equivalent of the people's money only. We recognise no organizations unknown to the constitution, to ride and rule over the laws; to manufacture public opinion to order; and to club the wits of dishonest men; to seize upon the Government, and plunder a confiding community.

Sir, we have seen, in the history of other States, and great States too, that bad men have established regencies, self-constituted, ambitious, and unprincipled, which, by means of perfect organization, comprehending every county, and every township of every county, controlled public opinion, subdued all spirit of resistance, and acting in phalanx, and, by concert, secured an echo from every organ, even the most diminutive, to the expressed will of the central junto. Illustrious talent, ripe experience, and well-tryed patriotism, must fall into the ranks, bow to the central power, and wheel at the word of command, or be proscribed by the ruthless despotism. A sort of political Procrustean bed—talent and worth go for nothing—exact discipline and perfect obedience, the only tests of excellence. Sir, we have no such regency; we can have none. It cannot live among us in power. It would live only in doggel or in pasquinade, the sport of the wit, the butt of the wag, and the scorn of honest citizens. It would be an organization without power, a Government without subjects—a mere caput mortuum, with "none so poor as to do it reverence."

As we have no man or set of men, who control public opinion at will, so I think no man or set of men, can transfer, at will, popularity to another. I regard the idea that the suffrage of North Carolina can be transferred to the Executive favorite, as deeply insulting to the intelligence and independence of our citizens. I know that the opinion is entertained, and warmly cherished, but I think it is founded in a profound misconception of the character of our people. They cannot, they will not, be transferred—they will judge and decide for themselves—wisely, I trust: independently, I am sure. The people of that State had borne much, they were less excitable than some of their more mercurial neighbors; but there was a point beyond which the experiment now making upon them and the country could not be safely carried. It had been stated by his honorable colleague, and doubtless from his conviction of its truth, "that he had no doubt that North Carolina would always sustain the administration, that the opinions of the people, republican as they were, were decidedly against domestic foes, as well as foreign enemies, and would support the Government against both." It became Mr. M. to speak with modesty in regard to his State, but of her virtue for consistency, and a steadfast adherence to her principles, he might speak, as he should only echo the voice of her whole history. He should then feel that he had assumed a weighty responsibility to affirm of his State that she would always support any man, or any administration. But he should feel that he risked nothing in affirming that she would be found steadily supporting her principles. She, in common with all her sisters, was under the influence of that devotion to public benefactors, which distinguished a generous and honorable people; she might occasionally err, under the influence of a generous enthusiasm, or temporary excitement; but, in the long run, she would be found on the side of those great principles that had marked every period of her history—and none might be so bold as to count upon her support, who were themselves untrue to those principles. Occasional aberrations, or slight delinquencies, she might generously overlook; but, depend upon it, that no man, or set of men, who habitually disregard her principles, can safely count upon her support.

That State had suffered as little of pecuniary distress from the removal of the depositories and the destruction of confidence consequent upon the violence and usurpation which marked the whole procedure, as perhaps any other on the Atlantic border. Perhaps, from circumstances peculiar to herself, she has suffered less than any other—certainly much less than her sister States to the North and East. The whole amount of debt in that State, foreign and domestic, was perhaps much smaller than it had been for several years, and yet, by reason of the gradual winding up of the business of all the local banks, there had been a sort of stricture, not to say uneasiness, in money matters. The shock given to public confidence—the entire uncertainty as to the future—had unquestionably increased that uneasiness. The evils of that act were moving apace, and were pervading every part of the interior, and must be felt with more or less severity. But the opposition of that State to this measure, did not arise from a feeling of distress—for that opposition existed before the consequences of the measure were felt at all—it rested upon a deeper sense of violated law, the startling pretensions of power, and the manifest tendency to the isolation of all power in the hands of one man. He regarded it as highly honorable to his State, that she was moved, not by mercenary considerations, but by a feeling of justice and her love and veneration for the constitution and the laws. North Carolina was emphatically a law-loving and law-abiding State. Not the worshipper of idols and the devotee of power—but as firm to resist usurpations on the part of power, as ready to yield obedience to rightful authority.

Nothing (said Mr. M.) indicates more clearly the unsoundness of the times than the true character of this controversy. Strip it of all extraneous matter—of the mystification of language, and remove the rubbish that encumbers it—and this whole deposite question is a contest for the use of the public money for purposes of gain—to make interest out of it. It is a contest for the use of it after it leaves the pockets of the people and before it is disbursed in the public service: as if this Government has any right to take money from the pockets of the people, before it is needed, to lend either to partisan banks or political partisans. The law places this money in the United States Bank, mainly for safe-keeping, and for a safe and easy transmission to the different points of the country where it is needed for the public service. The great object is safety. Neither the President, nor the President and Congress together, have the shadow of right to raise money by taxing the people, to lend either to his or their friends: nor have they any right to use money, after it is raised, for their benefit or the benefit of their friends, either for pecuniary or political speculation—either to make fortunes or to make Presidents. And yet, no one can shut his eyes to the fact, that the whole struggle here, is to take the public money from the place designated by law, and to give the use of it to certain affiliated banks, that must, of necessity, be more or less controlled by a political party. In the worst period of the Roman empire, the imperial purple was put up at auction by the prætorian guards. God forbid that we shall ever see the time in this country when trained political cohorts shall seize upon the public moneys to open the way to the Presidency by corruption—when the patronage of the Government shall be combined with the people's money, to bring into power an Executive favorite.

I shall decline, said Mr. M., going into the argument upon the deposite question. The argument has been exhausted, and the pretexts, I do not say the reasons, of the administration for this measure, have been utterly annihilated. That is my opinion; and such, I do not doubt, will be the opinion of the country.

It has been said by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Forsyth,] and repeated by my honorable colleague, that a great effort is making to put out of power particular men, and, with them, to put out or put down the principles of this administration, and to bring others into power with opposite or different principles. I can assure both gentlemen that my views have not taken so wide a scope. My object is to check, if possible, bold and lawless usurpation, and to avert from the country the evils consequent upon it—to arrest that deep and wide-spread distress so painfully experienced in some quarters, and so fearfully anticipated in all.

What motive, asked Mr. M., can any gentleman have, especially from his State, to throw himself into the ranks of opposition to this administration? The administration is now in its second term, and it must live out the time for which it is elected—a longer continuance of it under the present Chief Magistrate is not contemplated by any one. What motive, then, can any one have, causelessly—and, indeed, unless under the influence of a stern necessity—to place himself in the opposition? No motive can be assigned. On the contrary, every consideration of prudence, of personal advancement, or individual ease, conspire to recommend that he should take the direction of the times, and float gently down upon the current of the President's popularity. In the State from which he came, that popularity was known to have been great. It was a confidence given to him suddenly, but voluntarily. If recent events have deeply alarmed, not to say shaken, that confidence, yet it may be supposed still to be strong: opposition, therefore, will necessarily have to encounter preconceived partialities, and to brook the misrepresentations and calumnies of a servile and degraded press—a press, in its ramifications, penetrating every portion of the confederacy—drilled and disciplined—moved by an impulse from the centre—a ready organ of every slander and calumny; and a sure echo of Executive denunciation. Does not every one see and feel, that, when the allurements and blandishments of power shall fail of their object—when fealty shall not be secured by flattery, reward, or the hope of reward—that the fears or the weakness of public men are sought to be acted on by the terrorism of denunciation? Does not every one see that independence and manliness are not the virtues required—that submission to the drill is exacted? That he must go the whole length in advancing the great primary object of the managers—the election of the successor, the Executive favorite—or make up his mind to meet the denunciations of the official organ in this District, re-echoed as they are by that portion of the press which, as yet, has never faltered in defending all the acts of power?

Sir, it is not a light matter to take a position here against the acts of this administration; and it is to be feared that the over-prudence or timidity of public servants too often permits the outrages of power to pass without rebuke, rather than incur the known penalties of resisting them.

Sir, thousands and tens of thousands of our honest and industrious citizens are in a state of profound ignorance of the enormous, the monstrous abuses and corruptions of this Government. They live too far from it, I have feared, to guard it effectually against abuse. The public eye is not sufficiently turned upon it, except for its favors and its patronage. The guardianship is defective—is certainly inefficient. That man who should undertake to disclose to the public eye the enormous abuses of the present time, would be denounced as a calumniator, listened to with utter incredulity, or regarded as a mere visionary.

How many of my constituents could be made to see, as clearly as I think I see it, that the public weal, the great interests of the country, are held, by those who practically control the Government, as wholly subordinate to the elevation of the favorite to the Presidency? How many would believe, under this administration of their own choice, that those who in fact manage the system, regard the gratification of the ambition of one man, as wholly above any questions of public interest? And yet, in the presence of the Senate, and before the country, I declare it as my solemn conviction that such is the fact.

Sir, if the whole country could look into this stupendous laboratory, within these ten miles square, and comprehend at a glance the complicated springs of action, how much of selfish ambition, how little of patriotism, how much of mere mercenary calculation—and see, too, by whose hands and for whose interests the Government is controlled—it might bring an awful day of reckoning to those whose hearts are now hardened against the distresses of the people. But, sir, the country will not see it.

North Carolina Memorial.

Men may not prove recreant to their trusts, but the whole extent of abuse and corruption will not, cannot, be realized. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, cannot be known.

But, sir, it is charged, that the object of the opposition is to put out the men and principles of this administration. That is a serious charge, and demands examination. To put out the principles of the administration! That ought not to be done, if those principles are sound, and conservative of the great interests of the country. The principles of this administration! I have looked, not inattentively, to the course of this administration, for several years. I had supposed, until after the re-election of the President, that the tendency of those principles was conservative. It is true, that I was not entirely sure that I precisely comprehended the views of the men in power. The South was laboring and sinking under the tariff system; our people looked with eagerness to any indication of relief, and supposed they saw it in the principles avowed by the administration. It is certain, however, that, by reason of the imperfection of language, or from some other cause, Pennsylvania regarded the views of the President as not unfavorable to her favorite system; while in the South, we took good heart from encouraging intimations, and supported with energy and zeal the present Chief Magistrate, believing, as we did, that he was with us in feeling and principle. The history of subsequent times may tell how deep were the delusions of a confiding people. The scenes of the last winter, if they shall ever be truly portrayed, will exhibit, in vivid colors, the deep and deliberate betrayal of the trusting South.

The principles of this administration! As far as I know, and I make the declaration under a full sense of responsibility, this administration has put forward no principle as a test principle, as a party principle, except the principles of elections and of office. The administration came into power as a reforming administration, to cut down abuses, lop off excrescences, restore economy, and bring back the Government to a sound, simple, and healthful action. The great questions before the country were—tariff, internal improvement, and economy, and abuse of Executive patronage. I am bold to say, that not a single pledge, either express or implied, by the opponents of the late and the friends of the present administration, has been redeemed. This is a strong declaration, and yet I feel prepared, when invited to the trial, to prove it before the country.

The only great principle, until this of the deposits, which the friends of the administration were required to support, was the principle of office. Is the fact not so? Will any one rise in his place and deny it and give the exception? You might be tariff or anti-tariff, internal improvement or anti-internal improvement, for or against economy, bank or anti-bank, and yet a good Jackson man, a member of the political church, in full communion, so long as you would vote for all nominations to office, and support the elections of those who would sustain all the views of the Executive in relation to office. Upon these great national questions, some of which almost shook this confederacy to its deepest foundations, the friends of the administration were not required to hold any principles in common; but if, upon a nomination to a land office or foreign mission, or any subordinate situation upon which the Executive had set his heart for the accommodation of his friend, one should venture to express his dissent, wo betide the presumptuous act—he might look out for the flaming sword of Executive vengeance, or prepare for the deep denunciations of a profligate press.

Sir, this administration has had no fixed and well-defined principles, upon which it has steadily acted, upon any of these great subjects. Its strength has mainly consisted in the keeping of its views of policy either undefined or thrown into the dark. In a word, its highest policy has been to have no settled policy, unless the keeping of questions open can be settled policy. To keep every thing open, every thing unsettled, to lean as the exigency might require, either to the North or to the South, to make the most of every interest, by playing off against each other the different sections, to effect harmony and concert in nothing save in the elections, have been eminently characteristic of the present administration.

That such is the temper of the Chief Magistrate I am not sure. But who believes that the policy of the President is the prevailing policy of the administration? Who does not see that a certain great party, and, I fear, a bad party, holds the President and his counsels, as it were, in the palms of their hands? Who does not see that the policy of that party is eminently that of non-committal? That it watches the currents of public opinion, and embarks with an eye single to objects of personal ambition? That the defects of sagacity are sought to be supplied by after-thoughts, a sort of humbug, (pardon the word, its lowness is upon a level with the policy it is intended to indicate,) by sturdy applications to the passions and gullibility of the public.

Sir, in this question of the deposits, their sagacity has deeply failed them. To rifle the bank of the deposits, under charges deeply affecting its purity—the bank, which is supposed to be so very unpopular, and by a President so strong in popularity—was supposed to be the easiest thing in the world; and, in the deep financial wisdom of the Executive advisers, to remove a few millions of dollars from one side of the street to the other, did not abstract the money from the country, and therefore could produce no difficulty. Financial sages! Wise money-changers! It never occurred to them that the country could doubt their wisdom, or that the country would feel the slightest shock in public confidence. The affiliated and favorite banks would use these moneys in a way to refresh the whole party, and sustain it, and draw to its support as many hungry retainers as might be necessary to bear into power the favorite.

It never occurred to them that a people who had done so much for them, could feel the slightest unwillingness to intrust the whole currency of the country, in all its commercial and financial aspects, to Executive or Treasury regulation. But, sir, a people deeply imbued with veneration for the law, could not but feel a deep shock in the public confidence, when they witnessed a bold and high-handed violation of law.

Sir, I differ widely from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] when he supposes that the real struggle in all this matter is, whether the bank shall be in Chestnut or in Wall street. I think the Senator does the advisers more than justice when he supposes they look as far ahead as to the ultimate settlement of the currency question. Their present necessities were urgent, exigent; they meant to take care of the public money for the present, and leave the currency question to take care of itself as it might. The money was wanted for the pending campaign. If thirty or fifty local banks, with all their retainers and dependants, could be wheeled into line of battle, and perhaps as many more with hope in their hearts, standing ready for the word, and all these institutions under control of a central power at Washington, marching and counter-marching at the word of command, besides the field that would be opened to speculation in stocks, it must be confessed it would present a strong political force—it would be the beginning of a policy looking to the ultimate establishment of a money domination, contrived by the use of the banking system, and controlled by a great, unseen, irresponsible central power—the safety-fund system of the United States, the refined and ingenious conception of the Albany school, and requiring, for its successful administration, the adroitness, tact, and delicacy of Albany managers. But, sir, the whole contrivance will explode, the whole plot will turn out a ridiculous failure.

But, sir, to return to the principles of this administration. I have said their leading principle of policy is, to keep every thing open. Let us look into this matter. First, as to the tariff. This administration was regarded in the South as the paragon of administrations for the reduction of a tariff. And that great party which held the whole tariff policy in their hands, were not only in the highest favor at court, but were regarded as especially friendly to their oppressed Southern brethren. The administration set out with making about the best argument I have seen in favor of the constitutionality of the tariff; but with many mild and conciliatory expressions in reference to the inequality of the system, and placing its policy upon the very judicious ground of endeavoring to procure a judicious tariff. A judicious tariff, early in the administration, was likely to produce a large surplus revenue, which was recommended to be judiciously distributed among the States. The distribution of the surplus revenue was soon abandoned. The originality and ingenuity of this administration have struck out a mode of getting rid of surpluses. They have contrived to get rid of nearly ten millions a year, exceeding the amount expended by the preceding extravagant and profligate administration, as it has been called. Judging from these first efforts, I see no reason to despair of this administration having ingenuity enough to contrive ways and means of getting rid of all the money they can contrive ways and means to raise.

The clamors and remonstrances of the South became troublesome. In 1832, the administration set about reducing the tariff. A bill was passed, which I understood was regarded by the administration as a final adjustment of the question. The administration, too, got a triumph over the Senator from Kentucky, and his friends, in reducing the duty on woollens $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., so as to make the average upon woollens only 50 per cent. ad valorem, as well as I remember; when under the tariff of 1828, it was 48 or 49 per cent. on that article. It is true, the South did not seem quite satisfied; I, with others, voted for an indefinite postponement of the whole measure. The administration press, to the South especially, raised shouts of rejoicing at the great achievement effected by our excellent administration; and those members who had not shown a proper sense of the great good done for us, received from that press a ready rebuke. The administration proved by figures that it was a most excellent arrangement. Just before the South Carolina elections, a paper issued from the Treasury Department, under the signature of the Register of the Treasury, showing that the whole amount of revenue from imports, under that arrangement, would be less than twelve millions of dollars. I have not the paper before me. I do not pretend to exactness, but am sure it was less than 12 millions. That statement got into South Carolina in due season for the October elections—it did not, however, perform its office. The elections went against the administration, and the requisite number to call a convention was elected. The convention was convened, and passed the ordinance nullifying this excellent arrangement. What did we witness in less than three short months after the issuing of this Treasury statement? We saw the annual message and annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, setting forth that six additional millions ought to be taken off. Before the South Carolina elections, the fact was put forth in solemn form, that the imposts would not exceed twelve millions. In December, it was put forth that the amount would be at least 18 millions.

The Treasury Department, that had been figuring so much on this subject, began again, with the assistance of a gentleman from the city of New York much skilled in figuring, and the result of the whole was the bill introduced with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, commonly called Verplanck's bill. Here we might pause and inquire, why did the administration abandon the arrangement said to be so good, and recommend a reduction of six millions more? Was it a part of that system of expedients that means that nothing shall be settled? or was it because South Carolina had nullified, and it was necessary for the administration to take a position that would give satisfaction to all reasonable men in the other Southern States, and thereby detach them from South Carolina? Was it to present to prudent and moderate men a reasonable hope of a satisfactory adjustment of the subject, aided by the popularity and influence of the administration, so as to induce them to look to ulterior and peaceful measures, aided by the administration, rather than to make common cause with their Southern sister? Was it, in a word, to detach the sympathies of all the world from South Carolina, so that the Government might pour its whole fire into her, naked and exposed? Or was it to pass the Verplanck bill in good faith, and give quiet to the whole South, as it was known the passage of that bill would do?

It was remarked, on another occasion, by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FOSBERT], that the administration, as easy as it could lift its finger, could have prevented the passage of the compromise bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky. With all that power and influence, does any one doubt that it could have had Verplanck's bill passed in any week of the session? Is it not certain, that that party which is supposed to rule the destinies of this country at the present, could have passed the bill at any moment? Did they not hold out to the South every assurance of kindness? and yet did they not deeply deceive us, and disappoint expectations they themselves had created?

Sir, it was no part of their policy to settle that question; their obvious interest, and therefore their policy, was to keep the question open to make Presidents. That party was in the confidence of the administration, occupying on this subject a middle position. The high tariff party gave us no reason to hope for a mitigation of the policy; we turned from them with despair. We naturally looked to our kind friends of that other great party. They reposed upon a position of great strength. They kept up their influence at home by preserving every essential part of the system; they made friends to the South by making paltry concessions in our favor, and dealing most profusely in kind promises to do more and all that we desired, as soon as they could make their situation a little more safe and easy at home.

By this artful policy, you perceive, sir, that the party alluded to retained all their influence in the more moderate of the middle and northern States, and yet were enabled to command the whole South as against the high ultra tariff party. In that condition it was not their interest, and, in my opinion, formed no part of their policy, to settle that question. Their great object of political ambition was the Presidency: all other things sunk into comparative insignificance. To attain that, nothing was necessary but to keep open that great and deeply-exciting subject. The adjustment of the tariff has cut the sinews of that party, and greatly reduced the dangerous power of this administration. The bank question is seized upon to be substituted for the tariff. And if, happily for the country, that question shall be finally disposed of, the power of that party would be so crippled and debilitated, that it would never again perhaps lift its eye to the Presidential chair.

No southern man who looked upon the scenes of the last session, can ever forget the alarm, the deep consternation, that pervaded the ranks of that party, at the introduction of the compromise bill by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. They felt that the settlement of the question was a partial annihilation of their power. They voted en masse, with but few exceptions, against the compromise bill, although it was received as satisfactory by the entire South. I feel warranted, therefore, in saying, that their policy was to keep the whole question open.

In speaking thus freely of the friends of the administration, I do not intend to include the real friends of the President, especially those from Tennessee and the Southwest generally. I know that many of them in that quarter felt the deepest anxiety on the subject. Not so of those who looked more to objects of personal ambition than to the good of the country.

But, the principles of the administration! Upon the subject of internal improvements I have seen vetoes—but does not every one know that other cases have more than neutralized the veto? Upon that subject I cannot for my life tell what are the principles of the administration. I know that new doctrines and novel distinctions have arisen under this administration; but to mark the scope and compass of them, is wholly beyond my power. The administration are perhaps rather too busily engaged with the deposit question, and in the reception of committees, to give us a gloss upon these profound and intricate and subtle conceptions. I think I hazard but little in saying that the question is yet kept open.

But, sir, upon the bank, one would think that nothing is left to conjecture, that nothing is kept open, but that the opinions and purposes of the administration are fully and frankly given to the public. And yet such is unquestionably not the fact. Upon no subject have the opinions of the Executive been more undefined. In the earlier messages, the objection seemed rather to be to the bank, than to a bank. And in one a project was suggested, that no one with whom I have conversed on the subject seemed to understand, and has sometimes been denominated the President's exchequer bank. In the celebrated veto message, the President clearly indicated that he would have furnished Congress with a proper constitutional bank, if he had been requested; and he distinctly referred the whole subject to the present Congress, recognising in Congress the rightful power of action over the subject in some modification.

We now understand that the Executive not only regards the present bank as unconstitutional, but any bank that can be established in either of the States. The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] has so said, and we all understand that what he speaks on this subject will be spoken by that party which practically controls the action of this administration.

Believing, as I did, that it was the invariable policy of the party in power never to define their position precisely, I was rejoiced at the declarations of the Senator from New York. I supposed for once in my life I saw gentlemen in the open field, and might be able to draw a fine sight upon them. But how mistaken were my first impressions! I see that gentlemen are against the United States Bank—against any United States bank in either of the 24 States. But yet the President says he has "a plan in his head," if his "experiment" with the State banks shall fail. And the official journal says, that all United States banks out of the District of Columbia are unconstitutional. So that, in reference to the precise views of the administration on the subject of a United States bank, I am as uninformed, as I am in reference to other great subjects. The President "has a plan in his head" (how strange!) if his "experiment" shall fail. As to the principles of the administration referred to by gentlemen, if they shall be put down, the public loss may yet be repaired, and the more especially as no one seems to understand what those principles are. Are we to look into the Proclamation for its principles—that paper marked with unparalleled ultra federalism—or into the authorized explanation of it, which stops short of outright nullification but by a hair's breadth? Sir, see-saw is the word. Nothing long, and every thing by turns.

But the bank—what is the President's notion? Is it to establish a bank in this District to regulate the currency and equalize exchanges? Is the President's solicitude for the purity of the sovereign States so great, that he cannot expose it to the corruptions of this monster, and yet is he willing to fix that monster in this District, so near the Executive mansion? Is it contended, under the power of legislation over this District given to Congress, and for the uses and purposes of the District, a power is to be exerted to regulate throughout the States that most important and highly interesting subject of the currency? Is the incident to be so immeasurably greater than the principal power? The perversion is monstrous. The proposition cannot bear a moment's examination. But it is said that we are to come to "the metals," to have a "hard money" Government. The idea comes from New York, too. I should like to know how long it will take the safety-fund banks to come to hard money. I am told they now have in their vaults from five to six cents for every paper dollar in circulation. The operation will doubtless be easy and speedy, especially if they shall have the good luck to elect their President.

We are given to understand that a great leading object, in the removal of the deposits, was to come to the metals—to "hard money." And yet, if one did not know the surpassing ability of the administration, he might feel surprise that Congress was not to be consulted in this great revolution of our financial and commercial condition. The Secretary of the Treasury, though it must be admitted that he has been a little unlucky in making out his reasons for the removal of the deposits, yet will doubtless be more successful in making the people acquainted with "hard money" only. Sir, this whole matter is an after-thought, a contemptible device to cover over the bungling of a weak and incompetent administration, and to draw the public eye in a different direction. Is it to be believed, that, if so great a revolution in the condition of the country had been contemplated, no intimation would have escaped in that manifesto, with which the President has not yet been so obliging as to furnish the Senate? Would the annual message of the President have contained no allusion to that great and radical change? It is difficult to contemplate with steadiness the shiftings, the twistings, the evasions, and the after-thoughts to cover a series of reckless, lawless, and violent acts, and retain a feeling of moderation. The country will not, in my opinion, be satisfied with the course of things. The country will not long bear it. But all this violence on the part of power, and this distress on the country, are to be borne, to put down the "monster." As if the Executive power, armed with a patronage of twenty millions, with forty thousand officeholders and retainers in the field, sustained by a devoted, and, in many instances, profligate press, is not incomparably more dangerous to liberty, and all the valuable institutions of the country, when it shall be wielded to gratify vindictive passions, and to advance mere personal ambition. Add to this mass of power, a domination over the affiliated banks, regulated and controlled by a central power, and then that last and most dangerous instrument, a National Convention, readily got up at Executive bidding by that army of officers, contractors, and expectants, that swarm through the country, and who shall be found either hardy or shameless enough to say that the President cannot, in despite of the people, appoint his successor?

But the power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself, will begin to find that it has been a little too bold; that the people have yet a strong sense of liberty, and that the popularity of no man can "bear every thing." The managers will find that they cannot get along with the present policy; that they will be unhorsed; that the country will not consent to undergo so much distress and suffering merely to try an "experiment." They must retrace—they cannot go on—or they will die in their tracks. The people have borne much; they may yet bear more; but let their oppressors beware of driving this experiment too far.

Mr. M. said he did not believe that in any country, where laws were known and acted upon, a people had ever, in a time of profound peace, been so suddenly thrown, by the will of one man, from a state of the highest prosperity into one of wide-spread and general distress. If these calamities had been inflicted by disease, by famine, or by the elements, men's minds would be brought to bear them with calmness and philosophy. But when inflicted through mere wantonness or vindictiveness, or for the accomplishment of schemes of avarice or ambition, a free people could not be exempt from a deep feeling of uneasiness and discontent, nor long restrained from the expression of a deep indignation.

Mr. M. moved the reference of the memorial.

Mr. BROWN rose and said, that he had hoped, after the discussion which this subject had already undergone in the Senate, and from the period of time which had elapsed since that discussion, that it would not have again been revived. He expressed his regret that it should again have become necessary for him to claim any more of the time and attention of the Senate than had already been extended to him on this question; but some of the remarks which had fallen from his honorable colleague, (Mr. MAXWELL,) had imposed on him the necessity of making a few observations in reply.

Mr. B. said he would take occasion, before he proceeded further in his remarks, to correct a mistake, no doubt unintentional, into which his colleague had fallen, in the course of the remarks which he had just made, in attributing to him an expression, when this subject was some time ago under discussion, which he had never used, and altogether disclaimed; an expression which respect, both for himself and the State which he in part represented, would have prevented his making.

He (Mr. B.) did not say, upon the occasion referred to, that the State of North Carolina "would always sustain the administration," but he had taken occasion to say, that "he himself had no doubt that North Carolina would sustain the administration," which expression he had used in reference to the great question which was now agitating the country, and which had grown out of the removal of the public depositories. [Here Mr. MAXWELL asked leave to explain, and the floor having been yielded him, he read from the National Intelligencer that part of the speech of Mr. B. as reported in that paper, to which he had referred.] Mr. BROWN resumed, and said, that the expression attributed to him, in the report of his remarks in the Intelligencer, which paper, he would say, had generally treated him with fairness and justice in reporting his remarks, was one which had not been used by him. He seldom troubled himself to revise the notes of any of the reporters, before their publication, as to any thing which he said here in debate. He had looked over his remarks very hastily, as given by the reporter of the Intelligencer, before they were published in that paper, but the error which he alluded to had escaped his observation. The report of his remarks, as published in the Globe of the 15th February, gave accurately the expression which he had used on the occasion alluded to. Mr. B. said, that he had ventured to express the opinion, that the State of North Carolina would sustain the administration on this question, which, in its issue, he sincerely believed, involved great principles of constitutional liberty, and the preservation of our free institutions, in their purity, from the uniform and patriotic devotion to those principles which had distinguished her citizens in all the great political struggles which had, at different periods of our history, agitated the country. He did believe then, and he still believed, that there was a firm and determined spirit of patriotism in our country, which would not consent to witness the humiliation of the Government and the people, by the success and triumph of the dangerous and powerful moneyed institution which was now struggling for mastery and supremacy over the legitimate authorities of our country.

Mr. B. said, that his honorable colleague had remarked, that he believed a great majority of the people of the State of North Carolina, were decidedly in opposition to the administration on this question, yet his honorable colleague had, in the course of the remarks which had fallen from him, expressed the opinion, that such was the great personal popularity of the President among the great mass of the people, that the individual risked his popularity who stood before them in opposition to any important measure of his administration! If the measure in question of the administration was so unpopular in North Carolina as had been represented, he was at a loss to perceive how any public man could hazard his popularity by opposing it. It had been said by his colleague that the only party in North Carolina which supported the administration, was, what had been termed by him, the "regency party," and which he had described as active, persevering, and well-drilled. He (Mr. B.) was not aware of the existence, in that State, of any such political party. If any such did exist, he believed a full set-off would be found in the activity, zeal, and perfect party organization which marked the political combination which was now arrayed in fixed and determined opposition to the administration. He believed his honorable colleague, at the last Presidential election, had given in his adhesion to that ticket which had on it the name of an individual who is said, by his political opponents, to belong to the party which they denominate the "regency party," and this, too, after the passage of the act to reduce the tariff in 1832, for their course in relation to which, his colleague had just spoken in such strong language of censure. It had been said, that the present contest was one for political power.

He (Mr. B.) believed that the opponents of the administration had seized upon the occasion presented by the state of things at this crisis, to endeavor to break down, in public estimation, those in power, and to pave the way for their own elevation. What, he would ask, was the scene daily exhibited before us? Every day gentlemen gave the most exaggerated picture, as he believed, of the public sufferings. Every day the accents of distress had resounded here. He said, he believed that different kinds of distress, at this time, prevailed in our country; and he thought not among the least distressed class of the country, was to be found that class of politicians who had been disappointed in their hopes for the success of their party. They were, no doubt, distressed, because their opponents were in power, and they themselves were out of power. This had been the case in all times, and under every form of government.

Mr. B. proceeded to remark, that, for one who was unacquainted with the condition of things in this country to listen to the language almost daily employed in the debates in this chamber, by gentlemen in opposition, it would be supposed that the Executive branch of the Government had established a ruthless and unrelenting despotism, on the ruins of our free system of Government. We had heard many eloquent discourses on the right of trial by jury; many eloquent denunciations of the Executive, for the danger which threatened the great bulwark of our liberty from that quarter. These were mere fancy sketches, pictured from over-excited imaginations. In what instance, he would ask, had the right of trial by jury been violated by the Executive? When, he would ask, had all the great constitutional rights secured to individuals, both as to their persons and their property, been more amply and universally enjoyed, in every part of the United States, than at this time? When had the blessings of liberty, abundance, and prosperity, been more generally diffused throughout our land? It was true that some indications of distress appeared in some of our commercial cities, but, he believed the great body of the people, and particularly the agricultural class, were never more contented, never more prosperous and happy. Gentlemen might insist upon it, that the people were suffering great distress; but neither that, nor the operations of the Bank of the United States, could prevent the industry and energies of a free people from going forward, in that rapid advance to national character, prosperity, and greatness, which this country was destined to attain.

Mr. B. said he must be permitted to express the opinion, that his honorable colleague had done the President much injustice in supposing that he did not wish the tariff question adjusted at the last session, that he might, by its failure, have made use of his power to gratify his alleged vengeance against the people of a particular State. Could it be supposed (said Mr. B.) that the Chief Executive Magistrate of this country, who had been twice elevated to the highest station within the gift of a free people, would so far forget what was due to his own fame, and to that high station, as to use the power which had been committed to him, for the mere gratification of revenge? He thought not; and although he had disapproved the course proposed by the administration to carry into effect the laws of the United States in the State of South Carolina, he had never doubted that it originated in honest and patriotic motives. He believed a recurrence to the official acts of the President would show, that, to him, far more than to any other individual, was due the downfall of that system which had produced so much excitement throughout our country.

In each of his annual messages to Congress, before the final adjustment of that question, he had strongly recommended its reduction. At the session of 1831 and '2, the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McLane, having been called on by a resolution of the House of Representatives for a plan to reduce the tariff, proposed one which, if it had been carried into effect, would have been far more favorable to the South than the compromise bill of last session. It was (said Mr. B.) no doubt fresh in the recollection of all, that gentlemen in Congress, who at that time supported the manufacturing interests, denounced the plan proposed by Mr. McLane as ruinous to those interests. Before the re-election of the President, in the Fall of 1832, the issue of a reduction of the tariff, which he was avowedly favorable to, had been distinctly made up; and the overwhelming success at the election polls, both of himself and the party supporting him, declared, in terms not to be misunderstood, the public will on that subject. At the commencement of the session of 1832 and 1833, and before it was known at the seat of Government, that the convention of South Carolina had passed their ordinance, the President again strongly recommended to Congress such a reduction of the tariff as would bring down the revenue to a proper standard, and would do justice to all the great interests of the United States. These facts, he thought, afforded conclusive proofs, if any were wanting, of the earnest and anxious wishes of those who had conducted the affairs of the administration, for a satisfactory adjustment of the tariff.

Mr. B. said he thought it must be obvious to all, who were at all observant of passing events, that a great effort was now making, by those who were out of power, to break down in public opinion the party in power, in order to secure their own ultimate success. And what, he would ask, was the composition of the extraordinary combination of parties which was now moving to effect that purpose, with a zeal, a perseverance, and an activity, which he would say was worthy of a better cause? It embraced parties of every political hue and complexion. Nullification and nationalism were found united, directing their joint efforts to the accomplishment of that purpose. Could it fail to be perceived that a union of parties, thus constituted, seconded by the great power and influence of the Bank of the United States, if successful in their efforts to obtain power, would wield a power and control more formidable than any heretofore known under our Government? In such an event, Mr. B. said, it was but reasonable to suppose, judging from the past conduct of those who managed the affairs of the bank, that its whole power, if the deposits were restored and a re-charter obtained, would be exerted to sustain those in power who had upheld that institution. It appeared to him that the country might well startle with alarm at the consequences of the success of so formidable a party, sustained and supported, as it most probably would be, by a power which would go far to place it beyond the reach and control of public opinion.

It had been repeatedly said, that the administration had resorted to the State banks as places of deposit, to strengthen themselves and perpetuate power in the hands of its friends. The effect of this measure, as one of patronage, he thought was rather to bring more of weakness than of strength to the party in power. The Government could select, comparatively, but a small number of banks in proportion to the large number which existed in the different States; and those banks whose claims were overlooked, constituting, by far, the most numerous portion, would be more likely to indulge feelings of resentment than of friendship for the administration.

In relation to the removal of the deposits, he (Mr. B.) would take occasion to say, that, in his opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury was fully justified in taking that step, by the flagrant violation of its charter, by those who managed the concerns of the bank, in having placed at the disposal of its president the funds of that institution, to an unlimited extent, to promote its recharter, by its unhallowed interference in the political concerns of the country, and by its attempt to exercise an improper control over the public press. Who could doubt the quo animo with which these transactions had been conducted on the part of those who managed the concerns of the bank, after an examination of the circumstances under which large sums had been loaned to editors of influential newspapers?

He believed, if the question of the intention with which some of these transactions had taken place, was submitted to any honest and unprejudiced jury of twelve men, that their decision would be, beyond all doubt, that the intention was to control and corrupt the press. It might be attempted to varnish these transactions over, by various ingenious and delicate phrases, much in use in these days of modern refinement, but, among plain and intelligent men, there could be but one opinion about them. When the question of re-chartering the old Bank of the United States was under discussion, the mere suspicion that it had attempted to interfere in the party politics of the times, was so repugnant to the moral sense of the country, that it was no inconsiderable objection to its longer continuance.

Mr. B. said, that more timid men than those who conducted the affairs of the administration, might have paused, to calculate the effects of the measure on their popularity; but it was due to the offended laws and constitution of the country—it was due to the principle of popular supremacy under our form of government, that both should be vindicated, and an example made by the public functionaries, that an institution which endeavors to set itself above the control of both Government and people, should be taught the salutary lesson, that it can attempt neither the one nor the other with impunity.

Mr. B. said in conclusion, that he did not stand there as the apologist of the President of the United States, or any other person connected with his administration. He had nothing to ask for himself, neither from those in power nor those who might succeed them. His highest political ambition was gratified, by the honor of a seat in that body, and, when he ceased to act in a representative capacity, he should cease to act in any public station under the Federal Government.

Mr. MANGUM, in reply to Mr. BROWN, said, he would not voluntarily do injustice to any man, and he therefore felt it proper to correct the misconception of his remarks, touching the views and the conduct of the President, in reference to the tariff. However strong his impression, changing his entire estimate of the wisdom and efficiency of that individual, he felt it due to himself to abstain from any suggestion, that he did not believe fully and clearly sustainable. He had not said that the President endeavored to defeat the adjustment of the tariff. As far as he had heard, the President uniformly expressed his desire that some bill should be passed; and he knew of nothing in conflict with those declarations, save the expression imputed to him, that "he never would consent to the abolition of the discriminating duties," which was understood to be contemplated by the compromise.

What he meant to say, and what he had said, was, that the political party which held the Executive in the palms of their hands, directed its counsels, and controlled its volition, had endeavored to effect that object; that it was their interest, as a mere party measure, he did not doubt; and, that they were as true to their interest and nothing but their interest, as the needle to the pole, he supposed was apparent to all men; that their object was to keep the question open, maintain their strong hold in the north, and decoy the South into the support of their views, by creating a false expectation, and holding out delusive promises. He would likewise discriminate between those false friends and the real friends of the President; of the latter many, and especially those from Tennessee, made every effort in their power to adjust that subject.

But of that other party, that ambitious, and, he feared, bad party, which controls the operations of the actual Government, he felt no disposition to conceal his opinion. He did not well know whether to regard its designs as more terrible or contemptible.

As regarded the bank, that was not now the question. He did not mean that his eye should be turned from the lawless abuses of Executive power, until that subject should be finally disposed of. When the bank should come up, he should be ready to go with gentlemen into an investigation of its alleged abuses. He was not the advocate of the bank; he had once voted against its recharter, when he supposed its premature application had some connexion with the interests of a certain political party. He should keep his mind open to as fair an examination of the whole subject as he could. That it had been of immense utility and convenience to the country, in its moneyed operations, he believed all men conceded. As to the constitutional question, and the dangers to liberty, he should well examine them before final action on the subject.

He had a word to say in regard to his vote in the last Presidential election. The vote for the first on the ticket was freely and heartily given. Subsequent events had disclosed to him the wisdom of exercising great caution in designating any public man as worthy of unlimited confidence. As regarded the second on the ticket, (the Vice President,) he acted under the influence of a strong and urgent necessity—all men acquainted with his sentiments, knew with what deep reluctance he yielded to that necessity. He should not be likely to repeat the act, and, if he did not mistake the signs of the times, other gentlemen might not despise a wise caution in bestowing their confidence in advance too freely in that quarter. He, Mr. M., had acted under a sort of duress, and though subsequent developments had confirmed all his anticipations, yet he ought not to regret the vote, for he could not have done otherwise.

What may be the sense of the country as to the United States Bank, he could not tell. But one thing is clear, that the bank was never heard of or felt, except in the facilities and conveniences it extended to the community, until this Government opened the fire upon it from the whole battery of administration presses. The very spirit of empiricism seemed to have seized upon the subject, and the country is given to understand that the extension of the charter is the destruction of liberty. How has liberty survived the forty years of the existence of the bank? Who does not see that the whole contest is one between the Executive and the bank? And who believes that the war would have raged at all, if the bank had been a little more political and a little more politic? To have no politics in these times, is almost as bad as to have bad politics. The Albany is the only true school. His honorable colleague seemed at a loss to perceive how any public man could hazard his popularity by opposing any measure of a popular administration.

Mr. M. said no one sets a higher value on the good opinion of his constituents than did he; that the only value of a seat in this chamber was derived from the just, and, he trusted, honorable pride he felt in that confidence; that the seat and the paltry honors of it, would be valueless in his eyes the instant it should be divorced from the public confidence; that he bowed with profound reverence to the expressed will of his mother State, yet he must be the keeper of his own honor; and if it shall ever happen, as in his opinion it never can happen, that a course of conduct should be required of him, which he deemed incompatible with his honor, his duty would be to surrender a trust that he could not execute.

But, while he recognised a profound respect to the opinions and wishes of his constituents, he should feel himself wholly unworthy of the trust, if he could shrink from rebuking bold and lawless usurpations of power, because they proceeded from a popular administration, and because the blow that he aimed might peradventure recoil upon himself. Some allusion had been made to the combination of two parties to assail this measure. Has it come to this, that any thing may be done by men in power, and if, perchance, men of different parties shall object, that straightway it is a combination?

Combinations, in his judgment, are odious only when they seek objects of mere personal ambition. They are always entitled to respect when they seek to defend and maintain the constitution and the laws. With whom did the Executive form a combination last winter, when the "bill of blood" was required? Where were the genuine, sturdily, and uncompromising advocates of the principles of '98 found on that occasion? Certainly not by the side of the Executive. And he remembered, with great pleasure, that his honorable colleague was then found, as he doubted not he would always be found, sustaining his principles, in disregard of the will or wishes or vengeance of the Executive.

But the bank corrupts the press! That is not now the question. But how is it with the Executive? Suppose the gentleman's jury was empanelled, and the "quo animo" were the issue, how would the Executive hope to escape a verdict of guilty, as to the widest, deepest, and most flagrant tampering with, and corruption of the press? One would think that this administration would put forth a charge of that kind with great delicacy and caution. It must be conceded, however, that none can better know the extent and facility with which the press can be corrupted. Perhaps, therefore, the opinion of the Executive ought to have somewhat of the weight of authority.

It is, however, said, that the country feels none, or but little, distress; that every thing, and every one, is quiet, easy, and happy, under the temperate rule and moderate counsels of this wise and just administration! It may be so. In truth, in the opinions of those who defend the blunders and usurpations of power, it is scarcely ever otherwise.

But is it not strange, that for the last six weeks, more memorials, sounding every accent of distress, have been laid upon our tables than was ever before known? Are the people mad? What delusion or infatuation has seized them? Do they not know their own condition? Do the political doctors alone understand this thing? Because they harden their hearts to the cries of distress, and urge the "experiment," am I to believe there is no suffering? I will not say all that I feel on this subject.

But the praises of this administration are again sounded for its adjustment of the tariff. I will not again go into that subject. I deeply regret that my honorable colleague did not witness all the events of last winter. Sir, who settled the tariff? Does not every gentleman know that the great leading measure of the administration the last winter, was that "bill of blood." That the Heavens and the Earth would have been moved to place in their hands the flaming sword of vengeance? That the eye of power was turned upon the fair fields of the South—and that already men panted for the stormy conflict? In this moment of alarm, deep and startling alarm—in this moment, when the destinies of this happy republic might be made to depend upon one rash move, did the friends of the administration move to the adjustment of the great questions of difference? Did they not, I mean the favorite party, did they not stand aloof, cold and indifferent spectators? Were they not willing to see the fields of the South drenched in blood, our dwellings in flames, and our whole country uprooted by the hand of desolation? our men slain, our women and children exposed to all the horrors and sufferings of civil war?

Did not the very men, who yet may hope to decoy us into their toils of ambition, stand aloof, willing to witness these scenes of desolation and horror, rather than appease the quarrel by giving to the South what their own administration said the South was entitled to? Did not thousands revolt at the horrors in prospect, and almost despair of the republic, until the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] and his friends, announced that they came to heal the wounds of the country. Sir, I have a thousand times called up the recollection of that fearful period, and that glorious consummation. I had rather have occupied the position of the honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] than to have grasped the sceptre and waved it over the heads of millions, whether of slaves or of freemen. Official station, and all the ensigns and trappings of office, sink into utter insignificance, when compared with that commanding position from which the eye may range over the future, and look into the most distant periods of posterity, secure of its approbation and applause.

Mr. BROWN said he again rose merely to make one or two observations in reply to some of the remarks of his honorable colleague. His honorable colleague had spoken of a label which he said was worn by the individuals of a certain political party. [Mr. MANROSE rose to explain, and disclaimed any intention to allude to Mr. BROWN.] Mr. B. said he would then proceed to remark upon another observation which had fallen from his colleague. It had been said, when the country was threatened with the greatest danger from the course about to be pursued towards the State of South Carolina by the Executive, that the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had stepped forward and saved it, and given peace and quiet to the nation. He (Mr. B.) would be among the last, he hoped, to attempt to pluck, with an envious hand, from the character of that honorable Senator, the fame which he had so justly earned on that occasion. As a citizen of the South, he was disposed to award to him full merit for the course which he had taken, but he would say, if the honorable Senator had come forward to save the country, that he avowed, in his speech upon that occasion, that he had likewise come forward to save the tariff system from the entire destruction, which, he said, threatened it, from the party friendly to the administration. A sentiment which that gentleman very naturally felt for a system, whose interests he had long cherished with an anxiety and zeal truly paternal. Mr. B. said, while justice was done to the Senator from Kentucky, it was but fair that equal justice should be done to the party friendly to the administration. He considered that the triumphant success of the friends of the administration in the Presidential election, in the fall of 1832, in the States of New Hampshire, Maine, New York, and Ohio, where the issues on the tariff was distinctly made up, had settled the fate of the protective system, as, by the result of that election, a great majority of the American people had indicated a determination not to be misunderstood on that question.

Mr. FORSYTH said that, in his allusion to the part taken in getting up this memorial by the disappointed candidate for office, he meant to impute nothing to him but a strong political feeling, which he had communicated to the people in his vicinity. He knew that gentleman, and he knew him to be incapable of any dishonorable intention. But the President had been charged by honorable gentlemen, with prolonging the settlement of the tariff question, in order to keep up the excitement that then prevailed in the South. He (Mr. F.) denied the truth of this charge most explicitly. So far from the President being actuated by any such motives, he, on the contrary, most anxiously desired that it might be speedily and satisfactorily settled. There were many gentlemen, both here and in the House of Representatives, friends of the President, who did not vote for the compromise bill, and he (Mr. F.) did not conceive that to be a crime; they, no doubt, had acted conscientiously in the course they had chosen to adopt. It was a great mistake in honorable gentlemen to suppose that a small portion of the administration party have a control over the President. No party or section of a party in the United States controls the President; and, whether his motives be good or bad, he would be controlled only by the will of the people of the United States. If the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANROSE] thought any one could control his will against his knowledge of the wishes of the people, he was much mistaken. He was not the man to submit to any thing of that kind; he acted on the suggestions of his own mind, and could not be induced to act against his own judgment. But the honorable gentleman seemed to be in the same situation as the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CHAMBERS:] that gentleman knew whom he was against, but he could not tell whom he was for; and, while he was willing to characterize a number of individuals as "collar men," because they belong to a party to which he is now directly opposed, he seemed to forget that he himself had once belonged to that very party. Now, what was the difference between being committed for an individual, and being committed against an individual? The motive was all the same; and, while the honorable Senator was, no doubt, actuated by pure and patriotic motives, he at least ought to accord the same feeling to those who entertained different sentiments. The honorable Senator says this is a contest between power and liberty, and it is to be decided by the people. Now he (Mr. F.) was sure the people knew how, and would take care of that liberty, under the blessings of which they have so long flourished.

Sir, there is no power here but the power of the people, and if they should decide for power against liberty, according to the gentleman's position, what then? The gentleman will submit, of course. Persons in power were always accused, by those who were out of power, with exercising an undue control over the press; that the patronage of the press was used for the purpose of corrupting the people. The President of the United States corrupt the people! The President, to whom the people, it is admitted, owe an immense debt of gratitude, using the press, and the funds of the nation, for the purpose of oppressing them! And for what end? For whose benefit? The President is advanced in life—he has no connexions in this world by the ties of blood. Could it be possible, then, that he should be found prostituting his high honors, and dispensing the patronage of his high office, for the purpose of enslaving the people? The President of the United States is a man—a just man—a patriotic man, and no doubt he believed that the principles on which he is conducting the Government are just, and calculated to promote its prosperity; and he was desirous that these principles should continue to be carried out; and he would be false to his country, and to the high trust reposed in him, if he did not desire to promote the elevation of a man, as his successor, who he knew would carry out these principles. The President's high character was amply sufficient to satisfy the people that he could not act from corrupt motives. Mr. F., in conclusion, admitted that he had his preference for the succession to the Presidency, but he would yield to the choice which should be made. And he hoped, if the two great parties to whom he was politically opposed should succeed in placing a man in the chair, he would administer the Government with the same integrity and patriotism with which it was now conducted, and he should have his hearty support.

Mr. CHAMBERS said his friend from Georgia seemed to regret the position in which he found the Senator from Maryland. He could account for it but in one way; he certainly had not located his allegiance; he had come to the Senate unbiased as to any question that might come before it; and he found relief from this circumstance. He could carry out all the principles he had ever entertained, without being embarrassed by any considerations foreign to the purpose. Now there was no gentleman to whom he would so readily concede the merit of having sincerity of purpose and settled principles, as the gentleman from Georgia; but he asked him if he did not find himself embarrassed when his sentiments, on particular questions, came in conflict with his wishes for the elevation of a friend? Did he not sometimes find great difficulty in reconciling his preference for an individual with some of those great principles which he professes? It was not very usual for political adversaries to give advice to each other, unless some great political object is to be accomplished by its being followed. It might possibly be useful to our opponents, Mr. C. said, if we were to start a candidate for the Presidency, as advised by the gentleman from Georgia, for we might then be in the same situation, and experience the same difficulties, that it is to be apprehended the gentleman from Georgia does.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that he could not answer the gentleman from Maryland, at least in a manner that would be satisfactory to him. The only difference, in his opinion, between him and the gentleman was, as to the motives that governed them. If the gentleman said that he (Mr. F.) was influenced by his preferences for an individual, let the gentleman look at the natural desire for the gratification of antipathies, and examine whether that has not in some measure influenced him. With respect to his having given the gentleman and his friends some advice, he really did not intend it as such, and had no desire that they should bring forward their candidate, though he confessed he had some curiosity on the subject. The honorable Senator was mistaken, if he supposed his preferences for any individual were unalterably fixed—it was true he had a decided preference, but a variety of circumstances might occur to give him other opinions. It was not an impossible thing that himself and the Senator from Maryland might, in time, be found to agree very well together.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I shall be proud of the gentleman's company; but, if we act together, he must come over to my side of the question.

Mr. PORTER next addressed the Senate, as follows:

I do not wish, Mr. President, (said Mr. P.,) to take any part in the contest between the two Senators from North Carolina, in which we have witnessed so much sharp shooting; and I hope, at all events, not to draw on me the fire of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORREST,] who, with a skill and fertility which have excited my surprise and admiration, has for the last eight weeks, found topics of consolation for all the variety of distress which has sought relief here, and, at the same time, has mixed with that consolation something very different indeed for those who have, on this floor, been the medium by which the sufferings of the people have reached this body.

The principal reason I have for addressing the Senate is to inform it of such facts as have come to my knowledge in regard to the people of Louisiana, so far as their condition has been affected by the late acts of the General Government in relation to the public deposits. As, however, the discussions which have arisen here each day, for the space of nearly two months, on the presentation of memorials, may be properly regarded as rather a debate on the state of the Union, than on the mere topics connected with these memorials, I trust I shall be pardoned if I look a little beyond the mere facts, and give some of my attention to the causes of the disease, and to the remedies by which it may be alleviated.

While, however, on the threshold of this subject, and before I enter into it, I must disclaim all intentions of treating this as a party question. I have heard it repeatedly said it was one of that kind, and I am afraid it is so regarded by many. I deplore such a state of things, for it is unfavorable to the investigation of truth. The question, too, involves considerations far above the interests of political aspirants—it is of a deeper and much more serious character, it touches the fortunes and happiness of millions; and the American people, I am sure, will not permit that a matter of such vital importance to their interests shall be debated and adjudged on party grounds. If they ever become impressed with the conviction that it is so, it will rouse to madness feelings now repressed by a hope that their sufferings will receive a dispassionate examination. If, therefore, any thing which has heretofore transpired on this floor gives color to the assertion that this is to be made a party question, I hope that the future course of our deliberations will show it to be a mistake. A gentleman of this body quoted to me the other day, in conversation, a remark of one of the most sagacious statesmen of Great Britain, and, at the same time, one of the strongest party-men of his day, that "Money was neither whig nor tory." So should it be here, neither Jackson nor anti-Jackson. More especially should such a doctrine be repudiated when great public distress exists, and when the protection of the capital and industry of the country depends on the soundness of our decision.

Akin to this objection, which relates to party, we have been told by the honorable Senator from Georgia that our real cause of complaint, after all, was the popularity of the President of the United States. Sir, I have not heard any such complaint on this floor, but, if it had been made, I am not sure that it may not be a grievance of which we may complain. A certain degree of popularity is required in every President, in order that he may be able to carry into effect those measures which are necessary for the public weal; but an inordinate popularity, which stifles inquiry and obscures a search after truth, is justly to be deprecated, and when carried so far as to defeat legislation called for by the people, it becomes a serious matter for complaint. The taunt, therefore, of the honorable member from Georgia might have been spared, unless he was prepared to show that the acts, which the popularity of the President obstructed, were unwise and hurtful. He has not done so, and he is not, I presume, to be understood to say that popularity in itself is a thing to be admired and respected. In my estimation it proves nothing as to the merits of the possessor, if the power it confers be not used for sage and beneficent purposes.

But, sir, I go farther; and I say that, not only may the popularity of a President, when urged in a certain manner, be a just cause of complaint, but, in my judgment, it is a great, a very great misfortune for any people to have at the head of their Government an extremely popular man; because it is a necessary consequence of such a popularity, in a free country, that there exists no adequate check on the errors of his administration. I make this observation, not merely in relation to the present President of the United States; it would be equally true, and as readily said by me of any other individual who might fill the office, if he exercised the same influence the present incumbent does over the public mind. It is impossible that any man can fill the Presidential chair, and have to deal with all the delicate and embarrassing questions which grow out of the conflicting interests of the different portions of this vast republic, and not commit errors. The constitution and the laws presume he will fall into them. They have aided him by constitutional advisers; and they have appointed to him constitutional checks. Well, sir, how stands the case with the present Chief Magistrate? I suppose it is not offensive to say that he is but a man, and that he may have committed errors since he was elected. Nay, that in all the matters which have come before him, it would be more than a miracle if he had not committed many. And yet such is the effect of his popularity, that it is generally believed he has committed none. Whatever he has done has been right, and, had it been otherwise, I have no doubt that, on the same principle, the sound, staunch men of the party would also have said it was right—ay, too, and would have induced the people to think it was right. There is no action performed by him, since he came into power, which has not been defended—justified—applauded. Whenever “he has taken the responsibility,” the people have followed in his train, until things have come to such a pass, that he is spoken of as the head of the Government of another country is spoken of—he can do no wrong!

Do not the facts belonging to the question we are now debating prove beyond doubt the truth of these views? Is there a man on this floor who has said, or will say, that he would have given advice to the President to remove the deposits? Is there any one who does not believe that it would have been better to have delayed taking so important a step until Congress could meet? I doubt if such a man can be found; at least I have met with no one, since my arrival here, who considers the measure, under all its circumstances, correct. And yet, because it has been done by Andrew Jackson, it is a measure of wisdom, of prudence, and of great public utility. The war cry of party is raised; and virtuous men, who, apart from its influence, would not hesitate to acknowledge the error, nor fail to correct it, are drawn by their feelings to seek a justification for it. That justification cannot be found, for it does not exist; but, in lieu of it, we are called upon here to witness, day after day, the best efforts which vigorous minds can make to obscure the true question, and draw public attention from the real point in dispute. Nay, on this floor the act is lauded—it is one of Roman virtue and of Roman wisdom? And, worse than all, the language of reproach is restored to, and men are denounced because they call in question its wisdom and its justice. I leave it to gentlemen to reflect whether this be a healthy state of public feeling. I put it to them to consider if it be consistent with public utility that such idolatry should be displayed in regard to any individual, and whether it be safe to habituate the people to pass by Congress, and look to the President as the source from which all legislation should flow. If they think so, why then they are right to sustain even this act; but, if they think with me, that it is better to acknowledge the President is but a man, and that he may err, no fitter occasion can arise than the present, to make an oblation of party feeling to the best interests of the republic.

In giving to the Senate such facts as have come to my knowledge, touching the influence which the late measures of the President and his Secretary have had on the money market in our State, and the price of our staple productions, sugar and cotton, it becomes my duty to frankly state that I am greatly surprised that our section of the republic should have suffered so much as my advices assure me it has. The Senate, too, I am certain, will share in my surprise, when I state that the nominal banking capital of the city of New Orleans, independent of that employed there by the Bank of the United States, is twenty-seven and a half millions of dollars; that, of this immense amount, all has been paid in, as the phrase is, save perhaps three millions of dollars. The far greater part of this capital, I might perhaps say all, has not been formed by a practice, I am told common elsewhere, of paying the first instalment so as to enable the bank to commence its operations, and then borrowing on the accommodations the institution can afford, by the circulation of its paper, to pay up any further instalments which are called for. On the contrary, the capital of by far the greater portion of our banks has been obtained from England and our sister States, in consequence of the readiness, and I am afraid I must add the profusion, with which our legislatures, for several years past, have pledged the faith of the State for the repayment of money borrowed for such purposes.

Looking on such a state of things, sir, when I left the banks of the Mississippi, about two months ago, I did think, and I communicated my opinion to several of my commercial friends, that the pecuniary pressure, which we understood was beginning to be felt to the north and east of us, would not reach Louisiana. Among others, to whom, in the interchange of opinion, I imparted these views, was a gentleman of great experience in matters of currency, who told me I was mistaken; that the connexion between the great commercial cities of this continent in relation to money, was so intimate, and the sympathy between them so strong, that a severe blow dealt to any one of them could not fail, sooner or later, to reach all the rest. Sir, keeping my eye on the value of our products, and the enormous amount of our banking capital, I doubted the correctness of this opinion; but the event has shown the difference between the experience of a practical man, whose life has been devoted to pursuits connected with the subject under consideration, and my crude, theoretical notions. It has proved that I was wrong and that he was right; and that the shock given to the money market, at New York and Philadelphia, has been carried to New Orleans, in obedience to laws as invariable in their operations as those which move and control the physical world.

I have received several letters from the city of New Orleans, of recent date, from men extensively engaged in business, well acquainted with the state of the money market there, and themselves as little exposed to the danger of wanting this necessary article at the present crisis, as any persons within the range of my acquaintance. I will not commonplace to you, sir, on their respectability, and love of truth. It is enough for me to say that they are merchants of the first respectability among the merchants of New Orleans—a body of men, who, on the credit of an experience acquired during fourteen years spent in judging them and their transactions, I take on me to say, are excelled by no others on earth of similar pursuits,—in enterprise,—commercial knowledge,—a clear-sighted view of their interest,—and a wise integrity which enables them to know that their own prosperity is, in the end, best promoted by doing justice to others. They write me under date from the 15th of January to the 1st of February, that paper which, when I left the city, was discounted at rates varying from eight to ten per cent., could only be cashed, at the time they wrote, at fifteen or twenty per cent. They take the liberty, also, sir, to express their opinions as to the cause of the unexpected change which has come over them and the country; but I shall not trouble you with their speculations, much as they are entitled to respect. The cause of the suffering which now pervades society, presents grounds which is debatable. But, although it is somewhat difficult to say what has occasioned the present pressure in the money market, it is quite easy to say that one thing has not produced it in New Orleans.

Sir, I feel authorized to declare that the present scarcity of money in that city is not owing to the branch of the United States Bank established there. And, as some erroneous impressions have been conveyed to the Senate on this matter, I seize on the present occasion to correct them. Some time after I had the honor to take my seat here, the honorable Senator from Missouri (Mr. BAXTER) read to this body a letter received by him from a highly respectable source in our city, wherein the pressure was attributed to the conduct of the branch bank, acting under the orders of the parent institution at Philadelphia. Sir, I do not disguise from you that this intelligence greatly surprised me, and I did think it especially strange that, if such was the fact, myself and my colleague were to learn it for the first time on this floor, from the Senator of another State. Sir, I immediately set to work, with the diligence of a man in search of truth, and I went to the fountain head to obtain information. I have procured it, and I learn from what I get there, as well as from other sources, that no blame whatever is attributable either to the mother bank or its branch in New Orleans. The statement of the letter-writer alluded to, that orders had been sent from Philadelphia to New Orleans, prohibiting the purchase of drafts on the Western country, was entirely gratuitous. No such orders were sent. Necessity, indeed, produced by the removal of the deposits, and the threatening attitude assumed by the Executive, prevented the purchase of western exchange to the same amount as formerly, and compelled the bank to concentrate its funds in the principal Atlantic cities, where the larger portion of money derived from duties was to be collected and placed in the pet banks, and where, of course, the heaviest demands would be made on that of the United States. But the conduct of the branch located in our city has, under the peculiar circumstances in which it was unexpectedly placed, been liberal in a high degree. A short statement of their business within the last four months will prove this. On the 4th November, 1833, their notes and exchange, under discounts, were $6,110,577 57, and their public deposits at that time, were $596,929 06. On the 3d of the next month their balances exhibited the same relative proportions. But on the 3d of February, their notes under discount and exchange had increased to $8,759,518 45, and their deposits were $150,116 25; so that in ninety days preceding the 3d of February, the Government had deprived the bank, as far as it could, of all means of accommodating the trade of our city; it had withdrawn four hundred and forty-six thousand dollars of the deposits, which was nearly the whole, and during the same time the bank had extended its accommodations to the public to the amount of two million six hundred and forty-eight thousand nine hundred and forty dollars beyond the sum lent out on the 3d of November; and yet the conduct of the bank, it is said, during this period, has been the cause of the pressure on the money market in New Orleans! Oh, fy! Sir, the charge has just as much foundation against the bank in New Orleans as against the mother bank and its branches in other cities of the Union. Whenever we go into particulars, and can get its enemies and accusers to descend from empty generalities, and investigate facts, the utter want of all foundation for their accusations instantly appears.

While on this subject of the bank in our city, and its accommodations, I cannot help lamenting the deplorable inconvenience to which the merchants of New Orleans, and the whole commerce of the Western States, will be exposed, by the breaking up of an institution which has so much facilitated the operations of trade, by the purchase of internal bills of exchange. The Senate, I am sure, are not aware to what extent its usefulness has been carried. Through all the States to the West, and particularly those of the Southwest, a large proportion of the planters and farmers require advances in their crops, before they can be got ready for market. The merchants in those regions have not the means of making their advances, if unaided by a bank similar to that of the United States. But, for years back, the funds have been supplied by that institution for this purpose. Commercial houses, all through the Western States, having credit, and doing business with those of our city, have drawn late in the summer, or early in the autumn, bills of exchange on New Orleans, and sold them to the branches established in their respective States. With the money drawn from this source, the planter and the farmer have been supplied, and the extent and value of this accommodation can only be judged of by those who are acquainted with the habits and wants of the planting portion of the community. Its utility, however, did not stop here. A few months run round, the crops are gathered, delivered to the merchant, and transmitted to New Orleans for sale. There then happens what might be expected in all cases where considerations of personal advantage enter into the calculations we make of the future. It is found that the planter has estimated too largely his crop; he falls in debt to his merchant, and he in return has a balance against him in the city where the produce was sold. The bank steps in again, and purchases from the factor in New Orleans, a draft on the house in the Western country, and in that way enables the produce of a second crop to be got to market before payment is really demanded. What I now state, has been every year's transactions for several years back; and I confess I see no means of supplying such an accommodation through State banks. Indeed, in the matter of exchange, and all other matters connected with the whole trade of the Western country, the advantages conferred by the institution which it is now wantonly attempted to destroy, have been immense. I declare, solemnly, that as much to it, as to any other cause, do I attribute the development of the resources of the Western country. Without it, the delightful results of industry, stimulated by capital, would not have shown themselves in the subdued forests, cultivated fields, and growing cities of the West; nor would crowds of steamboats have now covered her waters.

I have stated, sir, that I did not believe the State banks could supply the vacuum which would be created by the withdrawal of the capital. I go further, and say, that, were that capital divided among them, I do not think they could wield it to the same advantage for the community, more especially in this matter of exchange. Confidence can never exist between independent institutions to such a degree as to enable them to carry on the purchase of bills of exchange to the same extent as one institution, possessed of the capital of all, can, through her respective branches. As soon, too, as the great regulator and controller of the State institutions, the Bank of the United States, is withdrawn, the same scenes will be rapidly presented to our eyes as met them after the destruction of the first national bank. The respective States will augment the number of local institutions. Competition, and the desire to make large dividends, will stimulate them all to issue as much paper as they can. It will, of course, inevitably depreciate in value. Mutual distrust will take place. They will fear to credit each other; and finally it will be impossible to transfer money from one part of the Union to the other, without great inconvenience and expense.

I pass, sir, from the considerations which grow out of the condition of the money-market in Louisiana, to the situation of the planters under the late derangement in our currency. The Senators from Mississippi and South Carolina [Messrs. POINDEXTER and PAXTON] stated, in an early part of this session, that the price of cotton in the Southern States was not within two or three cents of the price which it should bring in reference to its value at the port of Liverpool, and they argued, and, as I thought, very satisfactorily, that such a difference could alone proceed from a want of money in the United States. This position has been assailed by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] who addressed this body a few days since for the first time, and with a clearness which I am much more capable of admiring than of imitating. He considered the idea as wholly fallacious, that, if cotton was below its real value, money would instantly seek it as a profitable investment, and that the competition thus procured for it would raise the article to its true price. Sir, I differ in opinion with the honorable Senator. As a general rule, there can be no doubt that low prices invite purchasers, and that the number who seek to profit by such a state of things soon raises the objects offered for sale to their true value. And this is a consequence of a universal law, by which money, like the fluids, has a tendency to find its level. But the honorable Senator overlooked the fact that it takes money some time to find the level. The State of Louisiana bears very full testimony to the truth of this position. For the last twenty years and upwards, we have been paying interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, while, in the Northern States, money, during the same time, was not worth more than five or six per cent. Many causes check and prevent the operation of the law alluded to. It is not necessary to go into them. The fact is indisputable. And the argument of the honorable Senator by no means affects the correctness of the assertion, that cotton may be of less value here than it should be, when compared with the price at the place of consumption. I am free indeed to admit that such a state of things cannot be of long duration, and that very soon if indeed the market has not already come to that state, prices must be at their true proportion. But in the mean time great mischief is done. The planter in many, I am afraid too many, instances has not been able to wait this change in price. He has been compelled to sell, and the difference in value has become profit to the rich capitalist. The agriculturist, as usual, has been the victim. This loss, it is clear, is solely due to the unwise and unfortunate act of the Secretary, removing the deposits, and thereby deranging the currency of the country.

But whether correct or not in these remarks, I apprehend there will be little controversy in relation to those I may make on the other grand staple of our State—sugar. It is known to the Senate that the cane from which the article is manufactured is the production of the tropical regions, and that it is with much difficulty, and great hazard of loss, that its cultivation is pursued in the most favored portions of the United States. The last season we were visited by a frost, unexampled for its severity at so early a period of the autumn. From this and other causes which need not be enumerated, the crop of sugar was reduced to a little more than half what would have been the result in a favorable year. Disastrous as this blow was, falling after two previous years of bad crops, we had a consolation in the news which flowed in upon us from all quarters, that the price would be high. We learned that the quantity produced in the West Indies was much less than usual, and that the market to the North was never known more completely bare of the article than it was at the beginning of the present winter. And yet, sir, what is now the fact, as it relates to prices under the operation of the late Executive measures? Why, this: that with a foreign supply, less than has been known for years; with a domestic production not adequate to meet the demands of the market in an ordinary year, we cannot sell. My merchants write me, that, such is the depression of the money market, they cannot dispose of a quantity of sugar as formerly; that the grocers who, in other times, purchased forty or fifty hogsheads at once, now content themselves with five or six; that the consumption was diminished, and likely to be still further diminished, as the working classes were thrown out of employment, and their comforts abridged. And, sir, when they do sell a few hogsheads, they accompany the account with a declaration that, were it not for the deranged state of the currency, the article would bring a cent to a cent and a half per pound more than it is now selling for. The correctness of this statement I cannot doubt, for I see the same effect, or nearly the same, produced on all commodities. So that the Louisiana planter this year must pay a tax of from ten to fifteen dollars on each hogshead of sugar, in order that an experiment may be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is really difficult for one, thus contemplating the injury wantonly and unnecessarily inflicted on the people he represents, to measure his expressions of disapprobation, so as to render them befitting the calmness and the dignity of this high assembly. Had this misfortune fallen on the country by the act of God, or by foreign war, or by any thing else that was inevitable, the people of Louisiana would have met it with the same energy they once exhibited, when, under the gallant auspices of the individual now at the head of the Government, they rushed to battle, and aided him to drive the enemy from their shores. But to see their prosperity interrupted, and the fruits of their labor diminished in value, without any adequate cause for the infliction of the injury, is too much for human patience.

And, sir, I feel the difficulty of treating the subject calmly greatly increased, when I hear it said on this floor, to weaken the influence which the cry of suffering from the people must have on our measures, that the distress is but temporary, and that the accounts of it are exaggerated from motives of political opposition, and for political effect. It is no doubt true, sir, the distress is but temporary; that is, there will be an end to it some time; but what consolation that reflection can bring, when its effects are permanent, I am at a loss to conjecture. It is a poor comfort, it is worse. It is cruel mockery to the trader, merchant, or manufacturer, who is made bankrupt by Government experiments, to be told that he should not be distressed; for that, although he is ruined in credit and hopes for the rest of his life, the republic will survive the disaster, and flourish again. Still less do such observations give consolation to the artificer, or laborer, who is thrown out of employment, deprived of the means of earning his daily food and that of his family, and compelled to ask from charity what he formerly obtained from industry. And as to political opposition causing these memorials to pour in upon us, day after day, in such numbers as to deprive us of the time necessary for the ordinary duties of legislation, I apprehend it is a great mistake to suppose they spring from any such source. That political feeling may mingle with them in some degree, is perhaps true; but that it is the cause of them, I utterly deny. To imagine so, is to take the curl produced on the surface of the sea by the wind, as an indication of its movement, while it is the tide, by an irresistible impulse, which carries the ocean to its limits. No, sir, political disappointment, nor the desire of political effect, never could have thus heaved up the elements of society, and thrown them before us, praying for a hearing, and supplicating for redress. Political feeling can do much; it sometimes deceives the head, and often influences the heart, but it has little effect on the pocket; and when men find their purses emptied by State empirics, you may confide in the perfect sincerity of their complaints, and you have no occasion to look beyond that state of things for the motives which urge them to present their grievances to your consideration.

Having now, sir, accomplished the main object I had in obtaining the floor, I might, perhaps with propriety, close my remarks. But as, in the present condition of our affairs, the opinions of every man who has a share in the national councils is of importance, though his place there may be the only circumstance which makes them so, I think it proper to state some conclusions I have formed on the matters which now agitate the country. And first, then, sir, as to the cause of the present embarrassment. My convictions are very decided, that it is due to the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States. It seems to have puzzled gentlemen on this floor, and elsewhere, how the change of a sum of money from one banking-house to another could occasion any distress to the public. I do not know that I am correct in my views of the matter, but it does not seem to be very difficult to explain the modus operandi. Credit rests entirely on the opinion entertained of safety. And that opinion once shaken, whether on good grounds or bad, all the evils which grow out of panic flow in upon society nearly as rapidly as if the danger was real. It is clear to me at least, that, had the conduct of the United States Bank been what it might, a momentary pressure must have existed in the money market, and that, if that pressure produced general alarm, it was a consequence that the pressure should continue much longer than the original cause subsisted. When the State banks, and the mercantile and trading portion of the people, saw such an unexpected and heavy blow dealt by the President of the United States against the national bank, it was impossible they should not be alarmed, for they could neither tell how it would affect the bank, or how that institution, on being so struck, would feel compelled to act during the unexpired term of its charter. The Secretary of the Treasury declared that it was high time it should begin to curtail its discounts, and commence the settlement of its affairs. And the subordinate agents boasted that they had the institution under their feet. Such a state of things immediately filled all the local institutions, and all men of prudence, with the fear of an approaching storm. That fear in itself was sufficient to produce the evil that was dreaded; for it made men distrustful of one another. That distrust showed itself in diminished discounts in the State banks, fewer sales than usual, and more caution in giving endorsements. The usual consequences have followed such a state of things. The feeble in wealth and credit have sunk first, and their misfortunes have caused more to be apprehended. Banks, private citizens, and all who have capital, become more and more alarmed every day, and the evil keeps augmenting. When such a state of things occurs, it is a necessary consequence that the evil must progress, unless the banks can come to the relief of the community, by an accommodation beyond that given before the alarm began. It is they who must set the example in restoring confidence. Private capitalists will follow, but not lead in such a measure. There was a time when the national bank, from its great resources, and its connexion with the Government, had in some measure the responsibility of preventing, if possible, such a panic, and of relieving it, if it did occur. But that duty and that power have both ceased, and there is no prospect of the country being relieved. The distress must increase, so soon as the curtailments of the Bank of the United States commence; and the Secretary of the Treasury has told the Bank that this curtailment has been delayed too long, and that it is necessary to the best interests of society it should have commenced ere this, in order that the State bank paper might come gradually into use.

Never, in my judgment, was a more unwise measure resorted to in any country than that of removing the deposits. Time, which enters more or less into the considerations on which the propriety or fitness of all measures depends, was wholly disregarded. Any man, whether statesman or not, could have seen that it was an unpropitious moment; that there was so much trade, there might almost be said to be over-trading; and that credit, through the whole extent of the country, was pushed to its utmost extent. Senators say, indeed, that had the deposits been removed at any time, the same evil consequences would have followed. I enter, sir, my utter dissent to such a proposition. Had it been deferred until the termination of the charter, as was the case with the old United States Bank, men would have had time to regulate their engagements to meet the change. Foreseeing that when the bank closed its affairs, a shock would be given to the monetary system, preparations would have been made to meet it. The State banks, too, would have been more able to give relief, because the large capital of the national bank would, at that time, be ready to flow into other channels. But now, with a fatuity of which there is no example, we have given a shock to credit and confidence, when for two years to come, and more, the capital of the Bank of the United States, or the larger proportion of it, will be withdrawn from circulation, while that institution is winding up its affairs. We have done so, sir, without having any substitute prepared, in place of the capital thus taken out. The State banks, it is clear, cannot furnish it. They complain of pressure now, when there has occurred nothing to occasion it, save the want of confidence. What their situation will be when the United States Bank commences its curtailments, need not be said. The pressure on them will augment, and, with it, their incapacity to afford any relief. Sir, I see no end to this confusion and distress, unless the people of the United States speak a language to their rulers that cannot be disregarded.

I hold, then, sir, that the removal of the deposits was a sufficient cause to produce the present calamitous state of our affairs. If it was not, I call on honorable Senators to say what does occasion it? We have been told it is caused by the Bank of the United States: but if it is, gentlemen can surely show how the bank has caused it.

North Carolina Memorial.

This is an interrogatory which has been put again and again on this floor: and to which no answer has been given, save that the bank is very powerful, very corrupt, and is using all its means to oppress the public, and force a re-charter from Congress. These are just as easily said, as any other similar number of English words; and, without proof in support of them, they are of no more assistance in deciding the question, than the same number of words on any other subject would be. The bank, however, does not rest her defence on the want of proof on the part of her accusers. She shows beyond doubt, on the most irrefragable evidence, that it is not owing to her action. The official returns establish that the curtailment of her discounts has not exceeded the sum of money withdrawn by the Government from her vaults. The clamor against her, then, is without any foundation. A new version has indeed been given to the complaint against the bank, by an honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. SHER-ZER.] According to him, the bank might relieve the public distress, if it would only issue about fifteen millions of bank notes. This is a very compendious way of settling the question. But has the honorable Senator any information which enables him to say that the bank could issue such a sum safely? Nay, that it could issue one million more, at the present crisis, than it has now in circulation? If he has, it is a knowledge not possessed by me, nor do I believe by any other member of this body. The recommendation of the Senator from Maine, however, forms a curious contrast with the mandates of the Secretary of the Treasury last October. According to the Senator, the bank should extend its discounts at the present time. According to the Secretary, it should not have delayed their curtailment beyond the 1st of October last. According to the Senator, it is an evil that there is not more United States Bank paper in circulation. According to the Secretary, there was too much of it out three months ago, and it was then absolutely necessary for the bank to call it in. Sir, it is not uninteresting to recur to the language used by that high functionary some months ago. It will serve, I trust, as a warning, hereafter, for men not to tamper with the currency of the country. In his letter of the 3d of December, transmitting a report on the removal of the public deposits, he says, "The State banks can, I have no doubt, furnish a general circulating medium quite as uniform in value as that which has been furnished by the Bank of the United States—perhaps more." He continues: "But a currency founded on the notes of State banks, could not be suddenly substituted for that heretofore furnished by the Bank of the United States, and take the place of it, at the same moment, in every part of the Union." He further adds, that "by the monthly statement of the bank of the 2d September last, the notes of the bank and its branches, then in circulation, amounted to $18,413,287 07, and that this immense amount must all be withdrawn from circulation when the charter expires." Having got these ideas well fixed in his mind, viz. that the notes of the State banks would furnish a good, and perhaps better currency than the United States Bank notes, that there were a great quantity of the latter in circulation, and that they must be withdrawn, the Secretary discovers that the notes of the Bank of the United States are about to depreciate, and that it is important—mark his words—"that they should be all taken out of circulation before they depreciate in the hands of the individuals who hold them." This alarming conclusion being reached, it was necessary to set to work immediately to avert such disastrous consequences from the community; and, accordingly, this officer, in the report already quoted from, asks "how long it will require, for the ordinary operations of commerce, and the reduction of discounts by the bank, to withdraw the amount of circulation before mentioned, without giving a shock to the currency, or producing a distressing pressure on the community." This question he answers himself in the next sentence, by declaring his conviction "that the time which remained for the charter to run, after the 1st October, (the day on which the removal of the deposits took place,) was not more than was proper to accomplish the object with safety to the community." Now, sir, I admit that the bank has not followed these instructions; that she did not begin to curtail her discounts on the 1st of October; and that, in this respect, if the opinions of the Executive were wise and salutary, the institution has been in fault. But if, instead of disobeying these instructions, the bank had followed them, what would have been the consequence? My honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] with his usual clearness, showed, the other day, that if the bank, between this and the termination of her charter, withdraws all the notes from circulation, and collects her debts, she must call in about two millions each month from the community; for the amount she has to collect is fifty-five millions, and the time little more than twenty-four months. Now sir, if, in obedience to the mandate of the Secretary, the bank had commenced, on the 1st of October last, the gradual curtailment of which he speaks, and diminished her discounts two millions a month since that time, she would have, by the 1st of March, withdrawn from circulation ten millions of dollars.

If she had, I ask if there is any man here who can look steadily on the frightful consequences which must have ensued? If the commercial world is now agonized by a mere derangement of the currency, in what situation would it be placed, if to that derangement there were added, at this moment, the effects of withdrawing so large a sum from circulation? Ruin, in its worst form, must have fallen on the larger portion of the commercial and manufacturing interest of the country, unless, indeed, the State banks had suspended specie payments. The bank of the United States, sir, in my opinion, has won a strong title to the confidence of the people by her conduct. She saw the crisis that was approaching—she knew the pressure would be great; and that, keeping strictly within the Executive injunction conveyed to her, she could have produced such a convulsion as would have compelled her adversaries to change their conduct towards her. But she preferred to the gratifications of a triumph over them, the performance of her duty. And the Secretary of the Treasury, who is known to be a virtuous as well as a talented man, must, I am sure, rejoice that the country was saved from the effects of his own measures; though that salvation was effected at the expense of his reputation for foresight, and a knowledge of the subject he was handling. Heavy as is the responsibility which weighs upon him now, it would have been increased tenfold had the bank followed his instructions.

But, sir, though the work of curtailment has not yet commenced, the hour when it must begin is rapidly approaching, if indeed it has not already arrived. The bank cannot defer much longer to commence the withdrawal of her funds from circulation, and the moment she does, all the evils under which the community suffers will be aggravated far beyond even their present severity. We should not sit here with our arms folded, and see so much calamity about to fall on the country, without making a single effort to avert it. It is the part of wisdom, as well as of duty, to step forward and meet the danger before it reaches us. I have the most sincere conviction that, unless we do something, and speedily, the capital and industry of the country are about to receive a shock from which they will not recover for years. Sir, I am one of those who think that there are no means to restore confidence, but by a re-charter of the bank, and for that measure I am prepared to vote. Whenever it is presented for our consideration, I shall give it my support, provided certain modifications can be obtained in the present charter, which, without impairing its utility, will remove many of the objections which grow out of an honest jealousy of its power.

In making this remark, I am not to be understood as giving my sanction to this jealousy; but, in carrying out any measure, public opinion, and public prejudice too, should be consulted and gratified, provided they can be gratified without injury to the true interests of the country. This opinion as to the propriety of rechartering the bank renders it almost unnecessary for me to say that I am wholly opposed to the proposition to return to a metallic currency. We cannot do so, if we wished, and, if we could, it is not desirable. If the question was now proposed for the first time, what kind of circulating medium we should adopt for this country, I should hesitate which to prefer—a metallic currency, or a mixed one. Each has its advantages. On the whole, I believe the latter is best adopted to the wants and interests of a country so decidedly commercial, and so rapidly increasing as ours. But, in our present situation, with the habits of society formed to the use of paper money, and with innumerable contracts existing, which have been entered into on long credits, in relation to the value given to real estate by this species of money, so complete a change in our circulating medium would work great injustice. If the quantity of gold and silver necessary for the wants of this country be, as I heard it estimated, and I think correctly, eighty millions of dollars, and we have now about twenty-five or thirty millions in the United States, we must go into market to procure the difference between these two sums. An immediate demand for so large an amount would greatly raise the value of specie, both in Europe and America; and, as a consequence, so depress the value of all property, as to prove ruinous to thousands. I do not see any advantages in a metallic currency to induce me to pay so dearly for it. Nor is it unworthy of consideration, that a well-regulated paper currency enables us to employ all the capital represented by that paper, beyond the specie in the vaults of the banks, in other and useful purposes, and which, if we had not paper money, would be sunk in the purchase of a circulating medium. There are many other considerations belonging to this part of the subject, which an unwillingness to trespass on the time of the Senate forbids me to enter into, more especially as all speculations in regard to it are fruitless in this country.

For, if we wished to return to a metallic currency, we have not the power to do so. We have no means of compelling the States to resort to it. They will charter as many banks as they please; and there are so many of the strongest passions of our nature at work to create them, that there will be always more of them than there should be. Your refusal to take their notes at your custom-houses and land offices, may check the circulation of their paper on the seaboard and extreme West, but in the much larger portions of the United States they will disregard such a measure, because bank notes are not wanted in it for either purpose. Sir, it is easy to see the state to which we are approaching. So soon as the national bank, the great controller and regulator of the State banks, is withdrawn, we shall have from four to five hundred of these institutions, all of them trying to make as large dividends as possible, and using every effort to flood their respective neighborhoods with their own paper. Gentlemen say that the liability of the bank to demands for specie for their notes will operate as a check on excessive issues. It will no doubt do so when the direction is prudent and wise; but experience has proved it is not a sufficient restraint to the greater number of these institutions. The truth is, that the liability of the bank for specie is merely nominal, unless apprehension exists as to its solvency. At other times, save under circumstances so peculiar as to forbid us to deduce any general rule from them, it is scarcely asked for in large quantities. No, sir, these banks will do as all others have done, circumstanced like them; they will issue as much paper as they can; they will make as large dividends as they can; they will forget and condemn the distant danger; and they will profit by what they consider the present advantage. It is in human nature they should do so. It is in our experience they have done so. Such has been their course in England, in Scotland, and in the United States. Whenever the salutary influence of a controlling institution has been withdrawn from them, they have issued too much paper, and deranged the currency of the country.

But gentlemen say it is an experiment we are making; and, if that experiment fails, we can then resort to a national bank. Sir, admitting it to be an experiment, I see no wisdom in making it. If our situation under the regular influence of the United States Bank had been one of misfortune; if, before the late measures, our currency had been vitiated, and the bank had failed to perform the other purposes for which it was created, then, I admit, there might be some excuse for making an experiment. But to choose a time when our currency was sound; when the fiscal affairs of the Government were faithfully conducted, and all the different classes of society enjoyed the fruits of their industry; and prosperity was seen in every form by which the advance of society in wealth and comfort could be marked—to choose such a moment as that, I say, to make an experiment, by which we might be made a great deal worse, and could not be made better, may be a very wise measure in the Government; but, if an individual were so to act in the management of his private affairs, I should think doubts might be reasonably entertained of his sanity.

But, sir, this talk about an experiment is a mere delusion. I warn the American people not to be deceived by it. There is no experiment to be made. The experiment was tried twenty years ago, and it failed, signally failed. It would seem that we had forgotten, or were unwilling to take lessons from the past. When the charter of the first National Bank was about expiring, an application was made to renew it. The same opposition was made to it that we hear now offered against the present institution; and there are to be found, in the attacks of its opponents, the same general denunciations; the same resort to prejudice; the same lackness of argument, and failure of proof—the capital was foreign; its directors were of the party not in power; it had meddled in elections; it was dangerous to our liberties; it was a mammoth of corruption. Not one scintilla of proof do I find in the debates of that day, in support of these charges, but the accusation struck in with popular prejudice, and the bank was destroyed. Yes, sir, it was destroyed; and dearly did the American people pay for the errors of their politicians. The whole currency of the country immediately fell into such confusion, that no man could tell what was the value of his property; and, after years of disaster and distress, a bank, by the voice of a large majority of the people, was erected in the place of that which had been demolished. Then, too, sir, was taught a lesson, which I should have thought never would have been forgotten. The men who had been principally instrumental in putting down the first bank, were compelled, by what passed before their eyes, to come forward and acknowledge their errors, and assist in repairing them by the creation of a new bank. And do gentlemen, in the face of this recent and striking example, still say that the experiment is yet to be made?

Sir, I predict that after the currency of the country is deranged, and confusion and distress pervade all the land, we shall see the very men, now engaged in preventing the re-charter of this bank, if they should succeed, forced to come forward, and endeavor to have a similar one chartered. To these men I say, do now, with a good grace, what you will finally be compelled to do. Do it before your country suffers at every pore—before you have ruined the hopes and broken the fortunes of hundreds of thousands! This is a question in which your patriotism can, and ought, to soar above party considerations. If the President of the United States has committed an error, and you refuse to correct it, do you not enable your adversaries to say that in your opinion the President has not other and sufficient merits to permit you to acknowledge one mistake made by him? Sir, I trust better counsels will prevail; and that, before Congress adjourns, casting aside party spirit, some measures will be devised, by our united deliberations, which will withdraw the country in safety from the perilous position in which it is now placed.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION BILL.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the Senate postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill from the House making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions for the year 1834. He would take that occasion, he said, to make a remark or two on the subject. It had been customary to take up appropriation bills, when discussion was not anticipated, at any time, and pass them through the Senate. There came from the House of Representatives an appropriation bill which was referred to the Committee on Finance; it was acted upon at the first meeting of the committee thereafter, and reported to the Senate. He ket his eye on the bill, but was prevented from calling it up by the interesting business before the Senate, which had excluded nearly all other matters. Although it was not his practice to notice anything that appeared in the newspapers in this city, a respect for the Senate induced him, at the present time, to do so. His attention had been called, this morning, to an article in the Globe, referring to the Committee on Finance, and the appropriation bill, which he would now read. The article is as follows:

"The Veterans of the Revolution."

"It has now become quite apparent that the majority of the Senate of the United States intend to second the effort of Nicholas Biddle to prevent the Revolutionary pensioners from receiving their half-yearly dues on the 4th day of March. The appropriation bill passed the House of Representatives nearly three weeks ago, providing money for this object, and was sent to the Senate. Ever since that time, it has quietly remained in the possession of that notable Committee on Finance, which, the other day, was so prompt in making an elaborate report in a few hours after reference of Mr. CLAY's resolution on the deposits. Mr. WEBSTER is Chairman of the Committee, all of whom, saving one person, is hostile to the President. It is well known that these appropriation bills, when the time draws nigh for disbursement, are privileged bills, and are generally passed by unanimous consent. If the object be not to create new embarrassment—to grieve and distress the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution, that thereby it may be shown the Bank of the United States is more potent than the Government—what does Mr. WEBSTER mean by keeping this bill in his pocket?"

Now, sir, said Mr. W., before I say any more, I will ask the Secretary to give the date on which the bill came from the House, the date on which it was referred to the committee, and the date on which it was reported to the Senate.

The SECRETARY replied, that the bill came from the House, and was referred to the committee on Thursday, the 6th of February, and that it was reported by the committee on Monday, the 10th of February.

Mr. WEBSTER continued. The Senate would then see how long Mr. WEBSTER kept this bill in his pocket. It came to the committee, which meets on Mondays and Thursdays, on a Thursday; and, on the Monday following the first day of meeting thereafter, the committee acted on it, and it was reported to the Senate on the same day. Now this was not all. The gentlemen who conducted that press (the Globe) had reporters in the Senate for the purpose of giving its proceedings to the public; and what did he see? Why in the proceedings of Monday, the 10th February, as reported in that paper, will be found the following:

"Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill making appropriations for the Revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, without amendment."

The gentlemen themselves, who conduct the Globe, had recorded the fact, that the bill was reported on the 10th February; and yet, on Saturday last, they said that Mr. WEBSTER kept it for three weeks in his pocket. Now, sir, (Mr. W. said,) it is possible that those who made the statement were unconscious as to the facts; but they were not unconscious as to the motives which induced them to make it. It remained now to be seen whether this explanation would be followed by a retraction of the unfounded charge, or whether, by silence, it would be persisted in: and it also remained to be seen, whether this detection of error would teach the editors more prudence for the future. He made this statement simply out of respect to the Senate, who, he was sure, would not believe him capable of the gross neglect of official duty imputed to him. He should despise himself, if he were capable of being influenced by any such motives as those charged in the publication he had just read.

Mr. W. then moved that the bill be read the second and third time and passed, and, there being no objection, the bill was read the second and third time, and passed accordingly.

Mr. GRUNDY then rose and stated, that a vacancy had occurred in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by the resignation of an honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] and as the committee were desirous of having the vacancy filled, he moved the Senate to go into an election.

Mr. CHAMBERS, adverting to the fact of the lateness of the hour, and the absence of several members, hoped the election would be deferred, not that he thought it important. He did not suppose it would be a party vote, and for himself, he was perfectly satisfied that the chairman of the committee should himself make the selection, but it was an act of courtesy to absent Senators not to go into an election at this hour.

Some other conversation occurred between Messrs. CHAMBERS, EWING, and GRUNDY, when the Senate decided to go into the election; but, while preparing the ballots, on motion of Mr. CLAYTON,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose and said, he had been charged by a committee of gentlemen, deputed for that purpose, to present the memorial of sundry merchants, mechanics, laborers, and others, of the city of Baltimore, on the subject of the embarrassments of the money market, which the memorialists said had been occasioned by the course pursued by the Bank of the United States, and intended for the purpose of forcing a renewal of its charter. The memorialists, Mr. C. said, express their entire confidence in the Executive, declare that the restoration of the public deposits to the bank would be highly injurious to the country, and pray that they may not be restored. The committee, with whom he was personally acquainted, Mr. C. said, were highly respectable, and, from the character given of the signers of the memorial, he was confident they were equally so. The committee stated that the number of signers to the memorial was 3,558, and he had no doubt of the correctness of the statement. He moved that the memorial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. He also asked that the names appended to the memorial be printed, as it was a duplicate of one intended to be presented to the House of Representatives, but, from the press of business in that House, had not yet been done.

The motion of Mr. CHAMBERS was then carried without a division.

Mr. WEBSTER, in pursuance of notice given, moved that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CHAMBERS was opposed to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts for several reasons. His colleague was seriously indisposed, and in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, not able to attend, and indeed was not able, to-day, to leave the room. He was also opposed to the motion, on the ground that no material difficulty would arise from a few days' delay. He knew that there were a great many appointments which the country desired to see filled, and that some considerable censure had been cast on the Senate for delaying them; but he was surprised to find that in many of the journals which assumed to know what was passing in the Senate, a clamor was made at the Senate's not acting on some minor appointments, while no surprise is expressed at the fact that the Executive has kept back the nominations of some more important ones. Now he was by no means disposed to tread on the toes of the Executive, and was not in the habit of doing so; but he could not see how the denunciations of the Senate for delaying unimportant appointments squared with the total silence as to the fact that one of the most important offices had been filled, and its duties executed, for months after the meeting of the Senate, without asking for its sanction to the appointment. He had always understood the Senate to be constitutionally a part of the appointing power, and should be consulted, at least in an appointment of so much importance, as soon after its meeting as convenience would permit.

Mr. WEBSTER inquired if the gentleman expected his colleague would be able to attend to-morrow.

Mr. CHAMBERS replied that he did.

Mr. WEBSTER then said, that, if the Senate went into Executive business to-day, they would not probably finish before to-morrow, and any member who was in the city might have an opportunity of taking part in it. He felt some embarrassment on the subject, but was willing to waive his motion; but he gave notice that he would to-morrow move for the Senate to go into Executive session.

PENNSYLVANIA MEMORIALS.

Mr. McKEAN rose and said, he held in his hand a memorial signed by 1,858 inhabitants of Berks county, Pa., reiterating the daily lamentation of pecuniary distress, and remonstrating against the recent action of the Government in removing the public deposits from the United States Bank. This memorial, and the accompanying letter, Mr. M. said he was requested to lay before the Senate, by a highly respectable deputation who had visited the seat of Government for that purpose, and who instructed and especially requested him to state that the memorialists are without distinction of political parties, and, indeed, he said, it could hardly be otherwise, as, he believed, the election returns would show, that scarcely more than half the number that had signed the memorial were, at any time, opposed to General Jackson, in Berks county. He knew a number who were the fast friends of General Jackson, among which he recognised the name of his friend William Addams, who was associated with him (Mr. M.) on the Jackson electoral ticket in 1832. His (Mr. M.'s) objections to the United States Bank remained unchanged, and had never been disguised; but, it was due to truth, and to this respectable portion of his constituents, to make these statements.

He also had in charge the proceedings of a meeting of the mechanics and working-men of the Northern Liberties, in the county of Philadelphia, in favor of the bank and a restoration of the deposits; and a memorial signed by fifty-one citizens of Schuylkill county, against the bank and the restoration of the deposits; all of which he desired to send to the Chair, and asked that they be each read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. CLAY said he wished to make an observation or two. He imagined that the supporters of that Executive who holds in his hands the means of affording relief to the distressed people of this country, would no longer insist upon the fact that these various memorials emanated from party feeling. They had found themselves already, in the progress of the session, greatly mistaken in point of fact as respects the distress prevailing in the community. They had been compelled to own their mistake; and he (Mr. C.) trusted that they would now see that the language which is transmitted in the various memorials to Congress, does not proceed from those only who are opposed to the administration, but that it issues from all parties—that the struggle which is now going on is not a party struggle, but one resulting from universal, deeply felt, wide-spread distress throughout the whole country. Let Senators take the case before them as an example. He had it in his power to state, for he had understood it from the gentleman who was charged with the presentation of the memorial, that in 1828, the whole amount of votes given against the Chief Magistrate by the county of Berks, were but 937, whilst he had nearly 5,000 votes; and in 1832, there were 4,544 given for him, and 1,166 against him. This memorial he (Mr. C.) understood was subscribed by 1,860 individuals and it ought to be added that it came only from a part of the county. In five or six other townships, as he had been informed, of the same county, memorials were in circulation, but the subscriptions to them were not completed, and therefore could not be forwarded with the present one.

He hoped he might be allowed to state a single fact, which would show the impressions upon the public mind in regard to the present distress. In the town of Reading, in the county of Berks, he understood that five hundred votes were given for the present Chief Magistrate, at a late election, and only one hundred against him; yet five hundred of the inhabitants of the same town had subscribed the petition setting forth the existing distress, and praying the aid of Congress to afford them some effectual relief.

From all quarters from whence memorials had issued, Mr. C. said, we learn a similar state of facts. Gentlemen may be assured that this is no party struggle that now agitates the country. It is a question between the will of one man and that of twelve millions of people. It is a question between power—ruthless, relentless, inexorable power—on the one hand, and the strong, deep-felt sufferings of a vast community, on the other. He trusted that these memorials would be the means of softening his heart, and presenting to him the true condition of our afflicted country, and induce him, to the utmost of his ability, to afford that relief to it which he and his Secretary could instantly supply.

Mr. CLAYTON made a few observations, to show how very far the petitioners for restoring the deposits, &c., in these conflicting petitions, exceeded the number of those who approved of their removal.

The motion of Mr. McKEAN was agreed to.

SENATE.]

Louisville (Ky.) Memorial.

LOUISVILLE (KY.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. CLAY rose to present a memorial. When he left, last September, the State of which he was a Senator, he had never beheld it in a condition of higher prosperity. The earth had yielded an abundant crop; and a ready and good market existed for all the products of industry. The people were out of debt, full-handed, in good health; grateful for the numerous blessings which they enjoyed, and without the smallest presentiment of approaching calamity. This gratifying picture was now sadly reversed, and he was charged with the duty of presenting to the Senate a memorial from a large and highly respectable portion of his fellow-citizens, exhibiting the contrast, and imploring redress from Congress of their grievances. Louisville is the third, if not the second, of the three largest cities on the banks of the Ohio river, and, from its location at the rapids of that beautiful stream, is decidedly the first in commercial importance. Her two great sisters, Pittsburg and Cincinnati, have already addressed their complaints to Congress, and Louisville now comes to unite her voice and her supplications to theirs.

He held in his hand the copy of a petition, the original of which has been confided to the charge of the member of the House of Representatives representing Louisville, to be offered to that House. This copy he now submitted to the Senate. Upwards of 1,000 signatures were attached to it, embracing individuals of both parties, almost the whole of the mercantile class, and men of every pursuit in business in that rising city. He knew personally many of the memorialists, among whom are the president and all the directors, who were in Louisville, of the bank which had been selected to receive the Government deposits, and he hazarded nothing in saying that the memorialists constituted the great majority of the men of business, wealth, and respectability of Louisville. That bank, he had understood, by a unanimous vote of the board of directors, had rescinded the contract with the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the public deposits. The present condition of Louisville was well described, by a highly valued and respectable friend, whom he had personally known near forty years, in two letters, from which he would read the following extracts:

"It is really melancholy to witness the sad reverse which a few months has produced in the situation of this hitherto flourishing city. Had a large invading army passed triumphantly through our country, it could not have so completely marred our prosperity, as the late unfortunate measure of the Executive. The countenances of our citizens are more gloomy and desponding than when the dread cholera was amongst us. It is scarcely possible to raise money on any terms. A single fact, within my own knowledge, will satisfy you of the correctness of this assertion. One of our most wealthy citizens offered three per cent. a month for a loan, and was unable to get it. Neither the United States Bank, nor the Bank of Louisville, will at present purchase bills on New Orleans, the former only receiving them in payment of debts. Our citizens are therefore wholly deprived of those facilities for raising money on their shipments of produce, which were formerly so liberally afforded by the Bank of the United States. In truth every thing in the way of business seems to be suffering under as severe a paralysis as the human body would by the stoppage of the circulation of the blood. To what period our miseries are to be protracted, Heaven only knows. Our only reliance is now on Congress, and judging from the vote on some incidental questions in the House of Representatives, I am apprehensive that we are not to expect much from that quarter." "I mentioned to you, in my last letter, that a gentleman of property, and who is known as a remarkably punctual man, being pressed for a few thousand dollars, had offered three per cent. per month for a loan, without being able to get it. I now state to you as a fact, within my own knowledge, that he has obtained the loan at five per cent. a month!"

The existence of deep, wide-spread, and unexampled distress, is no longer disputed. It cannot be controverted. Intelligence of it is borne from every quarter, by every mail, and in every form of private communication, as well as public petition and public proceedings. Those who were at first incredulous, are now forced to confess it. It stretches from the wild lands of Maine to the alluvial formations of the Mississippi. All parts of the Union feel, and are writhing under it. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Forsyth] had denied its existence at Augusta; but at Augusta we had seen a call, from a large number of citizens, for a public meeting, to take into consideration the prevailing distress. He had hoped that Kentucky would have been among the last that would suffer, although he knew it would be among the first to feel and manifest its sympathy for the sufferings of others. But the blight has reached her; and what State, what interest, sooner or later, must not feel its influence?

The existence of the fact of general and severe distress, being fully demonstrated, whatever may be its cause, it is the duty of Congress to apply a speedy and effectual redress, if it possess any power to afford it. What is the relief which the supporters of the administration hold out? They allege that the bank can give it. But that was not the opinion of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, when the measure was adopted of removing the public deposits. Their plan was then to make the bank wind up, and rely on the local banks. They believed that the local banks would fill up any vacuum, in the circulation and business of the country, produced by the curtailment of the Bank of the United States. They believed that those banks would supply a better currency than the Bank of the United States. But now, it seems that this institution only can relieve the country. The bank is required, at the same time, to perform the opposite duties of winding up and extending its affairs—the contradictory operations of expansion and contraction. After denouncing the bank as a monster, as a great moneyed aristocracy, which was contaminating the morals of the community, corrupting the public press, and calumniating and dangerous to the Government of the United States; and, after denouncing it as an unconstitutional engine, which ought to speedily put down, gentlemen now refer to this abominable bank, as possessing the only means to relieve the distresses of a suffering community! If the present state of things continued, there was no predicting to what ruinous consequences it might lead. Our banking systems in the United States rested emphatically upon credit and confidence. Destroy that, and they must inevitably blow up. Already we learn from Cincinnati, and other places, that confidence is so far shaken, that people begin to hoard the precious metals. In one day, it is said, flour fell at Cincinnati a dollar and a quarter per barrel. How can our banks withstand the overthrow of public confidence? Look at the condition of the sixty-nine safety-fund banks in New York, as recently disclosed. There are twenty-eight, with a circulation ranging from about $100,000 to upwards of $300,000, that cannot redeem each $10,000 in specie on a sudden demand; and ten which cannot each redeem 5,000 dollars on such a demand.

Entertaining very different views of the bank from those who are opposed to it, he believed that the restoration of the public deposits, and a recharter of the bank, with a cessation of Executive hostility, would, in thirty days, by resuscitating credit and confidence, bring relief to the country. But he hoped no proposition to recharter the bank will be made, unless it be imperatively demanded by unequivocal expressions of public sentiment. Constituted as Congress is now understood to be, and with the whole weight of the Executive in opposition to such a measure, it cannot succeed without a clear and decided manifestation of public opinion in its favor. And to bring forward and agitate the question, under such circumstances, and without such a manifestation, however desirable it may be, will have the effect only of exciting expectations to be subsequently disappointed.

Our first, our greatest, our immediate object should be to heal the wounds which have been inflicted on the constitution of the country. Let us restore to the laws their wonted authority; regain, from the hands which have seized it, the possession of the public purse, and exercise the control which the constitution and the laws have assigned to Congress over the Treasury. All legislation is idle and ridiculous, as long as the custody of the public treasure remains where it is, and as long as we have no guaranty for the respect which is due to the acts of Congress.

The remedy for the distresses of the people is in the hands of the people. The contest is indeed an arduous one. It is a contest between the will of one man and the majority of twelve millions of people—between arbitrary, relentless, and inexorable power, on the one side, and a suffering community on the other! In a recent report of twenty-one delegates, deputed by more than ten thousand citizens of Philadelphia, to lay their grievances before the Government at Washington, we are told that the Chief Magistrate, in an interview which they had with him, upon the business which brought them here, told them, "That, having made up his mind irrevocably upon all these points—Andrew Jackson never would restore the deposits to the bank—Andrew Jackson would never recharter that monster of corruption—that neither persuasion nor coercion, nor the opinions of the people, nor the voice of the legislature, could shake his fixed determination—that sooner than consent to restore the deposits or recharter the bank, he would undergo the tortures of ten Spanish inquisitions—that sooner than live in a country where such a power prevailed, he would seek an asylum in the wilds of Arabia." No one could peruse that report without feelings of deep regret and humiliation. He knew personally, and well, several of the gentlemen who made it, and there were not, in this country, men of greater veracity, probity, and respectability. He was authorized, from their high standing, to place entire confidence in their statements. And what are we told by the Chief Magistrate, himself only the first servant of the people? That neither the opinions of the people nor the voice of the legislature, could shake his fixed determination? The struggle is difficult, but its issue cannot be doubtful. Power is aided by an official corps, a standing army of more than forty thousand incumbents and contractors, and their dependants, scattered throughout the Union. Planted in every city and in every village, at the crossroads, taverns, and public places, they form rallying points, and seek to guide and control public opinion. They have an equal right with other citizens to exercise the elective franchise, but they have no right to avail themselves of their places and their pay, to form, mould, or direct public opinion. They received a just rebuke from the Senator from Tennessee, [MR. GUNDS], some days ago, and he (Mr. C.) was glad to see it come from that quarter.

The remedy is in the hands of the people. Let them continue to meet in primary assemblies, exclude the office-holders, express their grievances, declare their wishes, and demand redress. Let them pour their complaints into the ears of their servants. All are not deaf. Their representatives require only to know their wishes, and they will be conformed to. The people must and will be obeyed. There is a head-land, said Mr. C., which, in a voyage from New York to Boston, you have to turn, called Point Judith. In certain states of the wind and of the sea, it is difficult to double it. Beyond it, is a safe bay, called the bay of Narragansett, or, he believed, sometimes Providence bay. In our political voyage, (continued Mr. C.) we have just reached Point Judith. The weather is a little stormy, and the wind is somewhat against us; but it is only wind, and both the wind and the storm issue from a certain white house in this city. We have a good ship, the old Constitution, well manned, with the people of the United States on board as the crew, and the star-spangled banner floating at the mast-head. Firmness, resolution, and skill, are all that is necessary to double the point and reach the secure harbor of Providence beyond it.

Mr. C. moved that the Louisville memorial be read, and printed, with the names affixed to it, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MR. TALLMADGE said he was unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate on a mere incidental question, and more especially was he reluctant to interfere with the Senator [MR. HILL] who was entitled to the floor on the main question of debate. But he could not forbear to say a word or two in relation to the safety-fund system of New York, which had been the subject of animadversion by the Senator from Kentucky, [MR. CLAY.] It was a topic which the Senator seemed to cherish with much care. It had afforded him occasion for remark from the very commencement of the session to the present time. In the main debate on the deposits, he had dwelt upon it in a manner calculated to excite the public mind against those banks in the State of New York which were denominated safety-fund banks. Mr. T. said he had intended, at a proper time, to reply to the Senator on that subject, and the opportunity might yet offer to enable him to do it. At present, he would confine himself to a few remarks, as the time had already arrived to proceed with the special order of the day.

It would, no doubt, afford gratification to some gentlemen, if the safety-fund banks were in a worse condition even than they themselves have represented them; or if disaster should befall any of them. The Senator from New Jersey, [MR. SOUTHARD], as well as the Senator from Ohio, [MR. EWING], had, on a former day, alluded to them; and the latter gentleman, whilst he considered all State banks unsafe and unfit to sustain the currency of the country, was pleased to say, he deemed the safety-fund banks of New York more unsafe than any others—that they were far behind the banks of Ohio and the Western States—and we are now told, on his authority, that the want of confidence in the banks of his own State is such, at this time, that the people of the country are calling for specie, and carrying it away by bags-full. This alarm, Mr. T. said, might be true; still he had confidence in the banks of Ohio; but did it show the condition of those banks to be preferable to the safety-fund banks? Mr. T. said, when he heard gentlemen talk so much about this system, and decry its safety, he could not persuade himself that they possessed any very accurate information in relation to it. He had hoped that some of those who have taken this subject into their special charge, would, whilst they were arraigning it before the Senate, condescend to explain it. Mr. T. said he would yield the floor to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, if he would vouchsafe an explanation.

MR. CLAY said he would do it. He understood the safety-fund system to be this: that there are 69 banks connected together, which pay, annually, a certain percentage upon their capital, or their dividends, to create a fund for the purpose of redeeming the notes of any one of them that happens to blow up; that, therefore, they are all interested in the preservation of each other. He understood that these 69 banks had, after several years of contribution towards this safety-fund, raised something less than $300,000; not equal, by about $50,000, to the amount of notes in circulation by the Bank of Ithaca—one of them.

Now, since the honorable member had given him (Mr. C.) the opportunity, he begged to make one or two observations. The gentleman seemed to think it very hard that we should take any notice of the safety-fund system. If it were confined to the limits of New York, it would, perhaps, not be exactly proper that we, coming from other States, should take particular notice of her affairs. But such is the connexion of the banking system of the United States, that that of New York, directly or indirectly, influences the operation of the circulation in other States. Every State, by the agency of its banks, contributes to produce the total amount of the circulating medium of the country. Perhaps, in consequence of that direct or indirect influence on the banks of other States, we have a right to look at the conduct of each of them.

If the safety-fund system had been confined to the State of New York, he should not have thought it entirely correct to have noticed the subject. But the honorable Senator might have seen, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he intimates his intention, in certain contingencies, of trying the safety-fund system—extending it to other parts of the Union, and by means of banks located in various States, leagued together, to create a currency for the Union, and carry on the fiscal concerns of the Government. We should like, therefore, to see how it worked in New York—what were its operations—what its present condition—what are the dangers impending over it. The honorable Senator did him (Mr. C.) great injustice, and all his friends, when he supposed that we could see with the least satisfaction—if he supposed that we could see with any other than the deepest regret—the failure of any one of the banks in New York. It was to prevent such a calamity that he (Mr. C.) and his friends were struggling—they being of opinion that the Bank of the United States had furnished a sort of thermometer for the regulation of all the banks in the country. It was equally for the benefit of him, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] and for us all, that he (Mr. C.) wished to see those banks going on successfully.

With regard to the condition of those banks, he should be very happy, indeed, if the honorable member could make it appear to the satisfaction of the Senate that they are perfectly safe. He (Mr. C.) had read all he could get hold of, that had been recently published on this subject; for he was anxious to see how the experiment worked. We had been told by the President that he will, without the co-operation of Congress, make a great experiment in this country, come what will—that neither coercion nor persuasion shall prevent him from making the experiment. It was therefore, that he (Mr. C.) felt desirous to see how this experiment of a safety-fund system in New York had operated. He had seen the report of the commissioners, and he considered it an able document—exhibiting much talent, but written for party purposes, and especially to destroy the Bank of the United States. There was one item in the report which he wished the honorable Senator would explain—it was that about the “five millions of bank notes,” for he had not been able to meet with a single person from New York who could give him a satisfactory solution of that item. He took it to be nothing more than this—that the five millions and upwards are the aggregate amount of notes held by each of the sixty-nine banks—the paper of all the members of the confederacy; and, if so, it follows of course that it is not an available resource to redeem their notes in the hands of the public.

He imagined that the commissioners had added up the several items—the bank notes of each of the sixty-nine banks, and the notes held on others, which, being collected together, presented an aggregate of five millions of notes held by them. If this was not the case, then he should be glad to know what it was. Now, could any man look over the list without feeling apprehensions as respects the solidity of these banks? He would call the attention of the Senate to a few of the items.

[Here Mr. C. read an account of the condition of many of these banks.]

He was not quite so uninformed as the honorable Senator seemed to suppose him to be, of the course of trade of New York. He (Mr. C.) knew that banks in the interior draw their drafts, when a demand is made on them which they cannot readily meet, on the New York city banks, and those of Albany. He would also admit that there was confidence placed in them, and that their credit was good; and that, when a man applies at the Bank of Ithaca, for example, with a demand, he generally prefers a draft on New York, or Albany, to receiving its own notes.

This, he was willing to allow, would continue whilst confidence prevailed in the soundness of these banks—but let a blow come on them—let a farmer, after disposing of his crop of wheat, go to the bank, and say, “I won’t have paper—I won’t have paper on New York or Albany; I want specie; nothing else but specie”—and let others do the same; then what will become of this bank? And, with regard to those banks of New York and Albany which are said to have funds to the amount of three millions, a very indefinite, unsatisfactory account of the matter has been given.

We are informed, that paper of the interior banks has been selling at two per cent. discount; and that it is said that the canal fund has been used, for the purpose of affording relief to some of the safety-fund banks, and brokers have been directed to purchase the notes of them, for which a premium is given of two per cent.

He should be extremely delighted if the honorable Senator from New York, who had done him the honor to say that he knew nothing about the matter, would enlighten him. He (Mr. C.) trusted that this system would never succeed in spreading itself all over the United States. He should be extremely sorry to see such a state of things exhibited in every direction as was now exhibited by this safety-fund system—this confederacy of sixty-nine banks. He would assure the gentleman that it would give him infinite pain to hear that any disaster had befallen them.

Mr. TALLMADGE resumed. From the Senator’s explanation, he perceived his knowledge of the system was as imperfect and as limited as he had anticipated. The very application of it which he has made to the State banks employed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the deposit of the public funds, shows that he has a very inadequate idea of the system. He objects to the system being extended through the Union by the Secretary of the Treasury under Executive management. He has told us that a fund is provided by the contribution of the banks of a certain per cent., and that that fund is responsible for any deficiency of an insolvent bank. Wherein (said Mr. T.) does the Senator find any resemblance or relation between this system and those banks employed by the Secretary of the Treasury? There is no responsibility the one for the other; no contribution; no common fund. How, then, can it be said that the Secretary is endeavoring to extend this system through the Union? There is nothing in the Secretary’s plan that assimilates it to the safety-fund system. What bearing, then, has this system on the Secretary’s plan for depositing and disbursing the public money through the State banks? None. And its introduction to the Senate so frequently, can only serve to gratify those who wish to create distrust in its security. He knew that no one on this floor would desire to produce a panic in relation to any of our banks; but there were those out of this chamber who had contributed all in their power to do it. But he trusted, in regard to the banks in New York, that their efforts would be unsuccessful. The people of that State had entire security. The bill holders and depositors, under that system, were altogether safe—and from their safety arises their confidence in the system itself. They are protected against the possibility of loss. The Senator, however, tells us that the safety-fund consists of about three hundred thousand dollars, and that that sum would be but little more than sufficient to cover the circulation of a single bank. That fund is to be increased, it should be observed, until it equals three per cent. on the whole banking capital of the State. If in the case of insolvency of any bank, the fund should not be sufficient after applying its effects, then the banks again contribute to the fund as before, and the creditor receives the amount due him, with interest from the time his claim was presented. A case can scarcely be imagined where the effects of the bank itself, on winding up, would not be sufficient to meet all its engagements, without a resort to the safety-fund. Its stockholders might sustain loss, but its creditors would not. Thus it will be seen that, unless gentlemen can suppose an entire insolvency of all the banks of the State under this system, there is not the possibility of loss to the creditors of any of them. The community, therefore, is safe. But there is another feature that adds still more to that safety, and which guards the banks themselves—it is the power of the bank commissioners to supervise all their concerns. Their frequent and periodical examinations keep them in perfect order, and within the limits prescribed by their charters. This power of examination and supervision is of the most salutary tendency. Its silent operation is useful. It is a preventive of fraud or improper conduct of any kind. No board of directors, if under other circumstances they might be induced to exceed their bounds, would presume to undertake it, whilst this power could reach them, and expose them at any moment.

The Senator also alluded to the capital paid in stock notes in many of the State banks. Whatever application this remark may have elsewhere, it has none to the safety-fund banks. Their capital is all actually paid in. There is no nominal capital known to the system. This, too, must be done, and the most positive and indubitable proof furnished that it is done, before the bank can go into operation. The same proof, in addition to the personal examination of the commissioners, may be required, at any time, that none of the capital has been withdrawn. It will be perceived then, that the operations of these banks are on substantial capital, and the supervision of the commissioners is a guaranty to the public, and to the stockholders, of the fidelity of those who manage and direct their affairs.

So far, then, from this system having any thing in it objectionable, it presents the strongest safeguards and security to the community. The great evil, heretofore, in our banking system, has been the insecurity of the people. By this system, perfect safety and security are obtained. These are the main objects. We do not incorporate such institutions for the sole benefit of stockholders—they are at best monopolies—and the people should always require and receive sufficient guaranties for their own safety. Whatever panic, therefore, may be created, the people, the creditors of the safety-fund banks of New York, cannot suffer; and (said Mr. T.) I trust there is intelligence enough amongst the people of that State, not to permit themselves to be deluded by these panic cries that are so industriously sent through the country.

Sir, (said Mr. T.), the Senator from Kentucky has exhibited to us what he calls a statement of the small amount of specie in the vaults of our country banks. Why, sir, to those who know the course of trade and business in

New York, this would excite no surprise. The country banks have never been in the habit of keeping large amounts of idle funds in their vaults. They know their own interest better—they know the interest of the community better. Their surplus funds are deposited in Albany and New York, on which they can draw at any time. Those funds are convertible into specie at any moment. A western merchant, for instance, wishes to remit to the city of New York, where, from the course of trade, his payments are to be made—he would much prefer a draft on one of the banks in that city than the bills of the bank in his neighborhood, or even the specie—the draft is better to him than the specie. Where, then, is the necessity of hoarding up a large amount of specie in their own vaults, when they can deposit their surplus funds in New York and Albany, and, under certain stipulations, receive interest on them. This mode is for their own interest, and for the benefit of the community. These funds, which are convertible into specie at any moment, together with the specie in the vaults of the banks out of Albany and New York, amounted, according to the report of the bank commissioners, on the first of January last, to forty-four per cent. on their whole circulation. Allowing, then, that this panic operation should succeed so far as to throw upon them, in one instant, nearly one-half of the whole amount of the bills of those banks now in circulation, they have the means at command to meet them—and this, too, without looking to their large and substantial note account, which is daily becoming due and receivable.

There are no banks, said Mr. T., which have more ready or substantial means to meet all their engagements, of every description. There are no banks, in the aggregate, more sound. The United States Bank itself is not more so. It cannot present more, if it can as much, substantial means. He did not doubt its safety; but he should be glad to believe that it had as much substantial means to meet all engagements as the safety-fund banks of New York. If, said Mr. T., this panic, about which so much is said, can be made to extend amongst the people, as some seem to desire it should, he would rather be a creditor of those banks, than of the Bank of the United States. If any serious disasters follow from this panic, from the loss of confidence, and the consequent loss of credit, rely upon it, the Bank of the United States will come in for its full share of the calamity. But, says the Senator from Kentucky, if public confidence should be impaired, and these banks should be run for specie, they could not redeem their bills. This is true of any bank—of the United States Bank—of all banks: none of them ever have an amount of specie equal to the redemption of all their bills in circulation: of course, if public confidence, as to their solvency, should be so far impaired as to bring in upon them all their bills, they could not redeem them in specie. But still, if they have been managed properly, they will have abundance of means to answer all the demands that can be made on them. Mr. T. said, so far as his acquaintance extended, the safety-fund banks were in the most discreet and substantial hands. He knew instances where some individual stockholders and directors were worth double and treble the whole amount of the capital of the bank to which they belong. Can the community lack confidence in such banks? Can the people doubt their solvency? Can they doubt their own security from loss, even if any one should fail, as long as an ample fund is provided for their safety? No, sir, there are individuals, said Mr. T., such as he had described, who would give ample security by bond and mortgage, for any amount of bills that could be presented.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky, on some newspaper authority, has stated that the bank commissioners have taken a large amount of money belonging to the canal fund, and loaned it in New York, to meet the redemption of the bills of country banks. Mr. T. said, he had seen no such statement, but, come from what source it might, he did not hesitate to pronounce it untrue, and, for the best of reasons, that the bank commissioners have no power, by law, over the canal fund, and can, in no event, nor under any circumstances, use it.

One word, said Mr. T., for the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.] He condemns the safety-fund system, from its tendency to destroy that watchfulness of the banks over each other which would otherwise exist—that, inasmuch as they are responsible for each other, in case of failure, they would not return the paper of each with that vigilance which they would do, acting independently—that they are perfectly safe, says he, in issuing paper to any amount they please; that there is no limit to their issues. Perhaps, said Mr. T., the gentleman will allow something to experience and observation. He, Mr. T., had witnessed all these operations, and he had found, under this system, a far greater watchfulness of the banks over each other than formerly existed—a healthy watchfulness—not a disposition to harass and vex, as was sometimes the case under the old system, but to see that each kept within its proper limits, as prescribed by the charter. There is competition between them, but it is a healthy competition—it is salutary in its operation. As to their issues, the gentleman need give himself no alarm on that subject. They are limited by law, and he would venture to say, there were no banks in the Union which were so much restrained in their issues. They were far less than the banks under the old system were allowed to issue, and he had no doubt that, in proportion to capital and the increased business of the State, the circulation was, at this time, in a less ratio than before this system was adopted.

Whatever efforts, then, may be made, and from whatever quarter they may be made, to increase the panic, Mr. T. said that he trusted the commerce of the country could not easily be shaken. He hoped the honorable Senator from Kentucky would soon get round Point Judith, to which he had alluded, and speedily arrive in that calm haven which he so much desired. And if he, Mr. T., could judge from the symptoms of distress which usually attend those who perform that voyage, he should suppose the honorable Senator was now doubling that point.

Mr. CLAY said, if the honorable Senator from New York would take the trouble to refer to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the agent of the Government, he would see the outline of the system very clearly defined. He (Mr. C.) regretted that the gentleman could not explain the item of "five millions," in the report of the commissioners.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had been unwilling to interpose during the discussion, so long as the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New York had yet any thing to say to each other. He rose to take care of himself. The Senate would recollect that, in the remarks he had the honor to make a few days ago, he had alleged, first, that the President's agent, or the Secretary's agent, or whosoever agent he might be, had left Washington with instructions to submit to the several State banks a series of inquiries, all based upon the broad principle of a mutual guaranty of the banks. How these instructions were got up, and what gave rise and character to them, he hoped we should, "some of these days," understand, amongst other matters connected with the history of the late measures of the cabinet, with which the public is likely to become acquainted. The inquiries most undoubtedly disclosed the "views of the President," because they so emphatically declare, and they are now sent to us with that declaration, and without the least exception to that declaration by the present Secretary. He had further stated, on the same occasion, that the "agent," at the end of his first stage, to wit, at Baltimore, and before he had submitted the propositions prepared for him by the Secretary, in pursuance of the President's views, had, in virtue of a general authority to make any other propositions to the State banks, prepared an entire new series of inquiries, abandoning the principle of mutual guaranty, and which were proposed, together with those originally prepared for him, whereby these last were virtually put aside. These facts were stated by him without then giving the Senate the trouble to hear the proofs read. He understood the Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] to make a statement to-day quite at variance with these facts, and to assert that "the Government," meaning the Executive, had not the least intention to introduce the principle of the safety-fund system, or hold the State banks to any mutual responsibility.

[Mr. TALLMADGE made a remark, in a voice not heard by the reporter, but was understood to admit he had so said.]

Well, sir, said Mr. C., we will now to the testimony, and see whether the error is with the Senator or myself. The testimony is found on the files of each Senator, and is taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 30th December, 1833. At page 19 of the Senate document No. 17, it is said, "The President having designated you as the agent to make the necessary inquiries, I beg leave to represent to you, as your guide, the views that he entertains.

"First: That one bank be selected in Baltimore, one in Philadelphia, two in New York, and one in Boston, with a right on the part of the Government to add one in Savannah, one in Charleston, South Carolina, one in the State of Alabama, one in New Orleans, and one in Norfolk, upon their acceding to the terms proposed; all which shall receive the deposits in those places, respectively, and be each responsible for the whole public deposits of the United States, wherever made." The remaining inquiries are dependent propositions, and rather enlarge the idea of mutual responsibility. This is an extract from the letter of the late Secretary of the Treasury, which is called by Mr. Taney, in his report, "a copy of the appointment and instructions" of the agent. It will leave no doubt, it is hoped, of the "safety-fund" views of the President. So much for the first point, and now for the second.

At page 10, of the same document, he found this language: "From conversation with gentlemen connected with the banks in Baltimore, I was satisfied that such a system of mutual responsibility among the banks selected for the public service, as was contemplated by my instructions, would prove to be impracticable. The banks do not possess the requisite power, and, if they did, it is very questionable whether they could be induced to exercise it. Under the general power conferred on me, I therefore draughted another set of propositions, contemplating an arrangement between the Government and each bank separately. As a substitute for the security contemplated in the mutual guaranty, suggested in my instructions, I thought it," and so forth, and so forth.

This extract is from a report of "the agent," dated 4th Sept. 1833. Now, sir, said Mr. C., I have not a word to add, except that the Senator and the Senate shall judge whether my statement contained "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Mr. EWING said, that when he addressed the Senate on this subject some time since, he did say, that he looked upon the safety-fund banks as the most unsound of any in the United States; and such (said Mr. E.) is still my opinion. It is a natural and necessary consequence of the system on which they are conducted that they should be so. I (said Mr. E.) have understood this system precisely as explained by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and the Senator from New York

Louisville (Ky.) Memorial.

[SENATE.]

[Mr. TALLMADGE] has varied it nothing except perhaps in one single particular, in which he [the Senator from New York] was not very distinct, or in which I did not understand him distinctly. I understood him to say that in case of the failure of one of the safety-fund banks, all of them were bound for the payment of its whole defalcation, even though it might exceed the amount of the safety-fund on hand. But he did not state whether they were bound to pay it immediately, or not, until the safety-fund shall have accumulated to an amount sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. TALLMADGE. They are not bound to pay immediately, but the ultimate payment is secured by the safety-fund, with seven per cent. interest.

Mr. EWING resumed. It is precisely as I understood it. The system, then, is this: The banks which are combined under the safety-fund system each pays one per cent. per annum on its capital, which sum is set apart as a security for the payment of all debts due from any of the banks which may happen to fail. If they all redeem their own bills, this fund becomes in the end the property of the banks, and goes into their dividends.

Now, this is all very specious on the face of it, but here lurks the mischief. The banks being thus leagued together, and bound mutually for each other's solvency, fail, as a matter of course, to exercise that salutary control over each other which independent banks always do exercise, by returning bills, and forcing the payment of balances; thus checking over-issues, or excessive and improvident banking in any form. One of these banks clearly cannot coerce another, so as to restrain its issues, without danger of driving the improvident bank to insolvency; and, if that be done, the bank that applies the corrective has to foot the bill. The only way, therefore, that is left to the bank that sees another issuing too much paper on its capital, is to place itself on an equality with it, by issuing too much also. The consequence necessarily is, that it gives rise to an excessive issue of paper, and palms upon the unsuspecting public, a paper currency, unsupported by a sufficient metallic basis. This state of things has been in some measure restrained by the operation of the Bank of the United States and the other State banks; but, remove that check, and there would be no bounds to their issues, except those which avarice will voluntarily assign to its own means of gratification. Let this system become general throughout the United States, which I understand has been thought of, and, in a few years, instead of hard money, we shall have a miserable rag currency, not worth the paper out of which it is made. This, (said Mr. E.,) I should say, was the natural tendency of that system which I heretofore pronounced, and which I now pronounce, to be the worst, the most unsubstantial and illusory, that human head ever devised.

But if there were a doubt, in theory, as to the operation of the system, the state of the banks, as exhibited by the bank commissioners' report, would remove it. According to my understanding of that report, after deducting the items which balance each other, there is a present debt of more than twenty-five millions, and available funds to the amount of not more than three millions. But, looking as the public ought, at the security of the notes in circulation, another thing should be taken into the account. The amount of deposits, public and private, in those banks, is something more than twelve millions of dollars, with but a fraction over three millions of available funds. As a general rule, the depositors are the first to be informed if there be danger of a run upon a bank. They are so, for the plain reason, that they are on the spot, or have an agent on the spot, to watch over their interests.

If any difficulty arises, they at once draw out the specie, and seize all available securities, and leave the people, who held the paper, to take what is left. Suppose, then, a run on these safety-fund banks, what would be the consequence? Why, the depositors would be paid as far as funds would go to pay them—that is, something near an average of twenty-five cents on the dollar, and there would be nothing left with which to take up the notes. Such, sir, is the situation of these safety-fund banks. They sail smoothly and make a fine show in fair weather, but they cannot stand a storm; and the people of the United States begin to know, and they ought to know, their true condition. I wish that their situation may be fully and accurately known in Ohio, for their notes have had an extensive circulation there; and, although I am not disposed unjustly to discredit them, I am by no means willing that they should have a credit to which they are not entitled, and which may prove injurious to the people of that State.

I also said, not in the way of vaunting, but as stating a fact of which I think I have knowledge, that the State banks of Ohio are among the safest and best in the Union. There is, or at least was, but a few months since, and I presume it is the case still, more specie in those banks, in proportion to their circulation, than in the Bank of the United States itself, with all its alleged propensity for hoarding. This arises from causes peculiar to the situation and the commerce of the country. There has always been a considerable influx of specie, arising from the trade to the West Indies and South America, and some from the sales of public lands, and some that is brought in by emigrants. This finds its way into the banks, and there accumulates, as in a reservoir, and is occasionally wagoned off, and sold in the Atlantic cities as an article of commerce. In consequence of this perennial stream flowing into these banks at all times, and from the great confidence which the people of the country have in them, they are stronger and safer, as I believe, and better able to endure a severe shock, than any bank or banks in the Union, except the Bank of the United States. I examined last Fall the state of one of those banks, the capital of which was, if I remember right, less than $100,000. They had $127,000 in circulation, $67,000 deposits, and $135,000 in specie, besides a good supply of other available funds. This, however, is a very large, and, for ordinary business, an unnecessary proportion of the precious metals; but generally, I believe, the banks average a specie fund to about one-third, or something more than one-third, of their circulation. I need not say to you, sir, that the contrast is striking between these and the safety-fund banks.

Before the infliction of the late ill-judged Executive measure upon the country, the confidence of our people in the State banks was unbounded; it was rare, indeed, that a farmer in the country gave any preference to silver over bank paper; indeed paper was generally preferred by them, as more convenient and equally safe. But I did not say that the same confidence would continue. On the contrary, every one who can look a very little way into the future, must have seen that that confidence could not but be shaken by this Executive act. But I very confidently believe, that those banks will live through the stormy season, and preserve their credit untarnished, though it must be at the cost of foregoing their dividends, and denying their usual accommodations to their customers—they cannot relieve or aid in relieving the community from the pressure under which it now suffers—neither they nor the Bank of the United States can do it, without imminently perilling their own existence.

Suppose the Bank of the United States were to take the advice of its enemies, here and elsewhere, and greatly enlarge its discount, for the very charitable purpose of relieving the public distress, it is to me perfectly clear, from the statement of the bank which I last saw, that it could not sustain itself. It owes nearly thirty millions, and has a little more than ten millions in the precious metals to meet it. This approaches very near the limit of safe banking in good times; and in the present state of things, it would be much beyond the limit at which any bank could long sustain itself, that did not possess the unbounded confidence of the community. But even that bank, by imprudent issues, would give its watchful adversaries an advantage over it, which they would not fail to take; and it would lose that high degree of public confidence, which its careful and prudent management has given it. Should it follow this counsel, however disinterested it may be, and in whatever spirit of kindness it may be given, it might not only destroy itself, but bring accumulated ruin on the country.

Advices this morning received from Cincinnati, inform me that the pressure on that city is extreme. Flour sunk in the market $1 25 per barrel in a single day, and paper upon country banks, not more than one hundred and fifty miles distant from the city, and whose ability was perfectly undoubted, could not be cashed at any price. But the magnitude and extent of the public calamity is not less distinctly perceptible in the general tone of depression and dependency which characterizes every communication on this subject from that quarter, than in the constantly recurring failures of business men, in every active occupation and enterprise, and the daily and ruinous depression of price which is suffered in all the great staples of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT said he regretted to enter into this debate at all, but he felt it due to himself and the subject to give the answer which he had promised to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] and, before he did that, he would say, that he rejoiced that there was no intention in this body to produce an excitement in the country; that the Senator did not intend to produce that effect by the remarks he had made, for he was able to add the gentleman's distinct denial that such was his intention.

He must be permitted further to say, before he replied to the interrogatory of the Senator, in justice to the bank of Ithaca, in his State, the bank which the gentleman had named, that the remarks he had made in relation to it are most eminently calculated to produce the very effect upon that institution which the Senator did not mean to produce. He must not be misunderstood. He imputed no intention, but he must say, that the statement of the honorable gentleman [Mr. CLAY] as to the Bank of Ithaca, the large amount of bills he had stated to be in circulation from that bank, and the very small amount of means to redeem them, unexplained, was directly and most happily calculated to produce a panic in the public mind, in the vicinity of that bank, and to cause the run upon it which he was happy to find it was the desire of all to avoid.

He must further say that, while he would not make the imputation against any individual in or out of this body, he deeply feared that certain presses in the country were daily and constantly publishing articles, and giving, very erroneously, what purported to be facts, most strongly calculated to excite the panic which the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] had so often and so emphatically mentioned with disgust in the course of his remarks. In answer to these attempts to influence the public mind, he would say to the customers and bill holders of, and to the depositors in, the Bank of Ithaca, what the honorable Senator had said, and so confidently repeated, to the people of the whole country, "Be calm, be serene, and confident." The ship of state is not to be run upon the rocks, nor are the disasters predicted to be experienced, unless the panic produces the result. We shall ride out the present storm in safety, and peace and plenty will return to the land, if the public mind remains unshaken.

I will now answer the honorable Senator in reference to the $5,000,000 of bank notes possessed by the safety-fund banks of the State of New York, and which are set down by the bank commissioners as a part of their available means. I know not from what statement or authority the gentleman reads, but I presume it is from the summary of the bank commissioners of that State. I think they, in their annual report, after giving the detailed statement of the condition and means of each bank, give a summary statement of the aggregate condition of all the banks under their charge and supervision; and I presume that this item is drawn from that summary statement. If I am right in this, it shows that all these banks, which the gentleman says are sixty-nine in number, have this five millions of the notes of other banks.

The only error in the statement of which I have a right to complain, (and that is a very material one at this period, and in the present agitated state of the public mind,) is, that the gentleman says he assumes that all these are notes of the safety-fund banks themselves. Now, sir, this is a violent presumption. The item is undoubtedly composed of all the notes of other solvent banks, held by the safety-fund banks at the moment the statement was prepared. The amount, and the description of notes of which it would be composed, would be as fluctuating as the circulation of bank paper; but at any period the notes on hand would be those which the banks should think it desirable to receive, or safe to keep, and therefore it may be confidently assumed that they were the notes of the best banks of the country. The proportion of safety-fund bank notes would depend upon the proportion of these and other bank notes in circulation, at the points where the collections are made, and the security felt in the institutions whose notes should thus be kept in deposit. I speak from some acquaintance with those banks, and their business, when I say, that I fearlessly venture the prediction, that, if an account of these notes were given, there would be found to be an amount of the notes of the Bank of the United States, and its branches, greater by five or ten times, than the amount of the notes of any one safety-fund bank. Sir, we were told the other day, by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHINGTON;] that the notes of the Bank of the United States were received and used by the State banks as capital, and that they made discounts, and did business upon them as such; and this was given to us as one of the merits of such an institution. This was, and is, true, as to the notes of that bank, but it is equally true as to the notes of any solvent State bank. The banks all consider the notes of their solvent neighboring institutions in their vaults as specie, and they do business upon them as such; nor does it make any difference as to what bank issued them, provided they be notes current at their counter.

Why, Mr. President, should it not be so? Such notes are convertible into specie at will, and therefore are safe capital.

But, sir, suppose all this $5,000,000 of bank notes held by the safety-fund banks of New York, were the notes of the safety-fund banks themselves. Would it injuriously affect the standing of this aggregate account of all these banks? No, sir, it would show that the account was well made up. Take an instance: the Bank of Ithaca, in its statement, debits itself with the whole amount of its bills out, without reference to the place where they are, and credits itself with its means to meet those bills when they are called for. Ten thousand dollars of those bills are in one of its neighboring banks, and in making its account, it credits itself with these ten thousand dollars of Ithaca notes as a part of its means. Now the charge in the one case, and the credit in the other, counterbalance each other, and, so far as the general summary statement of all the banks is concerned, the ten thousand dollars of bills are redeemed. This is the nature of the item to which the Senator [Mr. CLAY] refers, and this must be the only explanation of which that item, in this general summary, is in any way susceptible. How far it is satisfactory, is left to the Senate. To me it seems to be perfectly satisfactory, because the explanation shows that where the item consists of bills of the safety-fund banks, the credit, as means, by one, must be countervailed by a charge as debit by another. So much for the explanation I have promised.

I must correct the Senator in another and much more important error into which he has fallen, in relation to the manner in which the country banks, in the State of New York, do their business. The Senator [Mr. CLAY] says, when they have a call, which they have not the power to meet by the means in their vaults, they are in the habit of answering it by a draft drawn upon the commercial cities of Albany or New York, on time. Such I understood to be the declaration of the Senator.

[Here Mr. CLAY signified that such was not the purport of his statement.]

Mr. W. continued: I will then state, Mr President, distinctly what I did understand the Senator to say, and he will surely correct me if I am wrong. I did understand him to allege that the banks in the interior were in the habit of making drafts upon the commercial cities before named, to answer calls which they had not the means to answer at their counters, without having, at the time, funds in those cities to meet such drafts. Whether or not he said the drafts were made upon time, is immaterial to my purpose. Am I right in this understanding?

[Mr. CLAY said the Senator had better go on.]

Mr. W. then continued: Sir, I speak from personal knowledge, when I say, no such drafts are made. It is the practice of those banks in the interior to keep nearly the whole of their surplus funds in the cities. There these banks meet the great portion of their liabilities, and there they most need those funds. There, also, they obtain an interest upon those funds, and, therefore, as a matter of profit, as well as security, they are kept there.

Their usual and almost universal course is to make an arrangement with some solvent city bank, and these arrangements are made either in Troy, Albany, or New York, and they receive an interest, I believe, as a general rule, varying from four to five per cent; the stipulation being always accompanied with the condition either that notice of drafts shall be given, the drafts be made upon time, or that the amount in deposit shall exceed a certain stipulated sum before interest is chargeable. I have recently understood that a very few of the western banks have made their arrangements with stockbrokers, and keep their accounts with them, but these cases only form an exception to the general rule. The solvent city banks are the general depositories of these funds.

Sir, these country banks would not, if they had it, keep large amounts of specie on hand, in ordinary times, and when business was regular and undisturbed by any unusual excitement. They would transfer it to the cities where they would be most likely to need it, and where it would earn an interest until they should require its use. What, then, can be inferred from the exhibit made by the Senator of the condition of these banks, so far as their specie funds in their vaults is concerned? I say confidently—nothing. Their funds are not kept idle in their vaults, but are placed where they are more needed, and where they can be usefully employed when not needed. I am asked what are those funds. I will answer. The bank accommodates the merchant. He wants to use the accommodation in the city, and does so; and the bank meets the payment there. When the time of payment comes, the merchant sends to the market some commodity, out of which he makes the money, and deposits it to the credit of the bank at the place in the city where the account of the bank is kept. This replaces the amount subtracted for his accommodation, and thus the fund in the city is kept good. No country bank draws upon the city, but upon funds previously placed there to meet the draft. I say none. There may be cases where such drafts are made, but never without a previous arrangement for their acceptance; and I hazard nothing in saying that there is not a country bank in the whole State whose draft would be accepted, but upon funds placed in the city to meet it, or upon an arrangement for its acceptance. There is no drawing upon time, or upon the contingency of a general credit.

The honorable Senator tells us that certain brokers in New York have sent a quantity of country banks notes to Albany to be redeemed, and that their redemption was refused. Sir, I know not from what authority the gentleman speaks; but this I do know, that, if the bills of any country banks were sent to Albany for redemption, and the banks which issued the bills had not funds in Albany for the purpose of their redemption, they would, of course, not be redeemed by the Albany banks. Why should they be? Upon what principle could the banks at Albany be expected to redeem notes not their own, and without funds from the banks which issued them? Surely, upon none which belongs to the principles of safe and correct banking.

Again, Mr. President, we are told that large sums of money, belonging to the canal fund of the State of New York, have been, by the bank commissioners of the State, withdrawn from the banks in New York, where these moneys were drawing an interest, to be applied to redeem the notes of the safety-fund banks. I have no doubt the honorable Senator [Mr. CLAY] has been informed, and believes this statement, but from what source he derives his information I know not. I will tell him, however, what I do know, derived from personal and official knowledge, and it is, that his assertion cannot be true; that the bank commissioners of the State of New York have no more power over the money belonging to the canal fund of the State of New York, than the honorable Senator himself has. Those moneys are in the care of entirely different officers—officers holding the most high and responsible offices in the State. They have always been loaned where they were considered perfectly secure, and would command the highest rate of interest, and they never have been changed or withdrawn, when so invested, to consult the wants or interests of any bank. The law would not allow the officers having the charge of them to dispose of them from such motives, and those officers have not done so. They have, during the last year, and as I think very wisely, used every effort to sink these moneys in the redemption of the stocks which they are destined to redeem; and they have, to a great extent, succeeded. Those efforts are still making, and, notwithstanding the great cry we hear, in this body, of distress and ruin, and scarcity of money, and almost starvation, overspreading the whole land, such is the state of things, that the guardians of this fund cannot purchase these stocks (five per cent. stocks, redeemable in 1845) at a lower rate than about sixteen per cent. above their par value.

Mr. President, I regret exceedingly to have been compelled to enter into an incidental debate of this character; and I would not have done so, had I not considered myself called upon to explain allegations made in reference to the business affairs in my own State, and to transactions which no members of this body but my honorable colleague and myself could be supposed to understand. I have done this, and will merely reply to a remark or two made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] when I will resume my seat. That gentleman has denounced, in no measured terms, the safety-fund system of my State, as applied to our banks. He thinks, as others have thought, that the safety of the banks is endangered by it; but he seems wholly to overlook the security afforded to the community, to the bill-holders and depositors. He seems to suppose that because the fund is not large enough to redeem all the bills in circulation of all the banks at once, he proves that the security is fallacious. Sir, he is mistaken. The bill-holder, the depositor, and the whole community, with the exception of the stockholder, is ultimately perfectly safe, unless every bank subject to the system be broken and destroyed. The fund may not be large enough at present, but the contributions must continue until the claims of the bill-holders and depositors are fully paid.

What, then, is the difference between this system and the ordinary system, where there is no such security? I hold the notes of an insolvent bank which has stopped payment. I cannot, in either case, get coin for my notes, but if they be safety-fund notes I will eventually get dollar for dollar, and if they be not, I will get nothing. This is the simple difference, and this is the system which the gentlemen think so mischievous and dangerous. I am not disposed to discuss with him the question, whether these banks, by being made thus measurably responsible for each other, are more or less safe. I will only say that, if it be proper for legislation to consult any other object than that of filling the pockets of the stockholders, any portion of safety transferred from a bank to the bill holders, the depositors and the community in general, is not objectionable to me. Such is the object of the safety-fund system of New York, and I verily believe, that, in consulting the safety of the public, it has, in the best manner, consulted the greatest safety of the banks.

Mr. EWING said, if the inquiry be made, whether, in my opinion, the public be more safe, as to the ultimate payment of the notes of the weaker banks which form a part of this safety-fund system, than they would be if those banks were disconnected from it, I most unequivocally answer, that they are—that is to say, take them in their present condition, with all their debts and all their resources just as they are, and the system of mutual responsibility does form some security for the ultimate payment, or part payment, of their debts, beyond what would exist without that system. But this does not reach my objection, which is, that the safety-fund system has brought those banks into a condition into which they never could have fallen without the operation of that system. The Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] says that it is at once obvious, that the watchfulness of banks over each other becomes greater, when they are answerable for each other's debts, than when they are under no such liability. This is not exactly and effectively the case as applied to the situation of these banks. We all know that neighboring banking institutions, however friendly disposed towards each other, are rivals in business, and, as such, jealous and watchful of each other, and are constantly in the habit of returning the paper of each other, and exacting the payment of balances periodically. If the condition of a debtor bank approaches insolvency, it only furnishes the stronger reasons for keeping an account very close, or refusing its notes altogether; for it is better for the neighboring banks that it should wind up, than to continue the issue of an unsound currency. Thus a healthy rivalry, and a watchfulness highly sanitary in its effects, is kept up between independent banks, organized or conducted in the ordinary manner. But when you make each of those banks answerable for the debts of every other, they may all continue to watch, it is true, but they have lost the power of mutual coercion. A bank situated here will not compel an independent bank at the other end of the avenue to stop payment, when that is the only mode of restraining its excessive issues, if the bank here knows that when it does so, it must pay the debts of the insolvent institution. In such a state of mutual liability, the natural course of things is, to let the matter run on—each take advantage of its own immunity from danger—keep up its issues to the highest possible limit, and abstract its gold and silver to the lowest point, and make large dividends—until the whole becomes a system of credit, without any firm basis. Credit here, supported by credit there. As long as banks situated thus stand at all, they will all stand together; but, with the first shock in the commerce or credit of the country, the whole cob-house fabric must tumble. The Senator from New York [Mr. TALLMADGE] says that this system has given these banks a better credit than they had before, abroad as well as home. True, it has; and, if it had not obtained credit for them, it could have done less mischief than it is likely to do. One of its vices is its specious character, tending to impose upon the world. The honorable Senator appeals to experience for its good effects. Our latest experience is derived from the report of the bank commissioners of New York, to which my honorable friend from Kentucky referred; and I can conceive no stronger evidence than that has given us, of the utter fallacy of the system.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he would relieve the gentleman: he did not answer his main argument, because he could not believe that it required an answer. The argument was, that, making these safety-fund banks mutually responsible for each other, prevented them from keeping that salutary guard over each other's transactions, and especially over each other's issues, which banks in no way connected with, but acting as rivals to, each other, would keep. The statement of the proposition, seemed to him to be a sufficient answer to the argument drawn from it. What! sir, will a bank, at this Capitol, watch with less care the operations of a bank at the other end of this avenue, when it is fully responsible for all the notes of that bank, than when it has no connexion with, or responsibility on account of it? If that be the effect of such a responsibility, (Mr. W. said,) he had mistaken the influence which the interests of men had over their actions. The motive to increased watchfulness was direct and palpable, and that such a motive would have the effect to destroy that watchfulness, he could not see or believe.

While up, he would say one word in answer to a suggestion which had fallen from the honorable Senator when he first addressed the Senate, and to which he had intended to reply. The Senator [Mr. EWING] seems to suppose, that the circulation of the notes of the banks of New York has been less extensive and less broadly diffused, since the establishment of the safety-fund system than before that time. He mistakes the fact. Mr. W. said he spoke from knowledge, when he asserted, that from about one year after the establishment of that system, the public confidence had increased greatly, as to the security of the notes of the safety-fund banks; and that the circulation of those notes, out of and beyond the limits of the State, had been two or three times as great as at any former period. Yes, sir, they flew over into the territory of the Senator's own State, and even beyond it. He (Mr. W.) had himself known instances, where remittances had been directed to be made to Kentucky in the notes of the safety-fund banks, when the notes of the other banks of the State, entirely solvent, but not subject to the safety-fund law, would not be received.

At first, (Mr. W. said,) fears were entertained. The banks were fearful, and the bankers and politicians wrote and spoke against the plan; but time soon convinced all that the system was most valuable. The most experienced bankers of the State yielded their assent to it; and the old banks came in and took new charters, subject to the law. He did not feel disposed to institute a comparison between the science, and skill, and prudence, and success of the Quakers of his State and those of other States, but he was willing that their history, from the institution of banks in the State to the present time, should be examined; and he believed they would not be found to have been the least successful of all the bankers of the country. These men are now the warmest and strongest friends of the safety-fund system. Indeed, Mr. W. said, he verily believed, if the honorable Senators themselves (Mr. EWING and Mr. CLAY) would examine the legislation of New York upon this subject, not as politicians but as intelligent lawyers, as they are, they would yield their full assent to its wisdom and safety.

To a remark here made by Mr. EWING—

Mr. TALLMADGE replied, that there was a salutary influence exercised by these safety-fund banks over each other, in regard to their issues, and no disposition was shown by any of them to injure others, as was formerly the case. They had now a greater interest in the prosperity of each other. The Senator had stated, that these banks were liable to over-issue, and were without limitation. He (Mr. T.) would state that the amount of bills issued, had been brought down to a much less amount than it was before this time, so that there was perfect security. In regard to the circulation, the law has fixed the limits, and the banks could not go beyond them.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would draw the attention of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. WRIGHT,) and others, to a consideration which seemed to have been overlooked. The question of the insolvency of the banks was not the true question when speaking of the currency of the country. The question was the ability of each individual bank to meet the demands which might be made on it, in specie. He was not acquainted with the banking system of New York, but there seemed to him one insuperable objection to it. It was, that there was too much confidence in it, so that all individual responsibility was removed. The true question in all our institutions was, not the ultimate means of meeting all its liabilities, but the present means for present calls. He had not heard it stated what was the actual proportion of specie to the whole circulation in New York. But in England, from long experience, it was found that less than one-third was not safe, and the Bank of the United States had adopted that as its proportion. He thought the case was not helped by saying, that the banks in the interior of New York draw on those in the city, for it was but an exchange of paper, John Doe drawing on Richard Roe, and Richard Roe drawing on John Doe again. There could be no security longer than the circulating paper was redeemable at the banks from which it issued. And it was not bettered by the bond of mortgage-security spoken of—the system had been tried for a hundred years, over and over again, and had uniformly failed, and never could succeed. No matter how many men of wealth you had, heap Ossa upon Pelion, and it would not do.

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that if the honorable Senators from New York had taken his advice, they might have saved themselves a great deal of trouble. They could not recommend the safety-fund system, be it good or bad—for it came from New York. He rose, not for the purpose of discussing that system, or the Secretary's system, as proposed to be introduced into the United States, according to the views of gentlemen, but to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky in relation to the distress which he said existed in Savannah and Augusta. He (Mr. F.) thought that, by reference to the documents, the gentleman would perceive that he was mistaken. How long they might remain exempted, he could not say; he trusted it would be long, but at present they were exempt; their withers were unwrung. There was a call made for a meeting in Savannah for the purpose of deliberating upon the pecuniary distress of the country. A similar call was made in Augusta. He was of opinion that the distress was beyond Georgia, and had arisen in consequence of an apprehension that the Bank of the United States is not to be re-chartered. In Savannah, what had occurred? The matter was discussed at large; and, as it happened, there was a meeting without distinction of party, and a memorial was proposed. He had ascertained that there was a number of persons who were desirous to swell the voice of distress that was daily rolling towards the Capitol, but they were voted down by an immense majority. There is no cry of distress from Savannah. With regard to Augusta, there was a meeting held, resolutions were passed, and a committee was appointed—not for the purpose of making known their distress, for he (Mr. F.) thanked God they had not then felt any—but, to ring the same old chime of their fear lest the bank should not be re-chartered.

He held the memorial in his hand, and it did not contain one syllable as to there being any individual distress felt: they knew better. The public journal of that place containing the account of this meeting, showed the price of stocks, and of all commodities in that community, to be unaffected. They are the friends of the bank, and ask not that the deposits may be restored, but that the bank may be re-chartered. [Here Mr. F. read some of the resolutions that were passed at the meeting at Augusta, and also a passage from the memorial.] He knew these individuals perfectly well—they were highly respectable men—merchants and members of the bar. They were in favor of the bank, believing it to be a useful institution, and were disposed, by every honorable means, to promote its re-charter.

The gentleman from Kentucky had referred to a certain document lately prepared and signed by several respectable citizens of Philadelphia, who came here as the representatives of some ten thousand citizens of that city, for the purpose of obtaining relief for their distresses, and to report the result of their labors. Now he (Mr. F.) considered that he should be very much wanting in respect to those gentlemen, and those who had sent them, if he did not say, that they had gotten precisely what they wanted, and went back as soon as that was obtained. Did they expect, after what had occurred, that any representation from citizens of Philadelphia would make any impression upon the firm convictions of the President? The application did not come from the proper quarter, nor from the proper persons, for these individuals were politically, as well as locally, deeply interested in the measure. Would any one pretend to tell him (Mr. F.) that there was a respectable man in the city of Philadelphia, in favor of the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, who could be considered a disinterested judge of what was the true policy of the country? Why, what were all those new buildings, the expenditures in Philadelphia, which were for its benefit? Indeed, it required much patriotism in an individual member to resist an application for the re-charter of this institution.

The honorable Senator had read the remarks which were said to have been made by the President to the Philadelphia delegation. Upon the correctness of them, he (Mr. F.) placed but little reliance; the statement ought to be taken with many grains of allowance. The committee did not pretend to state that they had given the very words the President had used; they pretended merely to give the substance of a long conversation. Now, he (Mr. F.) did not choose to take the opinions of the President from an impression of his conversation by those who are politically and violently opposed to him, not only on this, but all questions. He took the gentleman at the head of the list, as an instance—for a more bitter and cantankerous politician never existed.

All these gentlemen came here, for what? To make friends in Congress, and, by their representations on their return to Philadelphia, to make enemies against the President: and they had performed their task. Whether they would succeed in their second operation, remained yet to be seen. He had intended to make some further remarks, but really, on so grave question as the printing of a memorial, he was ashamed to occupy the attention of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY remarked that the gentleman from Georgia was very liberal in giving advice; and as, for one, he did not like to receive unrequited favors, he would offer him some in return, which was, to profit by the example of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS.] He began, like the Senator from Georgia, with a positive denial of any distress in his part of Pennsylvania; but irresistible evidence of its existence was poured in upon us from Pittsburgh, until the Senator from Pennsylvania, unless he (Mr. C.) was greatly mistaken, had himself become one of the most distressed individuals in the community. He did not think he was deceived as to the condition of things at Augusta and Savannah; but he felt quite sure that, if they had not yet, they soon would feel the effects of the total derangement which has been produced in the state of the currency. If the people of Georgia were not distressed, he was glad of it; but he was perfectly certain that they, as well as the Senator from Georgia, would feel all proper sympathy for the distresses of other portions of the American people.

The gentleman from Georgia tells us that the Philadelphia deputation came here and got what they wanted, and returned home when they obtained it. But they must have been greater than any prophets that ever existed, if, when they left home, they could have anticipated such a reception and such language from the Chief Magistrate. The Senator spoke of the quarter whence the memorial came, and declared that, on the subject of the Bank of the United States, representatives from the citizens of Philadelphia were not entitled to much consideration, and could not be expected to shake the firm conviction of the President. He would like to know what put Philadelphia out of the pale of the right of petition; or what gave to the Executive a right to adhere to his convictions, against the known wishes of the people. As to the members of the Philadelphia deputation, he had the pleasure of knowing most of them personally, and several intimately; and he would repeat, that a body of more respectable, intelligent, patriotic, and honorable men, were no where to be found, in this or any other country. Any statements made by them might be absolutely relied on; and their testimony must be respected, unless all human evidence be rejected as unworthy of credit. They had stated what passed in their interview with the President. It was well calculated to make a deep and lasting impression on their minds. It is now before the world, and no impartial and candid American citizen can read it without mingled feelings of regret, mortification, and indignation.

A single word in reply to the Senator from New York. He (Mr. C.) had said, that there were no funds at Albany to take up the notes of the country banks which had been sent to that city for redemption. It had been stated by the bank commissioners of New York, that there were about three millions of funds belonging to the country banks in the cities of Albany and New York. What sort of funds they were, had not been disclosed. Whether they were notes, bills of exchange, or what other form of paper, did not appear. That these funds are not specie, is certain; for in the general exhibition of the condition of the banks, made by the bank commissioners, they state that a little upwards of two millions of dollars compose the whole amount of the specie possessed by the banks of which those commissioners have the supervision. These "funds," therefore, are not specie. Nor are they available in the redemption of notes in the hands of the public. Nor are those notes any where redeemed but at the respective places where the country banks are located. If you have, for example, notes of the bank of Ithaca, you must go there to convert them into specie.

With respect to the application of the canal fund to the relief of the safety-fund banks, Mr. C. said he derived a knowledge of the fact from the public prints and from letters. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] said that the bank commissioners could not make such an appropriation of the canal fund, because it would be contrary to the laws and constitution of the State. But the gentleman should recollect that this is not a period in which constitutions and the laws reign. The example at Washington may be contagious. We thought the Federal Treasury safe when Congress adjourned. What is its present condition?

After a few remarks from Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. FORSYTH—

Mr. CLAYTON said there was one remark which had fallen from the Senator from Georgia, which he wished to notice, because he knew that whatever fell from that gentleman was laid hold of by the improved presses. His declarations were taken as their cue, as being those coming from high authority. He had undertaken to tell the Senate that the twenty-one highly respectable men bearing the memorial of 10,000 inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia, and who had returned to that city and made their report, on the 22d instant, in regard to their visit to Washington, are party men. He (Mr. C.) understood the Senator to say cankered politicians.

Mr. FORSYTH. I spoke of the chairman only.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understood him to say that the other gentlemen are party men.

Mr. FORSYTH. No, I did not say so.

Mr. CLAYTON resumed. Then the report stands unimpeached, as it is signed by twenty others besides the chairman. He would say that he had received information that the members of the delegation were not all political opponents of the present administration; on the contrary, that some of them had been his warmest supporters. Yet, because they have ventured to give the opinions of the Executive in reference to this great question, the man whom they honored with the post of chairman is to be called a cankered politician. Now, he (Mr. C.) would tell the honorable Senator that this gentleman holds a station in Philadelphia as honorable as that which he fills at this time. These gentlemen had assured the people that the opinions embodied in their report were expressed by the President at their interview with him. In reference to Mr. Chauncey, who was at the head of this delegation, he (Mr. C.) had ever understood his character to be that of a gentleman of the highest respectability. He (Mr. C.) had been given to understand by others that the circumstances under which the delegation had drawn up their report, were these: The gentlemen, immediately after leaving the President, separated, and each of them put to paper all the facts and circumstances relating to the interview. They afterwards met and compared notes, and they found that they concurred in every particular. They then made known to the people of Philadelphia, as was their duty, what the President did say on that interesting occasion.

Believing in the high character of these gentlemen, and that every word they have stated publicly is correctly and truly stated; believing, from what he knew, that some of them are men utterly incapable of wilful misrepresentation; knowing as he did some of them to be men whose words passed current wherever known, as well as the word of the honorable Senator from Georgia himself, he (Mr. C.) felt bound to take the statement they have made, relying on it, believing in it as he did. He (Mr. C.) would, as that report had been introduced into the debate, call the attention of the Senate and the country to one or two passages of that report.

Honorable gentlemen would recollect the veto message on the bill for the re-charter of the Bank of the United States. Several Senators on that occasion attempted to put the issue before the people of this country, as we understood it to be. The Presidential election was at that time approaching. We foresaw what would happen. We wished to avert what we considered to be an evil, and we stood up in our places, and stated that the President was resolved not only on preventing the re-charter of the bank, but that he was determined no national bank should be chartered in its place. An attempt was made to have this issue tried before the country; we endeavored to call the attention of the people to the fact, if the President was re-elected, there could be no Bank of the United States re-chartered.

We said that we considered his re-election a death-blow to every plan for a national bank; that neither the present, nor any other bank, could be re-chartered. The gentleman from Georgia, and others, would recollect what was then said, and the stand we made on the occasion. What was the answer to all this, and what was said during the Presidential contest? We were pointed to the veto message; told that on the first page of it the President declared "a bank of the United States was both convenient and useful to the people;" that he had said that, "entertaining this opinion, he felt it his duty, at an early period of his administration, to call the attention of Congress to the practicability of organizing an institution combining all its advantages, and obviating his objections." Again, the veto declared "that a bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by the Government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our own delegated powers, or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt." "Had the Executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed."

These passages in this message were seized upon by the public press at the time; they were borne through all the "improved newspapers" of the country, and the people were given to understand that, although the Chief Executive was hostile to the present chartered Bank of the United States, he was not opposed to charter a national bank.

It is true that, during the contest, we did endeavor to ascertain the character of that national bank he was willing to charter. We tried to find out something in the shape of that object which had been presented to us. We were unsuccessful. The country was induced to believe, and the people did vote under the conviction that there should be some national bank, though the charter of the present bank should not be renewed. To all those who say that the Presidential election decided the whole question of "bank or no bank," allow me, therefore, to say that it did no such thing. Will any man who recollects the circumstances I have adverted to, here or elsewhere, pretend to say that the people of the United States decided that there should be no national bank whatever? If the testimony of those gentlemen whose statements I have noticed already, and whose word cannot and will not be disputed by honorable men, be entitled to any credit, the President has now changed his tone, and has informed them not only "that the law creating the Bank of the United States was in his opinion unconstitutional, but that no power to create a national bank was conferred, or intended to be conferred, by the constitution."

We are thus, sir, given to understand, and I hope the people of this country will not allow themselves to be again deceived, that they are to have no national bank at the expiration of the term of the present charter. The President says there shall be no bank to supply the place of the present one. This testimony is important, because it enables us to fasten on something as fixed, as certain, on this great subject. We have been speculating on what objects the President had in view; and I believe the gentleman from Georgia said he would (if no one else did) offer a resolution to inquire as to the ulterior views of the Executive Department on this subject. I think I understood him so distinctly. What for? We have an answer communicated to us, as satisfactory as any man can desire, as to the intentions of the Executive. After these gentlemen obtained the information from the President, (for they went to him to ascertain the fact,) they made it known to their fellow-citizens, upon their personal, and, we may say, their official responsibility. That ought to satisfy their fellow-citizens.

I say again, sir, I hope the country will understand the question we are about to try. Let it never be contended that the re-election of the President decided the question whether or not there should be a bank. But the President now has decided, and the community are distinctly and clearly given to understand, that no national bank can, in his judgment, be constitutionally established by Congress. Will they—will they sustain him in that?

In reference to a remark that fell from the gentleman from Georgia, I would add a word more. He seems to consider that the people of Philadelphia are not to be looked upon as safe and disinterested advisers or proper persons to give any opinion in relation to the re-charter of the Bank of the United States. He looks not only upon those individuals who came here, and made their report afterwards to those who sent them, but upon the whole people, as well as their delegates, as unsafe in this matter, and unfit to express any sentiment which should influence others. Why is it so? Is this just? Does every man, because he resides in the city of Philadelphia, for that single reason, cease to be a respectable or an honorable man, or one whose judgment may on this subject be respected by his countrymen? Does the member really suppose that the paltry considerations to which he has adverted, could have operated on this high-minded and intelligent people; that, because they have a banking-house in their city, therefore, like children "pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw," they are to be stultified by the rest of their countrymen? Mr. C. commented at some length on this remark of the Senator from Georgia, and concluded by observing that such of the memorialists as he had the pleasure of knowing, would be any and every where respected for their veracity quite as readily as the gentleman from Georgia himself, or any other man on this floor, and that the people whom they had represented bore a character for intelligence, probity, and patriotism, which induced their countrymen to rely on their expressed opinions as readily as on those of any other men in this nation.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked, that the honorable member from Georgia had mentioned Mr. Chauncey, and called him a "most bitter politician." Now he (Mr. W.) had long had the pleasure of knowing that gentleman, and if there were any thing bitter in his temper, or his manners, it was quite a discovery to him. And, as to his being a politician, what did the honorable Senator mean by it? He (Mr. W.) doubted whether he ever held a political office—whether he was ever a candidate for one—and whether he would accept any which could be offered to him. But there is an office, somewhat political perhaps, though much more financial, which Mr. Chauncey does hold at the present moment. It is one of some importance in Pennsylvania—the office of director in the Bank of Pennsylvania. He holds that place by a recent appointment made by Governor Wolf, who is not likely to have selected a bitter politician for such a station.

[Here Mr. McKENNA said that Mr. Chauncey holds his office under the Legislature, who have recently appointed him to the office.]

Mr. WEBSTER resumed: So much the better; he believed it was so, and the proof of respect was so much the more decisive. Mr. Chauncey is a man of great intelligence, much experience in business, and a financier of first rate talent.

Mr. FORSYTH said, he would appeal to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; whether there was a more determined political condemner, than the gentleman in question?

[Mr. WEBSTER: Nor a more candid one.]

Mr. F. resumed: So candid, he always speaks his sentiments in the strongest terms. He knew him to be a gentleman, and he respected him as a gentleman—but he also knew him to be as thorough-going a politician as any in Philadelphia or Pennsylvania. He did not know him as a man seeking for office; but as a steady political opponent of the President and his measures, no man could surpass him. Now, the Senator from Delaware had not given him the proof for which he had called. That gentleman had gone into an argument, the object of which was, to show that the press took its cue from him, (Mr. F.) None of them did to his knowledge. On the contrary, he thought it would be much improved by taking a few lessons from him. The honorable Senator from Delaware was entirely mistaken in saying that he (Mr. F.) had used the word "cankerous;" that was not the word he had applied to Mr. Chauncey, but "cantankerous." And, by thus using it, he meant to convey the idea, that the individual in question was a thorough-going politician—thinking as a political man—whether in assertions or arguments, and prompt to make use of them. This was all that he meant to say, in quoting the words of Tony Lumpkin. He (Mr. F.) entertained no ill-feeling against any man, either in this House or out of it, and while he made a distinction between "veracity" and "accuracy," he wished the people to know and to understand it likewise. He did not mean to say that these gentlemen had stated any thing falsely and maliciously in regard to the President, but that they had substituted impressions for his words.

Mr. F. did not altogether approve the manner in which the members of this delegation had thought proper to act in their interview with the President. Here was the Chief Magistrate of the Union standing pledged to the country, to his conscience, and to his God, for the purity and correctness of his motives and his conduct—to be called upon by twenty-one citizens, for the purpose of telling him that he had produced the present distress, and ought to retrace his steps, and, consequently, violate his conscience, and offend his God! It was enough to arouse the passions of any man, and especially of that upright and firm individual who keeps the "white-house."

The committee have said that they were treated with politeness and courtesy. Now he (Mr. F.) would ask—Were not all individuals treated, under the same circumstances, in the same way? He conceived they were, and that no one received any other treatment at the hands of that distinguished and good man.

Now, with regard to the paper drawn up by this delegation, he hoped it would be read by every man in the community who took an interest in the affairs of the country; so that all might learn what had been done; that an attempt had been made to impeach the integrity of their Chief Magistrate, and endeavors were making to overawe the grave deliberations of Congress. He hoped this matter would be seen in its true light—and he doubted not the result would be, the condemnation of those whose attempts were calculated only to bring distress and ruin upon this great country. Indeed, it was as certain as death.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that when gentlemen were mentioned in the Senate, they not being members themselves, courtesy required the employment of proper and apt terms; and he could have wished that the honorable Senator from Georgia had used language in its known sense, and according to its common acceptation, in speaking of the individual in question. He had called Mr. Chauncey "a most bitter politician;" and he (Mr. W.) should have supposed he meant by that, a political person of an acrimonious, uncandid, sharp, censorious temper; such a person as would not be likely to receive a just impression from the conversation, or declaration, of political opponents. He had said that he is a "most bitter politician;" but he only meant by it, it would seem, that Mr. Chauncey is opposed to an administration which the honorable gentleman himself supports, and heretofore supported an administration which the honorable member opposed. This is all. He is a bitter politician, therefore, because he seldom or never has the pleasure of thinking as the honorable member from Georgia thinks. If this be all, as it appears to be, that the honorable gentleman intended by his remark, Mr. Chauncey, perhaps, will not think himself injuriously misrepresented.

Mr. CLAYTON remarked, that the gentleman from Georgia had at last condescended to come to particulars, and says it was impossible the President could have used the language given in the Philadelphia report. This reminded him of the defence of a man who was tried on a criminal charge. His only defence was founded on his own declaration that it was impossible he could have committed the offence charged against him. The charge was substantiated by the testimony, not of twenty-one, but of four or five creditable witnesses; and did the gentleman from Georgia want to know what was the result of the trial? The man was convicted; and so will it always be with those who rely on a similar defence. It was now seen to what subterfuges the gentleman from Georgia was driven. He says the President received the committee courteously. It was not so, sir. Almost immediately after hearing their business announced, he proceeded to chastise them for having dared—for that is the language of the gentleman—for having dared to come to him and argue on a subject about which he had already determined; and tells them "that, having made up his mind irrevocably upon all these points—Andrew Jackson never would restore the deposits to the Bank—Andrew Jackson would never re-charter that monster of corruption—that neither persuasion nor coercion, nor the opinions of the people, nor the voice of the legislature, could shake his fixed determination—that sooner than consent to restore the deposits or re-charter the bank, he would undergo the tortures of ten Spanish inquisitions—that sooner than live in a country where such a power prevailed, he would seek an asylum in the wilds of Arabia."

Mr. C. continued: he did not understand the meaning of the word cantankerous yet; but he supposed that as the gentleman used it, it meant something rancorous. The gentleman from Georgia spoke of this committee from Philadelphia as having got what they wanted, and having gone away when they obtained it, and imputes great censure to them for having addressed the President on the subject they did. Was it ever known, from the days of the illustrious Washington to this time, that a President of the United States is not to be approached with a respectful memorial, or that those who bear it are to be stigmatized as rancorous politicians! Was it ever known that a President of the United States would so far forget the dignity of his station, or the respect due to the people, as to tell them that they ought to break for doing business on a borrowed capital! When it shall become fashionable to censure those who respectfully approach the Chief Magistrate with their remonstrances, in the manner done by the gentleman from Georgia, and when the people submit to it without rebuke, we shall have been far gone in that wretched spirit of subserviency, which will, I fear, one day jeopard the liberties of this people.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that the gentleman from Delaware was mistaken in supposing that he objected to citizens of the United States presenting their respectful memorial to the President, or to his giving them a respectful hearing. His objections were, that these men from Philadelphia knew the opinions of the President, for that he had given to the public, solemnly, his views in relation to the public deposits, and yet called on him for the purpose of changing his fixed determination, or rather for the purpose of gaining some political object by the answer they expected to receive. Now, as to their paper, he agreed with the gentleman from Delaware: let it go to the people—let all the facts connected with this visit be given to the world, and they would be convicted of inaccuracy—it would be seen that they had stated impossibilities. The gentleman says that the President talked all, and that the interview lasted an hour. Surely, they must have had half of that hour. Again, on the subject of these Philadelphia gentlemen: Let him not be misunderstood, Mr. F. said, as misrepresenting them. He spoke of Mr. Chauncey, whom he knew to be a man of great moral worth, but who was a thorough-going politician, a man of strong feelings, bitter feelings, and every body who knew him, knew that such was his character. As to Philadelphia, there was no city in the Union to which he had so strong an attachment—an attachment formed in that period of life when the feelings were the strongest; and he would not say an unkind thing of those who do all in their power, per fas aut nefas, to break down those whose political elevation he considered as promoting the best interests of the country.

Mr. CLAYTON said, he did not misunderstand the gentleman from Georgia. The committee said they were received by the President with such politeness as to induce expectations of a candid hearing, but that in this they were mistaken; their chairman had hardly announced his business, before the President interrupted him, and went on with the remarks which they have given in their report. But this was not the point. The gentleman from Georgia had censured the report of the committee as inaccurate; but had he shown any inaccuracy? Had he pointed out any thing in their statement not founded on facts? The gentleman was driven from one charge to another, equally destitute of foundation. But he now understood that the gentleman did not mean to impeach the veracity of the committee. He draws, said Mr. C., a distinction between credibility and accuracy, where, in his opinion, no difference existed. He wished, however, the people to examine the facts, with the reasoning of the gentleman, and they would see whether the committee had misrepresented the President, or he had misunderstood the committee.

[When the debate had reached this point, the Senate adjourned for the day, without deciding upon the question of reference.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said that he had sundry memorials to present, on the subject which had so much occupied the attention of the Senate. After describing them, Mr. W. said he should ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance. The first was from all the banks, their presidents and directors, of the town of New Bedford. They pray Congress to take immediate measures for the relief of the present distress of the country. Mr. W. said, he had had this memorial in his possession for eight or ten days, but had not before had an opportunity of presenting it. The next was a memorial from the county of Warren, in the State of New York, signed by 303 persons, on the same subject. They say that the major part of them are persons who have been friendly to the present administration of the General Government. They state the distress in their section of the country to be such as has been represented in other papers of a similar character from other parts of the country. It was proper for him to state, Mr. W. said, that this petition was addressed to him, for a reason not very unnatural—the petitioners supposed his views more in accordance with theirs, on the subject of the memorial, than were those of the Senators from their State.

The third was a memorial on the same subject from 866 citizens in the county of Northampton, in the State of Pennsylvania. He had reason to believe that this memorial was most respectably as well as numerously signed; and that it embraced the most respectable portion of the population of the county. This last memorial had been sent to him for similar reasons with those which induced the New York memorialists to send to him theirs. Mr. W. thought it due to the New York Senators, as well as to those from Pennsylvania, who have had memorials of this character to present, to say, that they have presented them in the most decorous and respectful manner. He asked that the memorials be read and referred to the Committee on Finance, which was done accordingly.

Mr. CLAY observed, that the other day, when a petition from another part of the State of New York was before the Senate, he had made a statement with respect to the character of the petition and the number of the inhabitants of the town of Troy, who had signed it. The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. WHEAT,] rose in his place, and contradicted—not on his own authority to be sure, but on that of a member of the other House—the statement he (Mr. C.) had then made.

He considered it of the highest importance that Congress should have, on this subject of the present distress of the country, the ruin impending over all its interests, an accurate account of the facts. He had no doubt that the honorable Senator from New York concurred with him in desiring that the true state and actual condition of the country should be presented to the Senate. But he must nevertheless be allowed to say that gentlemen seemed to startle at facts, and to be unwilling to believe them, and were reluctant, and too often, he (Mr. C.) thought, indisposed to look on them as the real state of things at the present moment.

Now, what he had said the other day relative to the memorial from Troy, was, to his own mind, perfectly satisfactory. What he said then was, that the memorial was signed by 1,730 persons—that there were about 2,200 voters—that it embraced subscribers from all parties, friends as well as foes, to the present administration. The statement which the honorable Senator submitted to the Senate was derived from a member of the other House. It set forth that there were about 100 friendly to the administration, who had united in that petition. Well, that was a number which was somewhat entitled to a little respect. But he was inclined to think, from what he would now beg leave to read, (an extract of a letter,) that that statement was not exactly accurate. This letter was from a man than whom there is not in Troy, nor in New York, one more respectable. [Mr. C. here read the letter in question. It stated that the business men of that town are all alarmed at the prospect before them; that the banks are every day expanding to the utmost limit allowed them by law, and are much pressed to keep their customers from ruin. The writer represented that the memorial was signed by all their Jackson men, with the exception of some "whole-hog collar men," and that it contained more than 1,400 names, comprising all their merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics, of every party.]

Being up, he would take the liberty of inquiring of the honorable Senator from New York, if he was in possession of any information, satisfactory to his [Mr. W.'s] mind, that, for the safety of the safety-fund banks, a measure has been recently adopted in New York, by which, through the agency of the commissioners who superintend that association of banks, or through some other agency, $300,000 had been obtained in aid of, and to uphold the banks? He (Mr. C.) had stated yesterday, it was true, on the authority of a newspaper, that $300,000 had been obtained of the canal fund, for the purpose of aiding the operations of these banks; and the particulars of the amount were given. He had seen a letter to-day from a highly respectable source, repeating the same fact, that $300,000 had been obtained for that purpose. The honorable Senator had said he thought it could not be possible that money could have been obtained for such a purpose, as the canal fund was under the safeguard of the law; it therefore could not be true—he could not believe it. But, let him, said Mr. C., ask if this state of things had not happened? He wished the honorable Senator to say, in plain language, whether aid to the amount of $300,000 has not been obtained through some means, by that of the commissioners, or some other, in the city of New York, in order to uphold these banks? It might have been got in this way—(though he knew this canal fund could not be loaned without giving good security)—the holders of that fund might have been applied to in great need, in terms something like this: “We cannot take the fund from you; it is under the safeguard of the law, but you must lend us $300,000, to prevent a general bursting.” He did not know that it has been done in that way, but he entreated the honorable Senator to say whether he has not received information which satisfied his mind that aid to the amount of $300,000 has been obtained, for the purpose of aiding the safety-fund banks.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that he was at all times ready to give to the gentleman any information in his power—but he was really at a loss to know whether he was properly now to discuss the Troy memorial, or the subject of the debate of yesterday; but if the Senate would indulge him, he would give such information as he possessed. In reference to the remarks he made respecting the political character of the Troy memorial, he had stated to the Senate frankly, the source from whence he obtained his information. He did not make the remark on his own authority, and, therefore, was not responsible. Although he did not know the author of the letter read by the gentleman from Kentucky, he supposed it came from the gentleman in Rensselaer county, who was not preferred by the people to the member who represents that district in the other House. One statement, therefore, might be put as an offset to the other; taking also into consideration the endorsement of the people in favor of the one who made the former. In reference to the question of the gentleman, respecting the canal fund, he must say he had no information other than that derived from a New York paper; and that, from former misrepresentations in that paper, on the subject of that fund, while he (Mr. W.) was one of the trustees, he was inclined to believe that but little faith was to be placed in it.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate the monthly returns of the Bank of the United States, from August, 1833, to February, 1834, inclusive.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, copies of any order or Treasury draft which may have been given by that Department for the removal of the deposits of the public money from the Planters' Bank at Natchez, specifying the amount of the deposits; the bank or banks to which said money is removed, or intended to be removed; whether the same is required for the public service at the place to which it is so transferred, or intended to be transferred—and, if not, for what other purpose the said deposits are directed to be withdrawn from said bank; and, also, that he transmit copies of any letters which may have passed between any officer of the Treasury Department and the president of said bank on the subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had no remarks to make on presenting this resolution, other than simply to state that the Secretary of the Treasury had directed a transfer from the Planters' Bank at Natchez, of more than a million of dollars. The information was, that this money was to be transferred to New York, to aid some of the failing banks of that State. Be this as it may, the transfer will prevent the Bank of Natchez from discounting as hitherto, for the money will not be expended in that part of the country. He now moved that the resolution be printed. When it came up, he would make such observations as the occasion called for.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested to the honorable member to move for the consideration of his resolution at once. He himself had submitted a resolution similar in character to the one offered by the gentleman, but owing to the difficulty while the present debate was going on, of getting so far on with the morning's business as to arrive at the consideration of resolutions, it had not yet been acted on. He suggested, therefore, to the gentleman from Mississippi, to move for the consideration of his resolution now, and this could be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he would call for the present consideration of both the resolutions; the one submitted by him, and the one submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KING called for the reading of the resolution submitted by Mr. WEBSTER.

Mr. HILL objected to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi, but had no objection to the one submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that, as an objection had been made to one of the resolutions, he did not choose to make any discrimination between them. The member from New Hampshire, he said, seemed to be touched, and well he might; for, when facts came to be developed, they would show that a draft had been made on the Planters' Bank at Natchez, for the purpose of sustaining the failing banks in New York; thereby preventing the Natchez bank from extending the usual accommodations to the people of that section of the country. He must say, however, that the United States branch at Natchez had acted most liberally, and by discounting freely, had done much to prevent the disastrous consequences of the withdrawal of so large an amount from the Planters' Bank. He would not now detain the Senate with any further remarks, but he would say that these things sufficiently showed that there was “something rotten in the State of Denmark.”

Mr. CLAYTON rose to offer a memorial which he had received, and to which he had adverted yesterday, from some of the citizens of Schuylkill county, and which he had had no opportunity of offering until now. He had received it under cover from an esteemed friend, who, having been long acquainted with him, addressed the memorial to him, instead of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The letter stated that, in the county of Schuylkill, until within the last three months, all was prosperity and cheerfulness. But, his correspondent continued, view the state of things now, and it will be found that the scene has entirely changed. The working of the mines has been discontinued, and the operatives are wandering about the country without employment. More than two thousand individuals have been suddenly thrown out of employment. This was the change which had taken place in the coal region, in Schuylkill county, in Pennsylvania. The signers of the memorial represent themselves to be miners, mechanics, and laborers, engaged in the coal trade. They confirm in their memorial the statement made by his correspondent, melancholy as it appears. They say that within a few years ten millions have been employed in that county in making canals, sinking mines, erecting buildings, and on other objects necessary for the prosecution of the coal trade. Blessed with a sound currency, the exertions of the citizens in this county had been crowned with great success, and a great number of individuals had been employed who are now destitute. They say that a blight has fallen on their prosperity, and that troubles encompass them on every side. The memorialists implore the interposition of Congress, without which they entertain no hope of relief. He did not design to go into any discussion, or to say any thing which would provoke discussion, as other members were doubtless waiting to present memorials. Mr. C. moved that the memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. TYLER rose to present two memorials on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments and deranged currency of the country—one signed by five hundred citizens of the town of Wheeling, Virginia, and the other from five hundred citizens of the town of Norfolk, in the same State. These memorials came, he said, from the extremes of the State—from the Ohio river to the Atlantic seaboard. It was proper for him to remark, that the town of Wheeling was one of the most prosperous in that State; that but a few months ago a spirit of improvement was advancing; and that buildings were rapidly springing up; but from the withering causes of the recent movements of the Executive, their industry has been paralyzed, and they are now suffering the deepest distress. They pray for a restoration of the deposits, and a re-charter of the United States Bank.

The memorialists from Norfolk say that all the efforts of their industry have been entirely subdued by the present state of things; that the spirit of improvement has languished under the withering effects of the Executive measures. They ascribe the causes of their distress to the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States. They do not ask for a restoration of the deposits, but that Congress may make such legislative provisions as will retrieve the ruin brought on them by ill-judged measures. Mr. T. asked that the memorial be read and referred to the Committee on Finance—which was accordingly done.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and, after remaining in secret session some hours, adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

Mr. PORTER, in pursuance of previous notice, said he wished to call the attention of the Senate to the business before it, which, in consequence of the debate going on, had been so long neglected. There were fourteen resolutions, and sixty-nine House bills, with several unfavorable reports of committees, and about eighty Senate bills, not yet acted on, and there seemed but little prospect, from the manner in which the mornings of the Senate were consumed, to get at them at all. He now moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the order of the day; and, although he felt some reluctance to make this motion, in consequence of the right of the gentleman from New Hampshire to the floor, yet he had no doubt that the morning's business would be got through with before two o'clock, and then the gentleman could go on.

The motion was agreed to.

Several resolutions, previously submitted, were then severally taken up and agreed to, without discussion.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. POINDEXTER was then taken up, and discussed for nearly three hours, in which Messrs. POINDEXTER, FORSYTH, KING, GRUNDY, CLAY, BLACK, MOORE, MANGUM, and WHITE, participated.

The resolution was then agreed to.

The Senate then went into the consideration of a large number of bills from the House of Representatives, which were read and referred to the appropriate committees—when,

On motion of Mr. SILSBEE, the Senate went into Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, MARCH 3.

DELAWARE MEMORIAL.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial signed by one thousand six hundred and fifty citizens of the county of Newcastle, in the State of Delaware, praying the restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, and the permanent establishment of a sound and uniform currency. After stating the contents of the memorial, Mr. C. observed, that it had been delivered to him by a delegation composed of gentlemen of the first respectability, appointed at a meeting of the citizens of that county, held at the city of Wilmington, on the 22d ultimo, and represented to be the largest assemblage at that place within the recollection of those who attended it. The memorial, said Mr. C., is signed by a majority of all the legal voters of the only county in the State which has ever expressed an opinion by a plurality of votes at any election in favor of the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. Men of all parties, of all trades and professions, of all the grades of life, whether rich or poor, farmers, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, and laborers, have concurred in the expression of that sentiment which is now pervading all the ranks and classes of men, in other sections of the Union, that the appropriate remedy for the distresses of the country is the restoration of the public treasure to the public agent primarily appointed by Congress to receive it.

Mr. President, said Mr. C., this memorial is couched in most respectful language towards every department of this Government. It is signed by men possessing a high degree of intellectual and moral worth. It originated in no motive but an anxious desire for the promotion of the welfare of a country which the petitioners dearly love, and which they have always been zealous to sustain, according to the best ability which God has given them. Its tone of supplication is not the less urgent or convincing, I trust, because it disclaims the influence of mere party feeling, and asks, in the respectful language of sober truth, to be credited for the representation of evils which are deeply felt, and which are daily growing.

The farmers constitute the first of all the classes of men subscribing this memorial, for whom I desire to solicit the timely assistance of this Government. At a period of the removal of the public money from the Bank of the United States, their corn was readily selling, in their own markets, for more than seventy cents per bushel. They looked forward to an increase rather than a diminution of the price of this their principal reliance, and reasonably expected to find in the enhancement of its value some remuneration for the losses they had incurred by a very considerable failure in the crop. Since the day when the Secretary's order for the removal of the deposits was executed, the price of the great staple on which they have depended, has been constantly sinking, until, at this moment, as I learn, the highest price which can be obtained for it is forty-five cents per bushel. If this be true, sir, it will be seen their loss already amounts to thirty cents on every bushel of this grain, which is equivalent to an abstraction of about forty-three per cent. from the principal earnings of their productive labor. All the other produce of the farmer has suffered a correspondent reduction in value, and the period, it is to be feared, rapidly approaches, when this depreciation of price will increase, to the utter ruin of many of the tenantry, and the general prostration of the agricultural interest. The manufacturer is not less entitled to your timely interference. With us, as with other parts of the country, the banks refuse to discount as formerly. That want of confidence which has often before induced the community to draw specie from the vaults of the best State institutions, is already felt, and although there do not exist in this country State banks better entitled to credit, and resting on a more secure foundation than the banks in Delaware, yet a careful prudence, which ought to characterize their direction, has dictated to them, as well as others, to abstain from their usual grants of bank accommodations to a degree which is felt severely by the manufacturer. The want of active capital in the hands of the employer is immediately seen, either in the reduction of the wages of labor, or in the discharge of those who, if not employed, must soon go "supperless to bed."

In an adjoining district of a sister State, I understand that the manufacturers have resorted to a plan of retaining the laborers for a time, in the hope of better days, by issuing what is there called, "Jackson money." For, sir, failing to obtain the necessary assistance from the banks, they are paying the workmen in checks on banks where they have now no funds to meet them, which checks are made payable in four and five months from their dates. To realize his daily bread from his daily labor, under these circumstances, the laborer must of course submit to the operation of those harpies, who, in times of human suffering, prey on the misfortunes of the poor, and fatten on the earnings of their industry. He must submit, in the technical language of the knowing ones, to have his order shaved. I do not impute this as a fault to the employer, who has no other alternative but this to save him from the necessity of turning out all his workmen helpless upon the world. Those who seek to sustain themselves as our manufacturers have done, without this resort, are necessarily compelled to curtail their business, and discharge from employment men who have too often no other means of procuring subsistence.

The mechanics and merchants, too, have participated fully in the difficulties which embarrass the farmer and manufacturer. The effect is felt of course with most severity by those to whom they have heretofore given employment. To illustrate the real state of things existing among the poor, I will mention a single fact which has been related to me by a friend. In the city where this memorial originated, there is, as in other large towns throughout the country, a savings bank, in which the wages of labor have been deposited. Last year at this season the deposits for a month were about $1,200, the amount withdrawn about $400. In the corresponding month of the present year the deposits have been about $400, and the amount withdrawn $3,700. Is the inference fair, that the poor are now living on their former earnings, and that the laborer wants employment?

I know, sir, that any appeal in behalf of these people, would be unavailing if it were addressed only to office holders. They do not suffer. The reduction of the price of grain, or the price of labor of any description, works out a clear profit to the salaried officer, who receives his instalments regularly from the public Treasury, and who can now get a bushel of corn, or hire a laborer, for half the price he formerly paid. He views the removal of the deposits as a great good, because, while it depresses other men, it increases the value of his salary. The immense band of mercenaries, who may stand ready (whether contractors for public jobs, or public officers) to sing Te Deum, in honor of the occasion which has brought suffering and distress on the country, are but paying a part of the price for which they have been hired, when they either deny the existence of this distress or the cause which has produced it. The rich capitalist, shaving paper, may follow their example, and justify himself in the belief that he is one of the happy few who came into the world by the grace of God "booted and spurred to ride his fellow men." He and the office holders may rejoice while they ride and rule over the plundered ploughman and the beggared yeomanry. The expectant of those crumbs of comfort which are hereafter to fall from the Executive table, whether in or out of these halls, whether already in the high road to promotion, or hereafter to become so by gaining a station where his services may be worth paying for, will probably turn a deaf ear to all these representations. All such as crook the hinges of the knee where "thrift may follow fawning," will still tell us of the blessings of a strong Government, while they poison the public ear with their hypocritical commentaries on the dangerous power of a national bank. While their voices are echoing the very Shibboleth of their party—"bank aristocracy—money power—and bank monopoly," they are the ardent advocates of a confederation of fifty State banks under an Executive master, and whole regiments of office-holders, backed by a pensioned press, constituting a power far more dangerous to liberty than an Executive body-guard of ten thousand bayonets, instead of exciting their slightest apprehensions, attract their applause, and receive their most cordial support.

"Write but good angel on the devil's horn,
"Tis not the devil's crest."

No, sir, the hopes of the petitioners rest not on such as these, but on Congress, and on Congress alone. They present themselves here, neither as stockholders nor as debtors of the Bank of the United States: as men in no manner connected with the institution, or subject to its control. They tell you in their memorial, that there is in their State no branch of the Bank of the United States, and that the curtailments which their own State banks have been compelled to resort to, were not caused by any pressure of the Bank of the United States upon them, but by the general distrust which the unexpected removal of the public moneys from an institution where they were advantageously employed, has created in all the State banks, and among the whole commercial community. Fully convinced that this is the cause of their embarrassments, they earnestly pray that the deposits may be restored; and, without soliciting a re-charter of the present bank, or venturing to point out any other course, they ask from Congress, in general but expressive language, the adoption of some measures for the permanent establishment of a sound currency.

Sir, there is no greater evil, in the view of an intelligent business community, than arises from frequent changes in the value of money. With a uniform standard of value, the borrower pays what he receives, and the lender receives what he loaned. To preserve uniformity in the standard of value, is the great desideratum in political economy: and this can only be attained by a steady adherence to a true policy on the part of the Government. Although it may be, and probably is, absolutely impossible to maintain a perfect uniformity in the currency at all times, yet the best statesmen whom this country has produced, have declared that the operations of the present Bank of the United States had as nearly arrived at that perfect uniformity as it was possible for human ability to attain. Watchful of the causes, both foreign and domestic, which were calculated to produce a sudden expansion or contraction of the amount of the circulating medium, the bank has been generally prepared to provide for any emergency which could happen. But from this condition of things we have fallen by an ill-advised Executive measure, which has deprived the institution of the power of preserving it; and now the value of the dollar is so appreciated, that he who four months ago was able to pay debts to the amount of ten thousand dollars, cannot with the same means pay six thousand. If that Executive rescript which has denounced the present bank, should remain irrevocable, and be faithfully registered and obeyed by a subservient Congress, the evils of a fluctuating standard of value must continue, and, continuing, must increase.

The convulsions arising in the money market, under such a state of things, must shake the present business and industry of the whole country with a shock, from which, if it ever recover, it must arise only after the lapse of many years, enfeebled, exhausted, and always expecting another blow from the caprices of the multitude, or the passions of a tyrant. In the existing state of uncertainty as to all the future operations of the Government on this great subject, no prudent man of business will embark in new enterprises, or fail to discontinue much of what he may have already commenced. Would he borrow for fresh exertions in trade? The return to a metallic medium, (were such a thing feasible,) would compel him to pay his present debt in a currency appreciated at more than four times its present value. Would he loan funds to others? The same event would deprive him of half the security for a debt now considered perfectly safe; or the refusal to re-charter any national bank whatever, would, in a few years, cause him to be paid in a currency of State bank paper, depreciated fifty per cent. below the present value of money. In this state of things, no man is safe; a general feeling of insecurity and distrust prevails, as to all the future operations of the Government; and the man of business, whose activity and capital have heretofore given life and energy to all around him, supplying the wants of the poor, and furnishing every facility for the exertions of industry, retires from business and wraps himself in his mantle, to provide against the storm which he already hears sighing in the distance—"and happy he, whose cloak and cincture can keep out the tempest."

Such, sir, are some of those evils against which the memorialists solicit Congress to provide. It may be that the people now ask in vain. If so, let them not despair, however for a period their sufferings may be protracted. It has been said by an eloquent writer, "that there is no extremity of distress which of itself ought to reduce a great nation to despair: it is not the disorder, but the physician; it is not the concurrence of calamitous circumstances, it is the pernicious hand of Government, which alone can make a whole people desperate." In this country, the Government itself is, or should be, subject to the will of the people. And whether they be eventually impelled to the exercise of the right of revolution, or are content to seek redress in despite of the efforts of an Executive army at the polls, by the quiet exercise of the elective franchise, (mark the prediction, sir!) they will release themselves from their present embarrassments. There is nothing yet in their positive condition to sink them into the sullen apathy of an enslaved populace. They will go to the great work of their political redemption with stout hearts, and, if need be, with strong arms. Divested, in a cause so glorious, of all that evanescent President-making and President-worshipping feeling, which has made a party shout, and its bonfires blaze, they will, with a calm, concentrated, and holy zeal for their rights as men, prostrate in the dust the images which have been erected to false gods; and the true genius of their Government, preserving the sanctity of law in despite of any one man's will, shall again stand brightly out in practice, as in theory, the guardian angel of their liberties.

The memorial, and certain resolutions adopted at the Wilmington meeting, were then, on Mr. C.'s motion, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed,

SALES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose for the purpose of redeeming the pledge which he had given to institute an inquiry into the alleged frauds in the sales of the public lands. In doing so, he did not intend to lay before the Senate the information on this subject which he had received from the most authentic sources, but would reserve this for the investigation of the committee to which he trusted the subject would be referred, pledging himself to bring to that examination all the exertions of which he, as chairman of that committee, was capable. In presenting these facts, he should now content himself with requesting that public opinion, in reference to this subject, should be suspended.

Two of the leading journals of the city, from motives highly proper in themselves, refrained from publishing any report of the unpleasant debate which took place in the Senate on Friday last. For one, he rejoiced at the discretion which had been exhibited by the gentlemen at the head of those journals. But the other, and the official paper, had published a report of that discussion, which contained scarcely a semblance of the truth. As to his remarks, that report did not give one-tenth of what fell from him, and that so changed as to give a very different view from that which he had really given. Other gentlemen had also been as much misrepresented. He had made this statement, in order that no undue impression might be made on the public mind from this publication. It would have been better that the report had been suppressed altogether. As far as related to himself, he had deemed it his duty to make these remarks. If other gentlemen were satisfied, be it so. Mr. P. concluded with offering the following resolutions, and requested the immediate consideration of the two which called for information.

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the circumstances attending the recent sales of the public lands in the States of Mississippi and Alabama; and whether the proclamations of the President of the United States, causing the public lands in the districts of country acquired from the Choctaw tribe of Indians by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, and from the Creek tribe of Indians in Alabama, to be offered at public sale, were issued and promulgated a reasonable length of time prior to the day on which said sales were directed to be commenced in each of said districts, to give proper notice to the people of the United States of the days appointed for said sales.

2. Resolved, That the same committee inquire whether any fraudulent practices, to the injury of the public interests, took place at said sales, by reason of combinations of companies or individuals interdicting or unfavorable to a fair competition between bidders for the public lands offered for sale in said districts; and if so, whether the officers superintending said sales had knowledge of or participated in such fraudulent practices or combinations.

3. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire whether the registers of the land offices and the receivers of public moneys at any of the land offices of the United States, or either of them, have, in violation of law and of their official duties, demanded or accepted a bonus or premium from any purchaser or purchasers of the public lands, at public or private sale, for the benefit of such officer or officers, as a condition on which such purchaser or purchasers should be allowed to enter or purchase any tract or tracts of land offered for sale by the United States; and, also, whether any register or receiver as aforesaid has been guilty of fraud or partiality in the sales of the public lands, by adopting rules and regulations, in their respective offices, inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

4. Resolved, That the said committee inquire whether the public lands, at any land office in the State of Mis-

Mississippi, have been sold otherwise than for cash; and whether any register or receiver in said State has, at any time, taken in payment the promissory note of any purchaser or purchasers, bearing an interest to accrue to the benefit of such register or receiver.

5. Resolved, That, in prosecution of said inquiries, the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses before them on oath, touching the matters aforesaid.

Mr. POINDEXTER also offered the following:

1. Resolved, That the Secretary of the War Department be directed to communicate to the Senate the name or names of the agent or agents appointed by the President of the United States to locate the reservations granted to individuals of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek; and also copies of such instructions as may have been given to the agent or agents so appointed; and of any correspondence which may have taken place between any officer in the Department of War and said agent or agents, or any other person or persons, whose correspondence may be in the Department, touching the location of said reservations, and the manner in which the duties of said agent or agents may have been performed.

2. Resolved, That the said Secretary be directed to transmit to the Senate, a copy of the register of the names of such Choctaw Indians, as claim reservations of lands, under the 14th and 19th articles of said treaty.

Mr. GRUNDY expressed his satisfaction that this movement had been made. If any thing wrong had been done, he would be glad to see it exposed. His object in rising, was to ask for the printing of the resolutions, in order that he might be able to ascertain whether it might not be necessary to give some further instruction to the committee.

The resolutions calling for information were then considered and adopted.

The other resolutions were ordered to be printed.

After the reception and reference of sundry memorials, &c., the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the Louisville memorial, concerning the removal of

THE PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

Mr. CHAMBERS then rose, he said, to fulfil a duty which had devolved upon him, by moving to postpone the special orders which preceded that of the French spoliation bill, in order to take up that bill. He had given notice, some days since, that he should make this motion to-day, and he should content himself with having done so, leaving it to the Senate to determine whether this was the time when the long-delayed justice to these claimants should be done, or whether the subject should again be postponed.

Mr. CLAY expressed a hope that the subject which had been so long under discussion, would not be postponed. He thought that the Senator who was entitled to the floor, had been too long prevented from addressing the Senate, and wished that the opportunity should now be afforded to him. He was also desirous to see this discussion brought to a close; and he hoped that a few days would suffice for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER suggested, that the chairman of the select committee being absent, perhaps the Senator from Maryland would not persist in his motion.

Mr. CHAMBERS replied, that, in the distribution of the labor of the committee, it had been assigned to him to open this debate to the Senate. He had done his duty in making the motion, and did not wish to interfere with the Senator who had a right to the floor. Whatever the decision of the Senate, he should receive it with cheerfulness.

The motion was then put on postponing the special order, being the memorial from Louisville concerning the removal of the depositories, and was agreed to.

The motion was then put on postponing the special order on the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky, on the subject of the removal of the depositories, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HILL then rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I wish to take up as little time of the Senate as possible. I will at least engage to take none of its time to increase the alarm of ruin and distress that are so much dwelt upon in this branch. It is only to allay the panic, so far as it may be in my power, that I would trouble the Senate at all on this question. I am willing to take that time for this purpose that may give the Senate the least inconvenience. If there was any uncertainty, at the commencement of the discussion of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky, as to the constitutional power of the Chief Magistrate to remove a Secretary of the Treasury, or any other head of a Department, that uncertainty no longer exists. So little doubt is there left on the question of power of removal, that there seems to be a general understanding that the majority of the Senate, who disapprove of the withdrawal of the depositories, will not suffer the question to be directly taken, but that the accusation of high crimes and misdemeanors against the President is finally to be evaded, detached as it has been by the action of the Committee on Finance from its consort, by suffering it in the end to repose quietly on the table. Sir, since public opinion, and even the opinion of the Senate itself, has acquitted the President of knowingly and wilfully violating the constitution, we have only to ascertain whether the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, are satisfactory and sufficient: in other words, the inquiry should be simply, Was the removal of the depositories from the United States Bank to the several State banks, a measure both lawful and expedient? This state of the case will fairly bring into discussion every point having relation to the bank, which now agitates the public mind. The strongest proof of merit in the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the depositories, may be found in the manner in which they have been assailed. Weak these reasons cannot be, when it is considered that a regular attack by a regular party in opposition was not deemed sufficient to break them down: strong they must be, thus long to have withstood a threefold attack from parties on two sides of the house. While the onset has been daily made by nearly two to one in length and breadth of the speeches on the special order, almost every day has witnessed a skirmish of outposts—an attack upon the supposed weaker points, during the hour of morning business. Superadded to these, a supposed instrument of death, in the result of a Herculean labor beyond the immediate battle-ground, comes in as a third means of attack, in the shape of a report of the Committee on Finance. Do we want stronger proof that the reasons of the Secretary are strong reasons? Shall we not speedily have ground to believe that the citadel is impregnable; that neither the party with the flag of Union down,* nor the party with the colors of consolidation flying,† nor both of them united, with all their potent champions, and instruments of attack, can either effect a breach in its walls, or surmount its ramparts?

Mr. President: Since I listened to the reading of the report of the Committee on Finance, from the Clerk's table, I have found time once more to peruse it. It is relied upon, by the friends of the bank, as the conclusive argument against the reasons of the Secretary for removing the depositories; and if the opponents of the bank will take for granted all the assumptions of the report, there can be little difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the Secretary's reasons are altogether "unsatisfactory and insufficient."

And, in the first place, if it shall be admitted that one of the "exclusive privileges" granted to the bank for a consideration paid, was the right of the bank to the depositories, without any restriction or qualification, then it will follow that the withdrawal of the depositories by the Secretary was a breach of contract. But is it not easy to be perceived, that if the retaining of the depositories by the bank was a privilege, it was not one of the "exclusive privileges" intended by the charter? And if not one of these exclusive privileges, then clearly the withdrawal was no violation of contract. The law enacted "that no other bank shall be established by any future law of the United States during the continuance of the corporation, for which the faith of the United States is hereby pledged," reserving the right to grant banks within the District of Columbia to a certain extent. This section, and this alone, was obviously intended to embrace all the "exclusive privileges" granted to the bank. Neither the privilege (if it may be called such) of receiving the public depositories, nor of making its notes every where receivable for debts due the United States, was an exclusive privilege; they were both contingent, because the Secretary of the Treasury was without limitation (except that of reporting his reasons to Congress after the act was done) authorized to withdraw the depositories, and Congress retained to itself the right at any time to pass a law that the notes of the bank should no longer be received in payment for debts to the United States. If this construction of the law be correct, an end is put at once to the labored argument of the first nine pages of the report to prove the want of power in the Secretary to make the removal. It may be remarked, in passing, that the notion that the act of removal cannot be consummated until Congress shall have passed on the reasons assigned by the Secretary, is altogether fallacious; for Congress, after hearing those reasons, may not choose to act: or if they attempt to act, one branch of Congress may consider the reasons satisfactory, and the other branch may consider them unsatisfactory; or, both branches may consider them insufficient, and omit to pass a bill for their restoration; or both branches may pass a bill for restoration, and the bill shall be disapproved by the President; still the act of the Secretary will be valid.

The report says: "The keeping of the public money is not a matter which is left, or was intended to be left at the will of the Secretary, or any other officer of the Government. The public money has a place fixed by law, and settled by contract; and this place is the Bank of the United States." From this strong assumption it would seem that no power to remove was by law given to the Secretary, but that all power was given to the bank to hold the public depositories. But when we come to look at the law, we find it directs the depositories of the public money only to be made "in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct." There has not been a moment since the establishment of the Bank of the United States, when other local banks in places where there was no United States bank or branches, have not been places of depository for the public money; and these banks were as lawfully places of depository as was that of the United States or its branches. So that the unqualified assumption that the "place fixed by law and settled by contract" for the depository of the public money, "is the Bank of the United States," is not founded in fact. Even if the Secretary of the Treasury had not the power to change the place, the State banks or individuals would as lawfully be depo-sitories of the public money in places where there was no bank of the United States or branches, as would be that bank or its branches. But, mark further: "The keeping of the public money is not a matter which is left, or was intended to be left at the will of the Secretary, or any other officer of the Government." Here is another unqualified assumption not warranted by the practice of the Government under the law. The charter of the bank itself most clearly leaves it at the discretion of the Secretary to say how long the keeping of the money shall be in the custody of the bank; he can, by that charter, change the place of keeping at any time he chooses. It is admitted that he cannot pay out a dollar of the public money without an appropriation first made by Congress; he therefore in that sense has no control over the public purse, and hence, all the cry about the Executive seizing the purse and the sword contrary to law, is as the "baseless fabric of a vision;" but both the law and usage give him unlimited power over the keeping of the public money. If he at any time deems it to be unsafe, will the power of removal to a place or places of greater safety be denied him? Neither can he be denied, as one branch of the Executive, the power of removing for other reasons than those of mere safety. He may remove for reason that the institution or individual in whose custody it is placed, has taken unwarrantable steps to interfere in the politics of the country—he may remove for reason that the most important business of the bank of depository shall be transacted without the knowledge of its board of directors—he may remove, if he has good reason to suspect that such an institution has suffered loans to be made from favoritism, without ample security—he may remove for a variety of reasons, not necessary to be here enumerated. It would be his duty to remove, if it should be ascertained that the board of bank directors in whose custody the public depositories were placed had given unlimited power to one individual to expend an unlimited amount of the funds of the institution for preparing and circulating articles, and purchasing pamphlets and newspapers, calculated to operate on elections, and secure a renewal of its charter.

The financial report again says, "But he (the Secretary of the Treasury) has no authority over the circulating medium of the country, either metallic or paper; nor has he the control of the national currency. It is no part of his duty either to contract or expand the circulation of bank paper, nor in any other way to exercise a general superintendence over the money system of the country." Speaking of a presumed "extraordinary power of judging of the general interest" vested in the Secretary, the report continues, "Such a power, did he possess it, would necessarily make him the general superintendent of all the proceedings of the bank; because it would enable him to compel the bank to conform all its operations to his pleasure, under penalty of suffering a removal of the public moneys."

I cannot readily conceive the object of denying the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury over the "circulating medium, either metallic or paper," and his "control of the national currency," but for the object of claiming those powers for the managers of the bank. The power over the metallic circulating medium, the standard of the value of money, is vested, I acknowledge, in the General Government—it is one of the powers directly granted to Congress by the constitution. But I am not ready to acknowledge that Congress, much less the Secretary of the Treasury, has any power, direct or implied, to make a paper circulating medium the standard of value in our money system. The power to coin money does not mean the power to create a paper standard of money. Taken in connexion with what has been before stated, I can scarcely doubt the wish of gentlemen to give the Bank of the United States—an institution which acknowledges no responsibility, a permanent "authority over the circulating medium of the country," which shall control, not only all the money operations of Government, but all the trade and business of the United States. Can gentlemen contemplate such a power in a corporation which may be owned and directed by aliens to the country, and enemies to free principles, without shuddering for the fate of our republican institutions? Thus much for the general argument of the finance report, which will, I think, be found based on principles entirely at variance with the whole practice of the Treasury Department ever since the adoption of the constitution. The last twelve pages of the finance report are altogether devoted to the attempt to invalidate the reasons offered by the Secretary to Congress for the removal of the deposits; and really, if the people of the United States would believe that the bank and its managers could do no wrong, there will be no room to doubt for a moment that the reasons offered by Mr. Taney were to them both "unsatisfactory and insufficient." The report, in answer to that reason of the Secretary which refers to the near approach of the period when the charter will expire, says: "The withdrawal of the money left on deposit, from a bank whose charter is about to expire, is naturally one of the things longest postponed." Now, it is of little consequence to state it, but is not this position at variance with the fact? It could not be expected at such a time, when the bank is about to expire, it would want the means to extend its loans. On its own account, the money would be of no use; on account of the public, it might be ready at the moment when called for. But for all the valuable purposes usually anticipated from deposits, while the bank was "winding up its concerns," this "longest postponed" matter would not be of the least benefit to the interests of the bank. If "the committee can perceive no possible reason" for "so early and so sudden a withdrawal" as was made on the first of October, the people may perceive the best possible reason in the resolutions of the bank of the 13th August, arbitrarily deranging the exchanges between the different sections of the country, and the "sudden" curtailment of loans for the two previous months in the mother bank and its branches. The committee are of opinion that there is very little ground for complaint that "many important money transactions of the bank are placed under the control of the committee of exchange, of which committee no one of the public directors, as they are called, is allowed to be a member," because, they say, "it has not been alleged that, in the discount of bills by this committee, any indiscretion has been committed, or any loss incurred, or that, in consequence thereof, any facility to the mercantile community has been withheld, or any duty of the bank to the Government violated." The bare allegation that no positive harm has resulted, is but a sorry justification of acts improper and unlawful in themselves. The committee of exchange, of which complaint is made, consisted of three persons, a minority of the board; and to this committee of exchange much of the important business of the institution was committed. The public directors allege that the real business of the institution is not transacted by the board, nor its real authority there exercised; that there exists, beyond its control, a power that can be and is exerted, promptly, secretly, and effectually, from one end of the country to the other. They further allege that they (the public directors) are excluded from the standing committees, and that two of these committees are selected by the president of the bank alone; that these committees have assumed the functions of the board of directors; that they have done this contrary to the recorded opinion of the board; that they have loaned money contrary to the by-laws, and on doubtful and unusual security; that they have done it on days and under circumstances where the board might have acted, had the business been brought before them; that they are not required to report in writing their proceedings to the board, &c. The Committee on Finance are doubtless of opinion that little harm either has or will result, from this committee of exchange, who discount paper without the knowledge of the board. "The bank (they say) has been advised that it might rightfully do this; and if it be not clear that this opinion is right, it is certainly far from clear that it is wrong." In this justification all fast friends of the bank may unite. The American people, who have some interest in the matter, may entertain another and a different opinion. The committee say they have no evidence of the truth of the allegation of the Secretary of the Treasury, "that the measures of the committee of exchange are, as it appears, designedly and by system, so arranged as to conceal from the officers of the Government transactions in which the public are deeply involved. This, it must be admitted, is a very serious charge. It imputes a corrupt motive. The committee have sought for the foundation, either in evidence or argument, on which this charge rests: they have found neither." If the Committee on Finance are really unable to perceive any evidence in this matter, have the president of the bank and the directors ever denied the fact? On the contrary, does not every circumstance that has come to the knowledge of the public, show that there have been many transactions involving the deepest public interest, the history of which has never been told? The people, at least, have strong suspicions; and the kind of argument used by the Committee on Finance is not exactly calculated to allay those suspicions.

The affair of the protested draft on the French treasury, on which the bank claims, without having advanced a dollar that did not belong to the Government, the enormous amount as damage of one hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars, is treated as a matter of ordinary occurrence between individuals. "The bank (say the committee) thinks itself entitled to damages on a protested bill purchased and held by itself, and drawn by Government. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks otherwise." "It is quite inconceivable to the committee that the pendency of such a difference of opinion, on such a question, should furnish any reason whatever for the withdrawal of the deposits." This claim for damages, in my opinion—inasmuch as it indicates a disposition to grasp what cannot in equity be said to belong to the bank—is one among the many good reasons why the Government should, at all events, change its fiscal agent.

Say the committee, "The last charge preferred against the bank is, that it has used its means with a view to obtain political power, and thereby secure the renewal of its charter." "The very statement of such a charge, as a reason for removing the deposits, is calculated to excite distrust in the wisdom and propriety of that measure; because the charge, too general to be proved, is too general, also, to be disproved." "The bank, it is said, has sought to obtain political power." "What is the definition of such an offence as this? What acts constitute it? How is it to be tried? Who is to be the judge? What punishment shall follow conviction? All must see that charges of this nature are but loose and vague accusations, which may be made at any time, and can neither be proved nor disproved," &c.

It is believed, however strong may be the doubts of the committee against the bank seeking for political power, that there are millions of the people of America who have no doubts on the subject. They understand the "definition" of the offence—"what acts constitute it"—"how it should be tried"—"who is to be the judge"—and "what shall be the punishment." And although the committee think the charge too general to be either proved or disproved, they want no stronger proof than the admission of the party criminated. The directors of the bank, in their pamphlet, which has been laid on the tables of the Senators, in justification of the many thousand dollars of the funds of the bank expended in political publications, say: "This has been done with regret that it should be necessary, but with the strongest conviction of its propriety, and without the slightest wish to disavow or to conceal it. On the contrary, the bank asserts its clear right to defend itself equally against those who circulate false statements, and those who circulate false notes." And, although they deny that their object in paying an amount for political publications unparalleled even by the expenditures of any mere political party in this country, has extended beyond self-defence, it is abundantly manifest from this pamphlet itself, that they consider misrepresentation and crimination necessary to effect that object. The bank has poured out its funds through its agent, who is not limited in the amount of his expenditures, in the most profligate manner, to partisan printers. It is said one edition of seventy-five thousand copies of a single newspaper, printed at New York, containing this report of the directors, and other offensive matter, have been lately circulated, evading the postage by addressing them to postmasters. It is also said that three or more editions of fifty thousand speeches, made since the commencement of the present session of Congress, printed on fair large type, at the expense of the bank—in one or more of which the Executive head of this Government is abused in no measured terms—have been circulated far and wide at the public expense. If the friends of the bank are in real doubt whether or not the bank owns presses, and carries on the business of party political management on an extended scale, the mass of the citizens cannot but be convinced of a fact of which many persons have ocular demonstration.

"The committee entertain no doubt that the immediate cause of the existing public distress is to be found in the removal of the public deposits, and in the manner in which that removal has been made." "The change of the deposits is made on the strength of charges against the bank, of a very grave and aggravated nature; such as, if true, would most seriously affect its credit for solvency and stability. It is proclaimed to the whole world as having converted itself into a political partisan, misapplied its funds, neglected its highest duties, and entered on a career of electioneering against the government of the country."

This is said by the committee in the way of justification for any imputed hostility of the bank towards the whole business community; and yet the committee intimate that the gradual withdrawal of nine millions of the public revenue from the bank, on which, they say, "was sustained, no doubt, a discount of far greater magnitude," "necessarily compelled it to diminish its discounts to the full extent of all that part which may be supposed to have been sustained by it." Now let us recur to the condition of the Bank of the United States in the city of Philadelphia, and in the city of Boston, as last reported, and see how far, in those places, the bank has been "compelled to diminish its discounts." In the city of Philadelphia, the bank curtailment in the month of January was from $7,999,232 to $7,576,509—$422,724; while the specie was increased from $1,881,686 to $2,030,034. Why this curtailment in the month of January, with a superabundance of specie on hand? Is it not explained in the fact that the bank and its friends were, during that month, making the utmost efforts to procure in Philadelphia an expression of the people against the removal of the deposits, and in favor of a re-charter? In the city of Boston on the 1st of August last the discounts amounted to five millions, nearly, while the amount of specie was $265,000 and a fraction. At the same place, on the first of January, the discounts had been reduced to $2,300,000, while the specie had accumulated to the amount of more than half a million. And it now appears, that in the month of January, the loans at the branch bank in Boston were reduced to $1,636,164; making a further reduction of about seven hundred thousand dollars in one month!

It will not do to say that, while the specie and the means of the bank are increased, and great curtailments are made with a rapidity unparalleled in the annals of banking in any part of the world—it will not satisfy the people to be told, that the bank is "compelled to diminish its discounts" to this extent. A curtailment of two-thirds of all the bank accommodations in Boston in the space of five months, and a curtailment of nearly half a million in a month of unexampled pressure in Philadelphia, during January, under a rapid increase of specie and as rapid a decrease of those responsibilities which create occasions for its use! It is impossible that the Committee on Finance should continue to insist that the bank was "compelled to diminish its discounts" to the extent they have been diminished.

We find, on looking over the returns of the bank from time to time, that expansions and curtailments have been made for the especial purpose of operating on public opinion, and that the community has been rewarded or punished as the bank might consider expedient for its own interests and the interests of the political party on whose efforts it has depended. And, sir, we have daily evidence that whatever predictions of distress and suffering are made by the friends of the bank here, the bank immediately takes measures that they shall be verified; and if any opponent of the bank points at any section of the country that is prosperous and flourishing in its business, that man who sits in his chair at Philadelphia, "calm as a summer's morning," immediately proceeds to apply those means which shall produce the desired distress. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] some time ago stated that when he left his home, Western Pennsylvania felt no pressure; that the city of his residence, one of the most flourishing manufacturing and trading places of the country, was enjoying its common state of prosperity. This statement has only time to travel to Pittsburg, via Philadelphia, before the screws are applied there, and seventy thousand dollars at the branch bank of that place are curtailed in two months. This produces the desired state of distress at Pittsburg; but distress is not yet extensive enough in that region. A gentleman at Steubenville, on the Ohio, some thirty miles below Pittsburg, writes to his friend here, a few days since, that the distress had not yet arrived at that place; but that a bank-man from Pittsburg had arrived, and that he had declared a further curtailment of one hundred thousand dollars at the Pittsburg branch should make Steubenville feel the necessity of crying out for the restoration of the deposits and the re-chartering of the bank. An order to curtail immediately two hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars at the Louisville Kentucky branch, is said to have gone forth. There is a representative in Congress from the Louisville district who votes against the bank, and measures must be taken to pour in a torrent upon him. But recent advices from Louisville say that the directors of the branch bank at that place have taken upon themselves the "responsibility" of refusing to carry this order of the parent bank into execution; that these directors have the feelings of men, and will not be instrumental in enforcing an order that will be ruinous to their fellow-citizens. We shall soon see what will be done with a board of directors who shall have the temerity thus to resist the orders of the mother bank.

At Nashville, the branch bank had a capital of one million, and its discounts had ranged from one and a half to two millions. But when in 1831-2 to counteract the opinion of the President, it becomes necessary to "buy golden opinions" at his door, the loans of that branch bank are in a short time extended to the enormous amount of five millions of dollars at this single interior town. But this opinion gains for the bank not a solitary friend in Congress from Tennessee; nothing can be gained there; and in a very few months the vast loans of that branch are curtailed from five millions to less than one million of dollars. The State of Tennessee had fortunately established at the moment a large State bank, to which capital had flowed; and this circumstance alone enabling her to supply the vacuum suddenly made, preserved that flourishing community from the anticipated distress. There is, sir, no excuse, no apology for the conduct of the bank in producing pecuniary distress to the utmost extent of its power. It will not do to say that "charges against the bank of a very aggravated nature" have been made, and not proved. If its sins have been heinous—if it has been proved to have converted itself into a "political partisan," to have "misapplied its funds," "neglected its highest duties," and electioneered against the government," this is offensive enough forever to place on it the seal of condemnation. But if to those offences it has more recently added that of a settled design to embarrass and distress the whole trading community—and the proof of this design is as palpable as it is awful—then must it prepare itself for that measure of popular indignation, which will continue to overflow so long as its name shall be remembered.

Again, speaking of the United States Bank notes as a currency, the Committee on Finance say, "To the State banks these notes and bills have performed the office of specie;" and they further say, that the curtailment of the circulation "is removing, to the amount curtailed, the basis of general circulation." Does this look, when the bank shall have succeeded in forcing a renewal of its charter, to the making of United States Bank notes a substitute for specie—to the adoption in earnest of the British system of paper currency? By the recent law in England re-chartering her great national bank, the notes of the Bank of England are made a legal tender. Mr. Walsh, of Philadelphia, pronounces this to be "a sound and bold" measure, and sagely concludes, that by it the bank will be relieved from all drain of specie, and consequently, form one great cause of derangement of the currency! The effect of the suspension of specie payments in England, and the substitution of a paper currency "as the basis of general circulation," I intend to notice in another place. If it be the opinion of the Committee on Finance that the bank has the exclusive control of the currency; that it can substitute, "as the basis of general circulation," the paper of the bank for gold and silver; that the bank, on this basis, is to be the sole arbiter in all the business relations of currency and exchange, I must be permitted to give it as my belief that the great mass of the community will never unite in their opinion.

The doctrine of the Committee on Finance as to the basis of money, surely is not now what was the doctrine of the chairman of that committee, [Mr. WEBSTER,] when a representative in Congress in 1816. Although the paper circulation was in its worst condition, he then said:

"No nation had a better currency than the United States—there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium. They therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from embarrassment. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin. This was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly."

The hard money men who framed the constitution were not then in as bad odor as the hard money men of the present day.

I have thus, Mr. President, perhaps in a manner too cursory, yet in a manner satisfactory to my own belief that my grounds are the only tenable grounds, noticed all the prominent points in the argumentative report of the Committee on Finance. If in this labor I shall have convinced nobody that mine are the correct views, I will have satisfied myself, that the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposits are as little invalidated by the report of the Committee on Finance, as they have been by the hundred-and-one speeches that have been spoken and printed against them. I do not perceive that the Committee on Finance have any where noticed that prominent reason of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits—"the conduct of the bank in relation to the three per cent. stock of the United States." This was a case in which the exchange committee "not only managed, in secret, a moneyed transaction of vast amount, intimately connected with the interests of the people of this country, but one where the measures of the Government were thwarted by the bank, and the nation compelled to continue for a time liable for a debt which it was ready and desirous to extinguish." As this case, evincing an utter recklessness towards the interests of the Government, and justifying entirely the dismissal of any agent, if within the power of the Executive, charged with the execution of the laws, is totally omitted in the report of the committee, what inference shall we draw from the fact? Was it really a matter too slight or too contemptible for notice? or was it a matter that could not be satisfactorily answered?

Another reason of the Secretary slightly noticed, if not entirely passed over in the argument of the committee, is the fact "that the whole capital of the bank is, in effect, placed at the disposition of the president of that institution;" that "he is authorized to expend what he pleases in causing to be prepared and executed such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information in regard to the nature and operations of the bank." Was this unlimited power of the president a matter so frivolous, or of so small interest to the public, that the committee did not deem it worthy of an answer?

It has frequently been noticed of the adroit lawyer who has a hard case, that the best he can do for his client, is either to glide over altogether the tough points, or to notice them lightly, making much of those points which can be easily answered, or which will not leave the case in a dead certainty against him. It would not be correct to impute any such intention as this to the Committee on Finance for their omissions in examining the Secretary's reasons. I will only say, that it was an oversight in the committee, much more fortunate for the Secretary than for the bank. From the reasons of the Secretary, and the attempt of the committee to refute them, I now turn to the bank itself, and to the consequences of its approaching contemplated dissolution.

Sir, it has been complained more than once, that the purpose of those opposed to the bank is to array the poor against the rich! Not so, Mr. President. Who are they who are dependent on the bank? Are they not those who are too poor to live on their own means, and are endeavoring to create the artificial means of living by the aid of a paper currency, predicated, not on gold and silver, but on the credit which shall be given to that currency by the Government deposits? Who are more poor and dependent than they who rely on the paper issues and the credit which a great bank can afford, as their sole means of doing business when the bank shall discount, but must stop the moment it shall deny its favors? No, sir, the great mass of men in this country whom the bank has endeavored to inveigle and deceive, and who, for its unrighteous conduct and bearing, have given this bank its death blow, are not the poor and dependant of the land. They are the bone and muscle of the country, the yeomanry, whose means are substantial; whose bank of discount and deposit is the soil which they cultivate, and whose wealth has become too ample to make them the dependants of the dependants on such a monopoly as that which is now attempting to agitate the land. Thanks to a beneficent Providence, the condition of the great majority who sustain the President in his opposition to the bank is not that of the poor who can be coerced or seduced from their purposes by either the frowns or smiles of the managers of any moneyed monopoly.

From the dawn of the revolution to the present moment, the struggle between what John Adams called the "absolute oligarchy" and the democracy, has been going on. The conflict has been between the few who grasp at power through the wealth of the country, and the many struggling to retain the right of self-government.

In 1820, the "excellent friend"* of the Senator from Kentucky, Hezekiah Niles, said: "The power of the Bank of the United States is severely deprecated by the wise and good; it is an engine of a more formidable nature than any before known to our country—competent to dictate public measures and private conduct, yet is irresponsible either to the Government or the people—and may be above the regulation even of its own stockholders through the contrivances mentioned. The first election under its charter furnished a proof that the minority might govern; and if that minority had been less foolish or less wicked, that minority would have governed still. The bank is yet exceedingly crippled through the proceedings of these men, its original fabricators, the singular infidelity of its officers and agents—so that for a long time past it has made no dividend. The time has been when a man without a black cockade in his hat would hardly expect to be civilly treated in a bank of the United States, much less to be favored with a share of that public accommodation which it was intended to furnish. The dispositions of men, and the force of party, are the same they were twenty-two years ago; and it cannot be doubted but the present bank would conduct itself as badly as the old bank did, if there should be any strong political excitement. The influence of two or three hundred moneyed men, dispersed throughout the United States, and commanding a large part of the moneyed interest, located at the most convenient points, and concentrating their force in our chief cities and towns, then rendering a common obedience to the Grand Lama, or parent bank, as the sun of their system, may be more easily conceived than described. They cannot want adherents and underlings—for those who have the command of money will always command them; and they may also dictate their measures to the body of "commercial interest," a very powerful class of society. As matters work at present, the bank is as necessarily on the side of Government as the bench of Bishops in England are on the side of the country; for to borrow money is the order of the day, and it is the interest of the bank to lend it. [It will be recollected that the Treasury, from the organization of the bank up to 1820, was in a condition that obliged the borrowing of money.] But the circumstances of the times may be changed; and it may be the good pleasure of the bank to oppose the Government, with an ability to depress the public credit and obstruct the public means yet little thought of. At the present moment, many persons are desirous of loaning money to the United States at less than six per cent. interest; but as the bank can render money "scarce" when it pleases, by checking its circulation, I verily believe that it has the power to reduce the price of our six per cent. stocks to 80 or 85 per cent. in six months, if there should not be a foreign market for them. With such means, what may we not apprehend, if the bank should interfere in our elections; zealously support this man, and oppose that, and, if unsuccessful, throw its weight in direct opposition to the administration? This may not appear to be the interest of the bank, but when we recollect that "holy men denounce damnation" on those who lent money to the Government during the late war, and know the force and fervor of party, we can easily believe a sacrifice of interest might be made to embarrass and derange the public proceedings. There is no prospect just now, of such a political excitement as has been spoken of; but let it come when it will, and it will one day or another agitate us, the bank will most assuredly be a political machine. Whether, as such, it happens to be on my side or against me, I shall still hold the same opinion of it—that it is an unconstitutional institution," &c.

Mr. Niles prophesied right of the bank in all, saving one thing; and that was, that he should continue to hold the opinion that this bank was an "unconstitutional institution." This man was opposed to the United States Bank. I understand that he is now in favor of it and that he was one of a committee to come here from Baltimore to ask a restoration of the deposites. He sounded the alarm against the bank fourteen years ago; he dreaded its "interference with our elections"—he "feared that it might be the good pleasure of the bank to oppose the Government"—he did not doubt that the new bank "would conduct as badly as the old one did, if there should be any strong political excitement"—that it "might throw its whole weight in direct opposition to the administration"—he said the bank would assuredly become a "political machine." And now that the bank seems to have verified all that he said against it, we find him among its strongest advocates. But, whoever read Niles's Register fifteen or twenty years ago, and will read it now, must perceive that not in relation to the bank alone, but in almost every thing else, Hezekiah Niles has changed his principles; he chimes in perfect unison with the practices and the party that he before condemned. "Ephraim has joined to idols, let him alone."

Mr. President, we have lived in an age of panics and alarms; and was there ever a time in which the party opposed to the free principles of our Government could not bear the entire sway of the administration, when they did not attempt to produce an excitement? Sir, this is not the first deposit subject in this country that has been made use of to create a panic. My youthful reminiscences carry me back thirty-two years, when the right of deposit, not of the public moneys, but of the whole produce of the Western States, at the port of New Orleans, was denied by the intendant or ruler of the province of Louisiana, under the crown of Spain.* This was soon after

* A friend has since reminded the speaker that this denial of the right of deposit at New Orleans was the act of Napoleon Bonaparte. Louisiana had been ceded by Spain to France, although not formally delivered. The effect of taking forcible possession of New Orleans would have been a war with both Spain and France; and this, at that time, to the old federal party, was a "consummation devoutly to be wished." Mr. Benton, in his speech on Foot's resolutions, (see Congress Debates, volume 6, part 1, page 104,) speaking of the acquisition of Louisiana in 1803, says—"It is to be remembered that France, emerging from the vortex of her revolution, overflowing with warriors, and governed by the conqueror who was esteeming at the sceptre of the world, was then the owner of Louisiana. The First Consul had extorted it from the King of Spain in the year 1800; and the violation of the right of deposit at New Orleans was his first act of ownership over the new possession, and the first significant intimation to us of the new kind of neighbor that we had acquired." Mr. Benton goes on to show that, vast and important as was the acquisition of the territory, its value sunk to mere insignificance when compared with the value of preventing its passing permanently, with the whole control of the commerce of the West, into the hands of

Mr. Jefferson was elected President; and with no less violence was he assaulted on account of that deposit question than General Jackson is now assailed for his determination to carry into effect the expressed will of the people in relation to the Bank of the United States. The opposition of that time called for an immediate war with Spain to force a restoration of the deposits. Led on by Ross and Morris, who then misrepresented the great States of Pennsylvania and New York in the Senate of the United States, the federalists of that day contended that the Government could not get on without a change of our rulers. Imaginary distress and ruin to the country were then urged—the administration was charged with cowardice and pusillanimity for not declaring war, and marching instantly to take possession of New Orleans. But, before the opposition were aware of what was going on, Mr. Jefferson's measures for the purchase of Louisiana had succeeded, and an end was put to that deposit question. It was then that the opposition turned again and abused him for paying fifteen millions of dollars to purchase a "worthless swamp." The event has proved that the purchase would have been an excellent bargain for the country, had ten times fifteen millions of dollars been paid for it. After this, the opposition party essayed to create panics whenever the European belligerents encroached on our neutral national rights. The attack on the Chesapeake, and the murder of Pearce in the harbor of New York, in 1805 and 1806, were fruitful themes of vituperation. The party was as valiant as Julius Caesar, and declared the administration "could not be kicked into a war." The panic of the embargo in 1807, '08, and '09, so much resembled the panic that is now attempted, that, to all living who recollect that time, I need not enter upon the particulars. Then came the series of panics which the opposition first excited, and afterwards played off, during the war of 1812. These, too, are quite too familiar to ask for detail. The money party, the very men who now support and urge the restoration of the deposits to the United States Bank, and the re-chartering of that bank, in the mercantile towns, then attempted to force the Government into submission to the terms of the enemy, by withholding their money from the public service, and by dissuading the citizens from subscribing to the loans authorized by Congress. After the war was ended, the Missouri panic was artfully contrived, to array the honest men of the North against the honest men of the South; and so well did the contrivers of this scheme succeed in what was termed an "era of good feelings" between the two old parties, that the oligarchy actually laid hold of the administration, by forcing on the people the choice of a Chief Magistrate against the will of more than three-fourths of the States of the Union.

But, Mr. President, for the last five or six years, the cherished "American system," until it received its death-blow at the last session of Congress from the hand of its own parent—et tu Brute!—has been the standing subject for agitation and panic, when all others failed. How charmingly would the northern opposition man play into the hands of the southern opposition man by this game of the American system? So late as one year ago, while the legislature of South Carolina was declaring herself out of the Union if the tariff should be continued, the legislature of Massachusetts was resolving that she would go to war if the tariff should be reduced! The tariff was reduced; an ultimate reduction down to twenty per cent., even lower than had been proposed by the friends of General Jackson—even lower than that rate either France or Great Britain. He likewise proves the hostility of the federal or opposition party at every step to the means for acquiring this territory. The nomination of the minister appointed to negotiate the treaty (Mr. Monroe, afterwards President,) passed only by a majority of two votes!

which the friends of the system declared would prostrate all the manufactures of the country. This reduction was made by a "compromise;" and Massachusetts became not only pacified, but convinced that her interest had been consulted, upon the empty declaration that the compromise alone had saved her manufactures from inevitable ruin!

The Indian affairs in Georgia and Alabama have presented another exciting subject, which has been made use of by political agitators for the worst purposes. It had been supposed that the stipulated obligations of the Government of the United States to the State of Georgia and to the Indians were such as must bring the former in direct collision with one or both of the latter. When a mandate was issued by a Judge of the Supreme Court, intended to arrest the proceedings of the State court, which adjudged an Indian murderer to his merited punishment, how high was the concern of the agitators that collision would not be produced between the State authority and the United States authority! And when the cause of the imprisoned missionaries was adjudged, on an ex parte hearing, against Georgia, how loud were the exclamations against the President for not at the moment declaring war against the State of Georgia. And it has been a matter of taunt on the President, (since the commencement of this debate,) that he did not instantly carry into effect that decision, which could have been done only by the shedding of blood, and the waging of a civil war. It is now said, that the Supreme Court of the United States has lost its power! If that department of the Government has lost any portion of the respect and confidence of the people, it has been brought about by its eagerness to decide this question of the missionaries, and others of kindred character, calculated to disturb the quiet and harmony which subsisted between the State and National Governments—it has been from an eagerness to grasp at jurisdiction which many have contended never belonged to it. Subsequent events have raised the strong suspicion that the whole plan of this missionary suit originated at the headquarters of the opposition in Massachusetts; and the probability is that the missionary appropriation from the national Treasury intended for the religious instruction of the Indians, was converted into a fund to enable agents to attend in this city, and prosecute their suit. It is well understood the Boston agitators were driven from the ground only by the interference of a generous and munificent patron of many humane institutions, residing in the State of New York, who declared, if these missionaries did not except the terms of release which the Executive of Georgia had offered them, that the missionary society which had encouraged the obstinacy of these imprisoned missionaries, no longer should receive his countenance or support.

Another subject more recently moved by the agitators, is the slave question. Accordingly, we find the agitators at the public meetings in South Carolina, declaring to their followers on public occasions, that there is a deliberate design on the part of the people of the North, to drive the whole white population out of that country, to annihilate their property, and destroy their prosperity. The agitators of the North, being in nine cases out of ten the same persons who have labored so zealously in the Indian agitation; these agitators, reduced to almost nothing in point of numbers and influence, by the unmasking of their hypocrisy, act in perfect concert with the agitators in the South. They attempt to give color to their complaints by calling meetings and delivering inflammatory addresses in various places; and they are attempting to operate on Congress by fac simile petitions in various parts, asking that slavery may be abolished in the District of Columbia. Of these agitators, it suffices to say, that in the whole North not one intelligent man in twenty will join their standard. The South has nothing to fear from their efforts, but in the effect they may have at a distance. These efforts are made to produce that distant effect; and they are every where formed against a general expression of scorn from the real friends of the Union.

But, Mr. President, my present object is to notice the panic and agitation produced by the distress for money which is felt in the commercial cities of the Union. What has produced that distress? Both the friends and the foes of the bank have admitted that the bank, wielding a capital of thirty-five millions, and controlling the pecuniary means of debtors to twice the amount of that capital, can produce temporary distress. This fact admitted, the only question is, has the bank taken those measures which are calculated to produce distress?

That the bank can produce temporary distress at a given point, has been abundantly proved by the conduct of its branch at the commercial capital of New Hampshire, in 1829. Very little of the capital of this bank has ever been owned in that State. Three hundred thousand dollars were sent to that town, and loans to the amount of perhaps half a million of dollars were urged on that community at a time when there was abundant capital in the State banks for all the legitimate business of the town and its vicinity. This made money so easy of attainment, that men who had a little money and some credit, were induced to take more money from the branch bank and invest it in manufacturing establishments. After the tariff law of 1828 had passed, the manufacturing stock fell, in many instances sinking the whole investment, so that where the bank had no other security, bad debts were made, and where collateral security was given, those who hired the money, and their sureties, became the sufferers. A large portion of the business men were stripped of their all; and the bank lost in bad debts some eighty thousand dollars. To improve the affairs of that branch, it was recommended that its management should be placed in the hands of a great bank attorney, with an addition of some fifteen hundred dollars per year to the salary of its former president. This bank attorney, ignorant of the wants of the men of business as he was of what was the true interest of the bank, took it into his head, because the bank had made bad debts from speculators in the State, that the substantial men of business who remained, ought no longer to be trusted; and in violation of the terms of payment on which loans had been made, called on all the customers of the bank to pay four for one of what they were required to pay by the implied terms of their first contract. Preceding even this, he made a loan to a single house in Boston of nearly a hundred thousand dollars at one time, drawing the specie from the local banks, whereby they were for the moment unable to furnish the relief which they otherwise might have done. The customers of the branch bank were pressed; they in turn pressed others; the specie, which was the substratum of the entire currency, was abstracted; and the expansion and contraction of the United States Bank paper credit alone might be set down as the sole procuring cause of the distress and embarrassment which followed. It was this arbitrary breach of faith with the customers of the bank that induced the merchants and men of business of all parties to petition for the removal of the man who had caused the distress. The present Secretary of the Navy, then a resident of Portsmouth, and myself, were the organs of the wishes of that community.

Mr. Woodbury wrote the Secretary of the Treasury, expressing the dissatisfaction of the citizens at the conduct of the offending officer, and requesting the influence of that Department to assist in correcting the evil; and I wrote two gentlemen of Philadelphia, enclosing for the president of the bank the petition of "sixty respectable members of the New Hampshire legislature," and another petition subscribed "by most of the business men, merchants, at Portsmouth, without distinction of party," requesting that the cause of the trouble might be removed; that a board of directors of mixed political character (instead of a board exclusively hostile to the State and National administrations) should be delegated for the year which was about to commence, and that the "institution in that State may not continue to be an engine of political oppression by any party." These were my words; and a most disingenuous use was made of them and of the petitions which they covered, by the president of the mother bank, who not only exposed these petitions to the derision of his agent, but justified and retained that agent in office till, by the force of public opinion, he left both the office and the State. The oppression and contumely heaped upon the citizens of Portsmouth did not end the affair. This isolated transaction is made, in a publication bearing the sanction of Nicholas Biddle and eleven directors of the bank at Philadelphia, at a meeting on the third December, 1833, the ground of a weighty charge against the administration. The pamphlet charges as follows:

"It was in the midst of this career of inoffensive usefulness, when, soon after the accession to power of the present Executive, the purpose was distinctly revealed that other duties than those to the country were required—and that it was necessary for the bank, in administering its affairs, to consult the political views of those who had now obtained the ascendancy in the Executive. It is understood that, soon after that event, a meeting was held in Washington of the principal chiefs, to consider the means of perpetuating their new authority, and the possession of the bank was among the most prominent objects of the parties assembled. The first open manifestation of the purpose was in June, 1829, when a concerted effort was made by the Executive officers to interfere in the election of the board of directors at Portsmouth."

When and where was this meeting of principal chiefs in the city of Washington, to get possession of the bank? The charge can be but the mere coinage of the brain of one who had doubtless often consulted the will of other "principal chiefs" as a guide to what should be his own course of action in future "fair business transactions." To give such a charge even an air of probability, it ought to have been followed by some consequences of a more marked official character than letters from Mr. Woodbury, then not connected with the Cabinet, and myself, representing the wishes of an oppressed and injured community in the distant State of New Hampshire. If it had been the object of the "principal chiefs" to lay hold of the bank and convert it to political purposes, the Secretary of War would not, at that time, have attempted, for the accommodation of the citizens of that State, to remove the funds to pay pensioners from the vaults of that bank to another State bank, of more convenient location. At no time have the friends of the administration manifested a desire to convert the Bank of the United States into a political engine, or to take it under their exclusive control.

The cause of the present commercial distress must be apparent to all who assent to the truth of the fact that the Bank of the United States can at all affect the money or credit of the country.

In July, 1832, after the President had vetoed the bank bill, an honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILKES] is reported, in Gales and Seaton's Debates, to have said: "Let us look at known facts. Thirty millions of the capital of the bank are now out on loans and discounts in the States on the Mississippi and its waters; ten of these millions on the discount of its bills of exchange, foreign and domestic, and twenty millions loaned on promissory notes. Now, sir, how is it possible that this vast amount can be collected in so short a period, (three years and a half, at which time the charter would expire,) without suffering, by any management whatever?"

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[MARCH 3, 1834.]

"I hesitate not to say, (continues the Senator from Massachusetts,) that as this veto travels to the West, it will depreciate the value of every man's property, from the Atlantic States to the Missouri. Its effects will be felt in the price of lands, the great and leading article of western property; in the price of crops; in the product of labor; in the suppression of enterprise; and in embarrassment to every kind of business and occupation. I take this opinion strongly, because I have no doubt of its truth, and am willing its correctness should be judged by the event."

If the honorable Senator intended to create an alarm in the West, as was distinctly avowed, to affect "an important election" then at hand, the event on which he staked his reputation has not occurred, for, from the date of the veto in 1832, up to the time of the present panic, notwithstanding the merchants at Cincinnati, controlled by the bank, before the election, advertised that they would give a cent more in a pound for pork if the bank should be, than if it should not be re-chartered, the price of lands and the price of crops continued to rise; the products of labor were more abundant; enterprise was more rife; and embarrassment in every kind of business and occupation, was less known throughout the whole West than had ever before been known. But again, speaking of the West, the Senator continues:

"To call in this loan at the rate of eight millions a year, in addition to interest on the whole, and to take away at the same time that circulation which constitutes so great a portion of the medium of payment throughout that whole region, is an operation which, however wisely conducted, cannot but inflict a blow on the community of tremendous force and frightful consequences. The thing cannot be done without distress, bankruptcy, and ruin to many." The gloomy predictions of the Senator, although the bank, throughout the West, having entered the field as a competitor with General Jackson, put on the screws and attempted to verify them, never came to pass. But, by taking a longer time and drawing a longer bow, in anticipation of the removal of the deposits, the bank has probably been able to produce a temporary derangement in the commercial business of the country; has been able to reduce prices, aided by the reduction of prices in the foreign market; has created inconvenience to the whole trading community; and this, so far from being an argument in favor of re-chartering the bank, or restoring the deposits, proves that the power which may be wielded by this monopoly ought not to be intrusted to the most pure and disinterested body of men on earth—much less to a single individual, acknowledging no responsibility whatever to the people or to any tribunal of the people.

Sir, the expansion of the currency of the bank—I call its bills as well as its illegal drafts currency, although a misnomer—the expansion of the currency and debts of the bank nearly thirty millions, just at the point of time when application is to be made to re-charter the institution, was an expedient highly culpable, under the best possible aspect of the case. It was an expedient which could not be justified even had the bank intended the loans to be made in good faith, and never to have curtailed them only when the circumstances of the borrowers might favor an easy payment. To me, sir, it is evident that this step was taken for no other purpose than to create that very state of things which might enable the bank to force a re-charter; to create an influence which should force out of public office every candidate who was known to be opposed to the bank.

To produce the most mischievous effects, the utmost distress, in making their curtailments—and these curtailments not at the rate of "eight millions in a year"—the reduction from the 1st of August to the 1st January, was nearly thirteen millions of dollars, or two millions and a half in a month. And how is the curtailment made? An entirely new system is simultaneously forced on the country—a system arbitrary, partial, and unjust, adopted without consultation with, and without the knowledge of business men—a system calculated to circumvent, and prostrate in abject dependence on the bank, all the merchants and traders, and extending even to the farmers of the great West. Yes, the whole prosperous business of the country is designedly arrested and surprised by stopping up its usual channels, and utterly changing its current, in a measure proposed and adopted on the same day by a conclave of the directors of this bank at Philadelphia. These are the resolutions, which it should be borne in mind were adopted on the 13th of August, more than six weeks before the withdrawal of the deposits:

"Resolved, That, for the present, and until the further order of the board, the amount of bills discounted shall not be increased at the bank and the several offices.

"Resolved, That the bills of exchange purchased at the bank and all the offices, except the five Western offices, shall not have more than sixty days to run.

"Resolved, That the five Western offices be instructed to purchase no bills of exchange, except those payable in the Atlantic cities, not having more than ninety days to run—or those which may be received in payment for existing debts to the bank and the offices, and then not having more than four months to run."

These resolutions were adopted; and afterwards, the imperious board adopting them refused to consider another resolution, offered by the Government directors, instructing the committee on the state of the bank to report, at an early day, a system for the "gradual reduction of the business of the institution throughout all sections of the country, having regard to the interests of the stockholders, the debtors of the bank, and the community in general."

As the distress accumulates, the local banks at Philadelphia invite a conference with the directors of the United States Bank to devise ways and means to ease and relieve the money market. The mammoth monopoly utterly refuses to unite in any such purpose: she has ten millions of specie in her vaults—more money, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] said some time ago, than she knows what to do with. As was graphically described by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FARRINGTON], "There sits Mr. Biddle, in the presidency of the bank, as calm as a summer's morning, with his directors around him, receiving his salary, with every thing moving on harmoniously." And yet his bank refuses to lift her hand for the relief of the distress she has herself produced: nay, like the dog in the manger, she not only refuses relief, but she holds all the other banks in a position which shall prevent their affording relief. The president of this bank, in answer to a question propounded to him by the Committee on Finance of the Senate, in 1830, said, "There are very few banks which might not have been destroyed by an exertion of the power of the bank." This power, it seems, he is now exerting to its greatest extent; and, while he utterly refuses all concert of action with other banks for the relief of individual distress, he presses on the State banks, till he forces them to cry to Congress, and beg for the restoration of the deposits.

And is it to be endured, that an institution, which for the term of eighteen years has had the benefit of more than six millions of permanent Government deposits—which has had a universal currency given to its notes, even including its spurious drafts, by every where making them receivable in payment for dues to the United States—which has done no service to the Government, in receiving, paying out, or transferring money, that has not been to her a source of profit—which has been secured from all taxation, both State and National, either of the mother bank or its branches—and which paid for the monopoly alone of being without a rival in the country, more than a million and a half of dollars;—is it to be endured in this free country, that such an institution shall crush all other moneyed establishments—shall produce consternation and distress—shall assume to argue with and dictate to the constituted authorities, and contest their right to manage the funds of the Government as they please?

Mr. President, I must again be permitted to advert to the veto speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. He then said:

"There is no longer any mystery, no longer a contest between hope and fear, or between those prophets who predicted a veto and those who foretold an approval. The bill is negatived; the President has assumed the responsibility of putting an end to the bank; and the country must prepare itself to meet that change in its concerns which the expiration of the charter will produce. * * * The bank has fallen, or is to fall."

"It is now certain, that, without a change in our public councils, the bank will not be continued, nor will any other be established, which, according to the general sense and language of mankind, can be entitled to the name. In three years and nine months from the present moment, the charter of the bank expires: within that period, therefore, it must wind up its concerns. It must call in its debts, withdraw its bills from circulation, and cease from all its ordinary occupations."

The speech of the gentleman, written out after delivery, was circulated far and wide by the bank. It was sent into the State I have the honor to represent, by horse-loads, and forced into every human dwelling where it would be received. So, I believe, it was circulated throughout New England, and in every part of the country; steam-power printing machines were kept in motion in Boston and Washington, that no voter in the country might doubt what was the point in issue. The bank itself published this speech as her manifesto—her declaration of war against General Jackson; the election, by her choosing, was placed on this as a turning point—the bank or Andrew Jackson. The bank was beaten—no change favorable to it "in our public councils" was effected. The subsequent elections to the House of Representatives in Congress, still further manifested the great majority of the people decidedly opposed to the bank. And now—what can the friends of the bank—what can the bank itself, say, in behalf of the press they are making on that very Congress which has been returned to second the views of the President in relation to this institution? Has the bank any right to complain that it now must do what its great friend said it must do in case of the re-election of Andrew Jackson—"wind up its concerns?" Even if it had done justice to the Government and to the people—even had it been guilty of no act contravening its duty—even if it had never done the things which it ought not to have done, and left undone those things which it ought to have done; it was the duty of this bank quietly to submit to the public will, when so audibly expressed. The turpitude of creating, by artificial means, distress on the community, for the purpose of trying the experiment of a reaction on the public sentiment, cannot be too strongly reprehended; and, let me tell you, sir, that not only will this generation pass sentence of condemnation on this bank, but the example will be a lasting beacon to generations to come, warning them against an odious and an oppressive moneyed monopoly.

Doomed to "wind up its concerns," (as the Senator from Massachusetts has said it must,) why does the bank continue its efforts on our national councils? Why do its advocates continue to beard that man who was chosen by the people for the express purpose of putting an end to the charter? Do they think a restoration of the deposits to the bank that is about to expire could be of the least benefit? On the contrary, do they not know that the restoration, at this time, instead of allaying, must increase the distress? Do they not know that the bank has no longer a right to claim them; that, according to the opinion of many distinguished jurists, it has repeatedly violated its charter; and that if a scire facias has not been issued, it has not been for want of ample cause for sustaining it? Do not the stockholders of this bank know, that of all persons having a right to claim a re-charter, they are the very last persons that should do it? for, if they be of the few American citizens who had once this privilege, they surely, on no principle, can claim to exercise the same privilege a second time, to the exclusion of all that numerous portion of the people who have never had a chance to procure these benefits; and if they are foreigners, they stand behind all other as to the right of being stockholders in any bank which may succeed the present.

The speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, made in July, 1832, after the reception of the veto, is in singular contrast with his recent speeches in the Senate. The President and the administration are now told that they may as well give in at once, for that we are to have "no peace, but a sword," as long as the funds of the Government shall be under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury: we must have a law for restoring the deposits to the bank. Two years ago, the language was "The bank has fallen." "It is now certain, that, without a change in our public councils, the bank will not be continued, nor will another be established, which, according to the general sense and language of mankind, can be entitled to the name: it must wind up its concerns." There has been no "change in the public councils" since the veto of the President. The bank, on his own showing, has become defunct. The state of things precisely has occurred which the gentleman had represented as putting an end to the bank, and all other banks entitled to the name. What more can the bank desire? The people was the tribunal to which the bank appealed; it was the tribunal of the bank's choice. The decision was against the bank. Was it not sufficient that the bank, to influence public opinion, resorted to means unparalleled under this or any other government? Must this institution, in defiance of the people's decision, now resort to other and more unjustifiable measures to force a re-charter? The bank, according to the Senator, will now have the astonishing condescension, so the deposits shall be restored, to make "fair concessions," to "furnish any and every guard against any abuse of power," to allow Congress to make the most "liberal modifications." These concessions come too late. Why did not the representatives of the bank in Congress in 1832 make some concessions? Why were all terms, not acceded to by the president of the bank, then present, refused by the friends of the bank? Why was the bill passed, perpetuating the monopoly in its present hands on terms of millions of dollars less advantageous to the people than were offered by others? Why was this gratuity presented to stockholders, a large portion of whom were foreigners—and denied to others who were native citizens? Let those who hurried through the charter in one branch without deigning to answer the objections then made, and through the other branch by precluding all discussion—let those answer, why they would have forced on the people a moneyed monopoly on better terms than the monopolists themselves asked for! Let them account to the people, why the bill was passed, giving to the present stockholders gratuities for which other companies were willing to pay millions! why it passed without securing to any State that it should be placed under the same control as the several State banks! why no "fair concessions," no "liberal modifications," were then offered?

The bank, it is said, will make "fair concessions," and will furnish guards against abuses. Let it be conceded that the bank shall be re-chartered by the present Congress, under any modifications—let it now be understood that the bank has the power to force on the people a re-charter in defiance of their expressed will, and who will undertake hereafter to place bounds to the abuses of the institution? Have not the directors of the bank heretofore defied the stipulations of the charter? Was not the charter notoriously and repeatedly violated during the two first years of its existence? Has the charter not been violated by the bank putting and keeping in circulation millions of paper, such as was expressly forbidden? Is it not now violated by the practice of an irresponsible committee, without the consent of the board of directors, loaning more than a million of money at a rate less than legal interest, and for an indefinite time, to a single favorite, while the whole community is pressed with its unparalleled curtailments? Make what guards and restrictions you please to any bill re-chartering the United States Bank, and if it shall not be perfectly convenient for such a board of directors as the present to violate them all with impunity, from what I have seen, I could have no good reason to doubt that the bank might hereafter obtain just such modifications and concessions as the directors shall please to ask from Congress. Renew this charter, and the will of any future board of directors will be law: renew it, and better will it be for the people to have no Congress, no Government, than such a Congress and such a Government as they may have.

Sir, it has been boasted that the United States Bank has produced such a currency during the last fifteen years as is unequalled in the history of currency. More is due to the good management of State banks, which in my section of the country act on a system altogether independent of that, than to the United States Bank, for the healthy and equal state of the currency during the last twenty years. Gentlemen must be mistaken when they suppose that paper currency to be sound, which is not redeemable with specie, without contingency, in the vicinity of the place of issue. The United States Bank branch drafts, issued a thousand miles from the place where they are payable, if indeed they can be said to be payable at all, are no better entitled to the appellation of a "sound currency," than were the treasury notes of the last war, which, though bearing an interest of six and seven per cent., were passed at a discount of twenty and twenty-five per cent.; and it may be soon discovered that United States Bank paper is no currency at all, if the Secretary of the Treasury shall order, as he legally may do, that these branch drafts shall no longer be received in payment of debts due the United States. The stock of the bank, at the time it was chartered, was made up as follows: the seven millions subscribed by Government was paid by creating a stock bearing five per cent. interest, which was received by the bank at par, although it was then really worth twenty-five per cent. less. Twenty-one millions of private stock of the bank were paid in Government securities, six per cent. stocks being then worth in the market about eighty-four cents on the dollar. Only seven millions were required to be paid in specie; and of this only one million four hundred thousand ever was so paid. The two subsequent payments of stock were made, not in specie, but by raising the wind on the credit of the bank stock from discounts in the bank itself. That the 1,400,000 taken from the vaults of the local banks, and adding nothing to the amount of specie already in the country, compelled a

*There has been a single loan made to Thomas Biddle, a broker and relative of the president of the bank, of eleven hundred thousand dollars, at five per cent. The branch at New York lately loaned to a single favorite house from 250,000 to 300,000 dollars; and it is said that two-thirds of the discounts of that branch would be comprised in the accounts of less than thirty houses. The investigating committee, in 1832, found, of the whole loan at the mother bank, about 8,000,000 of dollars, 5,434,111 dollars were loaned to ninety-nine individuals. More than 3,000,000 were in the hands of twenty-seven persons.

specie payment of more than a hundred millions of bank notes then in circulation, is altogether incredible. Corruption was rife in the Bank of the United States, even before the institution was well under way; and I regret to say, that, although the evil was smothered while the bank was under Mr. Cheves's administration, it has never been completely purged of the foul pollution. Before the bank had gone fairly into operation, under severe embarrassment, it commenced curtailing its discounts. It curtailed, as it now does, its best business paper, while immense amounts loaned on the security of stock pledges, were suffered to remain in bank without curtailment. Here was partiality and injustice. To enable the president and directors to speculate on the stock, an order was passed for taking stock security on loans at par; and this order was transcended by loaning on merely nominal security twenty-five per cent. to the stockholders over and above the par value. In this way, enormous and collusive speculations were made on stock. The directors purchased when the stock was low, and sold out after its price had been enhanced by their own purchases. The then president was proved to have made some thirty or forty thousand dollars in a single operation of this kind. Here was prostitution of office, and treachery to the public interests. Dividends were made to delinquent stockholders, who had notes discounted to the full par value of their stock. Shares were divided into parcels, with fictitious owners, who gave powers of attorney to act, enabling the nominal owners to evade the rule restricting a single stockholder to thirty votes: the persons thus voting, were those who had the greatest loans on stock; and thus those men, who had virtually no interest in the bank, were able to control it.

These are some of the abuses prior to the explosion of the bank in 1819, gathered from the report of an investigating committee of Congress, and which, had not the arm of the Government sustained it, must have put an end to the bank. Somewhat different have been the measures of the directors within the last few years; but even more corrupt and corrupting has been its last than its first estate.

The resumption of specie payments, and the restoration of the currency, was not due to the bank of the United States, but was the natural consequence of that wealth which was gained by the industry of the country. This industry and its accumulation soon furnished specie for the bank, and furnishing the means of discharging the public debt, enabled the bank gradually to turn its stock into a specie capital, and likewise gave to the country the means for redeeming the hundred millions of bank paper which had vitiated the currency from the suspension of specie payments. Instead of this bank contributing to a sound currency, it may fearlessly be asserted, that the successful enterprise and labor of the country, accumulating wealth, had created a sound currency in spite of the bad management of the bank; for it must have been evident to all who have watched its course, that the tendency of this bank, whether it expanded or contracted its paper issues, has been to injure both the currency of the country and its steady prosperity.

Permit me here, Mr. President, to say that I differ from those who are disposed to admit that the removal of the deposits, although necessarily to take place previous to the expiration of the charter, was ill-timed in the month of October last. If the deposits had not then been removed, under the resolutions of the mother bank of the 13th August, directing curtailment on a partial and arbitrary principle, the blow of "tremendous force and frightful consequences" (predicted by the Senator from Massachusetts after the veto of the President) must have been felt with tenfold vengeance. Then the cry at this session of Congress for relief would have been directed to the single point of a renewal of the charter. The screws in that case would have been applied to the local banks, and to business men, who in their turn would have operated on all in their custom or employ, compelling them to sign and present fac simile petitions and memorials, praying that the monopoly itself might be continued. If the deposits had not been withdrawn, the power of the bank to produce distress must have been increased. The bank had taken measures to bring about a pressure and embarrassment; and I am not now to believe that her disposition to do justice would have been greater with increased than with diminished means. The withdrawal of the public deposits at that time; and under the peculiar circumstances, will be the means of carrying into effect the will of the people in relation to the bank: without the removal at that time, the strong chance is, that the public will, so audibly expressed in all the elections since the bank charter was vetoed, would have been defeated by the immense means which the bank could bring into action against it. If pecuniary distress must attend the death struggles of the bank, it will be encountered with firmness by the patriots who have always looked dangers in the face and made great pecuniary sacrifices when the good of the country required them. To prove that the money pressure now existing at the points where foreign importations are extensively made, preceded and was more severe beyond than within the limits of the United States, and that of consequence it was not caused by a withdrawal of the deposits from the United States Bank, I will recur to a summary extract from the Quebec Gazette, of December last, in an article on the commerce and business of Lower Canada, during the last year. The article follows:

"The depression in the money market in Canada commenced as early as the first of August last. Several extensive failures at Montreal and Quebec took place early last summer. Exchange on England for cash declined from 9½ to 6 per cent. premium. The scarcity of money was such, (says the Quebec Gazette,) that in the latter part of the season business was not done to more than one-fourth the usual amount. The number of persons engaged in retailing dry goods (says the same paper) will be considerably diminished during the next year."

In confirmation of this statement, the circular from the house of H. Gates & Co., of Montreal, dated January 1, 1834, says: "We very much regret to say, that while we have to record almost unexampled distress and difficulty the year past, we see nothing in prospect for the year to come, calculated to raise high hopes of safe and profitable business." * * "One great embarrassment in doing a heavy business in the year past, has arisen from a scarcity of money, and the causes of this scarcity seem likely to continue at least for some months to come."

The New York Journal of Commerce, noticing the contents of Halifax newspapers to the 20th of January, remarks that they complain of great distress in the money market in the British Province of Nova Scotia. The Acadian of the 18th holds the following language: "That this town is at present involved in great distress, and that the merchants and traders, and the community at large, feel their inability to meet their pecuniary engagements and pay off their outstanding debts, are facts too clear and self-evident to require either proof or illustration. This calamity is not confined to a few individuals engaged in some particular branch of trade, but appears to be general and almost universal." A public meeting was held on the subject, January 15th, at which resolutions were adopted.

In the West Indies too, there, is a similar distress. A correspondent of the Norfolk Beacon, writing under date of the 10th December last, from St. Bart's, says: "The West Indies are now in a deplorable state—poverty has overtaken many since you left here, and is making rapid and quick marches upon many others."

In England likewise, the pressure for money has been great. They there can have no cause to complain of the want of a national bank—for their great bank had just been re-chartered. A friend at the Eastward has furnished me with the following extract of a letter from Baring, Brothers, & Co. dated at London, November 22, 1833: it states—

"That the prompt payments for the heavy transactions of August have come round, producing a great scarcity of money in our colonial trade, and which, with the attempts to force sales, have caused a general decline of prices."

Still later accounts from Great Britain represent the money market as more easy, and that a rise had taken place in the price of cotton.

It need not be denied or disguised, that the curtailment of discounts by the Bank of the United States, between the first of August and the first of December, by which the payment of ten millions of dollars was thrown upon the cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, was calculated to produce distress; this immense amount was thrown upon those cities by stealth, the order of August 13th, which produced it, having been kept from the public until December. The rapid calling in of the debts of the Bank of the United States, payment being made in bills of the local banks—for the circulation of the United States Bank itself, was extending instead of contracting—drew the specie for the redemption of those bills out of the local banks into that of the United States and its branches, so that the local banks were obliged to curtail their circulation at the same time. A friend at Boston informs me that the branch bank at that place has curtailed two-thirds of the amount due to it in September last; in doing this, it had compelled the local banks of the city to curtail from five to seven millions of their loans. This, as will have been perceived, must have made the pressure very severe. It must now become evident that the bank in that city, although it may have replenished its vaults with specie, by running upon the local banks, has expended much of its strength by pressing upon that class of its customers which furnished its greatest profit; and the consequence will be, that these customers will seek other avenues of accommodation, and leave the bank to turn its exclusive attention to the local banks, through which it doubtless intends to keep up the distress of the whole trading community, and compel the people to ask for a re-charter of the monopoly. It is even suggested that in this plan of making money scarce the managers of the bank here, may have acted in concert with great speculators in Europe, some of whom are owners of the bank stock, with a view to affect the price of the cotton crop, and profit by the fluctuation. Certain it is, that the price of cotton first fell in England, and this before the removal of the deposits. It is this premeditated design of the managers of the Bank of the United States to produce distress to which that distress is due. That the managers themselves are disappointed, in being unable hitherto to make the distress general, we may well believe. Fortunate it is to the country that it never was in so good a condition generally, to encounter this hostility of the bank, as at the present time. The agriculturalists every where this year have been blessed with an abundant harvest: generally they are indebted to no bank; and even should they be unable to dispose of their produce, they can live upon it themselves, and furnish it for others to live upon, without asking favors from the managers of the bank. But throughout the country their produce commands the cash, and such high prices as amply repays the toil of rearing and gathering it.

But there are other classes in some parts of the country who feel the pressure which the bank has designed. It is those men who have traded beyond their capital, many of whom, being warned in season, will struggle through the difficulty. Others, who are really insolvent, and whose insolvency has hitherto been concealed in the abundance of paper credit, must fail and make their bankruptcy apparent. It is, I believe, this last class principally, which has yet suffered to any extent in consequence of the unpardonable course pursued by the bank. Whether in any part of the country other classes must suffer, remains to be developed.

The inducements to invest capital in different enterprises have been so great, that many men, thought to be prudent, have gone into trade upon credit, investing tens and hundreds of thousands in manufacturing and other kinds of business. When investments are once made, the capital necessary to be used increases instead of diminishing. Frequently it may happen that such men succeed for a series of years and lay up fortunes. But more frequently, the result of the whole matter is insolvency, the adventurer sacrificing all he was worth originally, and much of what he has obtained on credit. These are the cases that become open and palpable, especially when from the contraction of paper issues, after a high degree of commercial prosperity, there shall be a revulsion in business. Such are the cases which are now the foundation of the panic which is made so much of by the friends of the bank. Alarms of this kind are always to be dreaded: nevertheless, it must be admitted that their effects are sometimes salutary.*

* From the late report of a New York committee of merchants, on the causes of the destruction of credit and confidence and consequent commercial distress, the following is quoted. It presents facts and illustrations which it will be difficult for the friends of the United States Bank to gainsay:

"In the first eighteen months of its existence, namely, during the year 1817 and part of 1818, the Bank of the United States, through its numerous branches, had issued, according to the report of Mr. Cheves, notes to an enormous amount. Its discounts in this short period, although the specie part of its capital was hardly two millions, exceeded forty-three millions of dollars. Every department of business, and speculation, and living, was, as a necessary consequence, stimulated to the utmost; costly mansions were erected and adorned with the most expensive furniture; sumptuous entertainments were given, and splendid equipages were set up. And every man seemed to imagine that because credits were abundant, riches must equally abound. The prodigality and waste of some of our citizens were almost beyond belief. 'We have heard,' says the Weekly Register of 1819, 'that the furniture of a single parlor, possessed by, we cannot say belonging to, one individual, (who afterwards became bankrupt,) cost forty thousand dollars.' In this way, according to the views of those who looked only at the surface, the country enjoyed a state of 'unexampled prosperity.' And what, without any 'removal of deposits,' was the sequel of this previously brilliant drama? A rapid curtailment of discounts was commenced. The southern and western offices were directed not to issue their notes; the bank ceased to purchase and collect exchanges on the south and west; and the local institutions were called upon to pay up their balances.

"These measures, according to the report of its then President, Mr. Cheves, simple and obvious as they are, and some of them so strangely overlooked so long, lifted the bank, in the short space of seventy days, from the extreme of prostration to a state of safety, and even, in degree, of power; and enabled it to defy all attacks.

"The bank," observes a judicious commentator on this statement, 'was saved, and the people were ruined.' For a time, the question every morning was, not who had broken the previous day, but who yet stood—suits, warrants, and executions took place of bank credits. 'From all parts of the country,' says the Weekly Register of April 10, 1819, 'we hear of a severe pressure on men in business, a general stagnation of trade, a large reduction in the price of staple articles. Real property is rapidly depreciating in its nominal value, and its rents or profits are exceedingly diminishing. Many highly respectable traders have become bankrupts, and it is agreed that many others must go: the banks are refusing their customary accommodations, confidence among merchants is shaken, and 3 per cent. a month is offered for the discount of promissory

As an addition to the calamitous state of things anticipated from the great commercial cities, if the deposits shall not be restored, and the bank charter renewed, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] says, the town of New Bedford, in that State, has been smitten by the recent events; that three months ago it was in a high state of prosperity; but that it has received a blow, in numerous failures, from which it cannot soon recover. Now, what does the gentleman mean by "recent events?" Referring to what he had before said, these recent events must have been intended to mean the withdrawal of the deposits from the United States Bank. The North American Review of the 1st of January, 1834, has an interesting article on the subject of the whale fishery, said to have been written by a gentleman of New Bedford, [Mr. Williams,] which presents the more rational account of what has smitten that town. It is overtrading. Water does not more naturally seek its level, than does revulsion succeed that high state of prosperity founded on fictitious credit, carried by enterprise beyond its true point. It is well known that within the last few years, in consequence of the great success that had attended the whale fishery from Nantucket and New Bedford, and which had given the latter place, depending on no interior trade, a growth altogether unexampled in any other merely commercial town of the United States, there had been a rushing of capital to investments in the business of the whale fishery. As in every thing else, credit, as well as capital, was extended to push their business. The ordinary time after departure before the ships can notes which a little while ago were considered as good as old gold, and whose makers have not since suffered any losses to render their notes less valuable than heretofore.' Four months afterwards, August 7th, 1819, the same journal says, 'It is estimated that there are 20,000 persons daily seeking work in Philadelphia; in New York 10,000 able bodied men are said to be wandering about the streets looking for it, and if we add to them the women who desire something to do, the amount cannot be less than 20,000.' A committee appointed by a meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia on the 21st August, 1819, to inquire into the situation of the manufacturers of the city and its vicinity, reported, on the 2d of October, that of thirty mechanical and manufacturing branches of trade, which they enumerated, which gave employment to 9,188 persons in 1814, and to 9,672 in 1816, there were but 2,137 persons employed in 1819.

"Here then we have a case of former days, precisely so far as the effects of moneyed credits is concerned, analogous to the present. As more recently in 1831, so in 1817, the flood gates of circulation had been opened wide, a scene of unexampled prosperity, as it seemed, but of delusive intoxication, as it really was, ensued.

"The day of contraction, however, as we have seen, soon came; the order for that purpose was issued from Philadelphia on the 20th July, 1818, and by the 1st of April following the curtailments had amounted to the immense sum of 6,530,159 dollars. And what then became of the unexampled prosperity, about which, then, as now, so much has been said. Being a mere phantom it vanished, as we have seen, in an instant, and universal ruin and dismay follow in its footsteps. The community then saw, and felt, as they now feel, without seeing, and of course, without acknowledging, that paper money, like dram-drinking, relieves for the moment by the deceitful sensation it creates, but gradually exhausting the natural heat, leaves the body at length in a worse state than it found it.

"We have the authority of the printed statement, laid before the stockholders by their then president, for saying that during all this time (1817, '18, and '19) the bank had the advantage of immense Government deposits, that at the very moment when the curtailments were ordered, the Government deposits in the bank and its branches amounted to eight millions of dollars.

"If, then, the possession of the deposits did not prevent the contraction and consequent ruin in 1819, why should the removal of the deposits be the cause, under precisely similar circumstances, of the contraction and ruin of 1834."

return from distant whaling voyages, is two and three years; of course, those who embark in the trade, for that time lie out of their investments. Although the whole fisheries have extended to several ports from whence the business had never been carried on before, yet the proportionate increase has probably been greater in New Bedford than any where else. The North American Review gives, "as derived from authentic sources," the estimate that the whole number of ships employed in the whale fishery in the United States, is 392; of which 184, nearly one-half, belong to the single district of New Bedford. The Review continues:

"It would seem to be impossible to stretch the business to any greater extent from this country. In 1824, too great a supply of sperm oil produced a ruinous depression of prices, but the demand was still thought to warrant a steady and gradual increase of the sperm whale fishery. The calculation is now, however, considered by the shrewdest merchants to have been too sanguine, and they already begin to anticipate reverses. The markets for common whale oil are now precarious. They fluctuate with the fortunes of the Greenland fishery, and prices are more or less dependent on the crops and manufacture of the vegetable oil in Europe. While the increase or decrease, therefore, of the sperm whale fishery ought to depend on somewhat certain calculations, the right whale fishery must fluctuate with circumstances."

The prices of sperm oil and spermaceti candles are now as high as ever they were; but the rage for investments in the whale fishery has brought the New Bedford merchants to a sudden stop. The merchants in that town who have recently failed in business—and some of them perhaps already insolvent, but whose deficiency would not appear while there was abundance of paper credit, have gone to the whole extent of that credit in making investments for the whale fishery—some ten, fifteen, twenty, and up to a hundred or more thousand dollars. Their calculation was, as if money never would be scarce, that they can always get money at one bank to pay their debt at another bank, until some three years hence their ships would return. A natural consequence is, that whenever fictitious credit is brought back to a state of solidity, those who negotiate loans in the way described, fail in obtaining means to meet their payments. From this cause a portion of the New Bedford merchants engaged in the whale fishery have failed—not especially because the deposits have been withdrawn from the Bank of the United States, for there is no branch of the bank near New Bedford, but because they have not the means to pay their debts, and because the "shrewdest merchants" understand that their prospective means cannot become available. It is but a few years since—I believe 1824, that the two Nantucket banks suspended payments on account of having loaned a large part of their capital to whalers: these banks were obliged to take in payment for their debts whale and sperm oil and spermaceti candles, and had their agents to sell them in various commercial towns, and they commenced redeeming their notes when they had sold their merchandise. At that time it may be recollected that a portion of the Nantucket whalers were ruined; yet then no deposits were withdrawn from the Bank of the United States. There was great pecuniary distress in the town of Lowell about two years ago. The town seemed to have been "smitten," as the town of New Bedford is now. The reason was, there had been enormous speculations in buildings and building lots, anticipating the growth of that flourishing town. The property, accelerated in price at each successive change, passed from hand to hand, till most of the speculators, having really little foundation, who had not early retired from the contest, were brought up at the same time. The banks would not discount to them; and thus the bubble burst. Lowell was "smitten;" and has not yet entirely recovered. As well may we charge the fall of property and the distress at Lowell to the withdrawal of the deposits which was to take place two years afterwards, as now to charge the embarrassments at New Bedford to the same source. To increase and spread wide as possible the panic at the precise moment when the re-chartering of the bank is to be pressed on Congress, a concerted movement is made by the great manufacturing capitalists at the East. Notice was sometime since given at Lowell, Massachusetts, that the price paid for labor would be reduced on the 1st of March from fifteen to twenty-five per cent.; similar notices are given at Nashua and Dover, in New Hampshire. In other places it is notified that the factories are about to be stopped, and it is mentioned in the newspapers that one large factory, whose stock is understood to be controlled by Philadelphia owners, has been stopped, and the hands dismissed, at New Market, New Hampshire. Other newspapers, in the confidence of the owners, threaten that other factories are to be stopped. The reason now assigned for reducing wages and stopping work is, that the removal of the deposits prevents the sale of the goods manufactured! For a year previous to the removal of the deposits, there was the same talk of stopping the factories; and several of them were stopped. The reason then was the high price of cotton—but now, that cotton has fallen from twenty and eighteen to twelve and ten cents, a different reason must be assigned. The truth is, that the large manufacturing capitalists have been quite too much in the habit of sporting with the fears of the community; and as a body, they have shown themselves much too subservient to the views of the leaders of a political party, to leave them the weight to which otherwise they might be entitled. Why is it, that they are constantly in the field? Why are they, at every session of Congress, aiding in some new project of alarm? Let as many of them stop their works as choose to do it. Suppose half of them, that portion of them that prefer "war, pestilence, and famine," to the natural and quiet death of a moneyed corporation that assumes to be more powerful, with the means of the Government, than the Government itself, shall shut down their gates and stop their machinery; that other portion who mind their own business, and pursue the even tenor of their way, will, in the course of six months or a year, be more prosperous than they have ever before been, and will have no reason to regret the folly of such as change purposes at every turn of the wind. If there be already too many manufactories for the market, why have capitalists up to the present moment invested millions in new establishments? Experience has shown that in this country there cannot be too much agriculture: when has there been a season producing more wheat, or sugar, or cotton, or wool, than could find a market? The price of these articles, in different seasons, fluctuates more or less; but rarely does it happen that the price does not more than cover the expense. If manufactures may not succeed in this country, under all the encouragement the Government has afforded, and is continuing to them, there is ample room for investments in agricultural and other enterprises. Not the West alone, the growth of which during the last twenty, and especially during the last ten years, has been without a parallel; not the West alone, opens the exclusive field for improvement. The hard soil of the Eastern States, improved already perhaps beyond any other section of the country, is capable of more than doubling or trebling its agricultural products; and the most northeastern State, in its immense forests of valuable pine timber, presents scarcely less temptations to the man of enterprise, than the other more luxuriant soils of the South and West.

Mr. President, there never was a time more propitious than the present for the Bank of the United States to commence the "winding up of its concerns." If the directors of the bank understood the true interests of the institution, they would commence the work with alacrity; and they would find that a course of mildness and accommodation would be far more salutary to the bank than the opposite course, which they now are pursuing. This, however, does not seem likely to be the case, from present appearances. Recent advices from the city of New York, leave us to infer that the bank has determined we shall not "have peace—but the sword." The directors of the branch bank at that place have not only refused to unite with the local banks in attempting to relieve the distresses of the community, but they have refused to have it understood that they will not run upon the State banks for specie the moment these last shall discount for the purpose of relieving individuals; and these directors assign, for their belligerent aspect, the reason of their peculiar relations at this time with the Government! Those peculiar relations we are left to infer; and these, we may safely say to be a determination to force the return of the deposits, and with that a re-chartering of the bank. Indeed we have it announced in the known organ of the bank (the National Intelligencer) in this city, that the bank will never consent, either to take any steps for the relief of the community itself, or suffer the State banks to do it, until the State banks selected by the Secretary of the Treasury as places of deposit, shall themselves ask to have the deposits taken from them, and restored to the United States Bank! Here, the people and the State banks have their choice of the only alternative. The State banks must be destroyed, and the distress must be kept up, so long as the means to do it can be furnished by the Bank of the United States; or else the Government, the people, and the State banks, must consent to unconditional submission and degradation. This looks so much like the conditions and requirements of a certain New England conclave twenty years ago, who sent a mission to Mr. Madison, demanding of the Government to submit, unconditionally, to such terms of peace as Great Britain might grant, that I have about as much faith that the one will be attended with success as the other.

I readily and freely admit, that, in the vicinity of the mother bank and its branches, more than common pecuniary distress does now prevail. There they have put on the screws; and where the bank had made extensive loans, the pressure is felt. Where the people have been so fortunate as never to have had the benefits of the bank's capital, there is very little distress. It is the extension of loans and their sudden contraction which produce revolutions in trade. It is the facilities of credit, suddenly caught up, that cause the distress. That the bank can expand or contract—that it can at any time make money plenty or scarce, where it has an extensive operating capital, or where ever it can concentrate its operations, is true; and, being true, furnishes the strong conclusive reason why I would never place the power again in its hands. With the strong expression of the people against the bank, manifested in the triumphant election of General Jackson, I should consider myself a traitor to that people, now to vote in favor of continuing the odious monopoly. Where ever there is a branch of this bank, there we find an attempt to oppress. Ever since the Hegira of Mr. Biddle's attorney-agent from New Hampshire, the business of the branch in that State has been small: from 1829 to 1830, the branch did not do sufficient business to pay the salaries of its officers—that is, the amount of interest on its loans was not enough to pay the salaries of its president, cashier, clerks, and waiters. But the little branch there is contributing its mite to do what the parent bank requires. A recent letter from an intelligent gentleman at that place says:

"You know my great desire is, that the monster which has so long held the purse-strings of the nation should be prostrated, and no longer be permitted to tyrannise over other moneyed institutions. The monster seems, however, determined to die hard, and do all the mischief in its power before it expires—putting on the screws with all its might. Even the little branch here is doing all it can to "make the people feel," as they term it, by withholding discounts and getting hold of the bills of the State banks in this town, and holding them in a menacing attitude, preventing our discounting to the extent we otherwise could."

In the interior of the State, among the mass of the people, but little pressure is felt. The larger portion of these people are men who never ask for a bank favor—who rely at all times on their own resources, and who of course would prefer a hard money currency to any other currency. They do not believe that United States Bank notes are any better as a currency than their own State bank notes; and gladly would they see the flood of paper circulation superseded by silver and gold. Another letter, dated January 21, 1834, from the second manufacturing town in the State, situated on the Merrimack river, forty miles from Boston—and the manufacturing towns are the first in the interior to feel a money pressure—says:

"It is wonderful that the attempts made by the opposition to produce a panic should not have caused more extended ruin. A few failures may have happened in the seaports, but they have only been hastened a few weeks or months, and not caused. If there had been the extensive pressure and distress we hear spoken of, it must, one would think, have extended itself to this place and its vicinity. There is no special pressure here. There is no depreciation of prices, though our market is regulated, in a great measure, by the Boston market, and though the sleighing has been such as to afford the greatest facilities for carrying produce to the markets. Hay is here from $15 to $16 per ton. It is, I am informed, from $20 to $22 at Lowell, [fifteen miles distant.] Wood is $4 per cord here, which is higher than those most skilled in the market calculated it would be last Summer. I was told, a day or two since, that pork had just taken a rise, (to use a common phrase,) and was higher than it has been during the Winter or Fall. Where is this pressure? We feel it not. We hear of it, however, and shrieked forth in such lugubrious tones, that I marvel business should go on here, as it does, in the even tenor of its way."

Another letter, from one of the best informed farmers—and none are more intelligent and shrewd than farmers in New Hampshire—living nearly central in the State, dated so late as the 17th February, says:

"There never was a time, since I can recollect, in which the farmer, mechanic, and the great mass of the people, felt themselves more independent than they do at this time. The most of the people have their debts paid, and cash in their pockets. The markets are good; every thing that the farmer has to dispose of finds a ready market, with a price sufficient to satisfy every reasonable person. The products of the country are at this moment teaming to market in great abundance, and have been for some time, upon our good sleighing, of which we have had abundance this winter. Pork sells from 7 to 8 cents—butter from 16 to 18 cents—cheese from 8 to 10—beef from 5 to 6 dollars per hundred. From this, you will perceive that the pressure upon this section of the country is not severe."

I believe, throughout New England, the condition of the people is as it is in New Hampshire. The reduction of prices in Europe may have had some effect in a few places. I have a letter from Salem, Massachusetts, dated on the 15th January, which says:

"The Biddle screws are not severely felt in Salem, although ours is a trading and commercial community; and the only way in which they can be brought to bear on the interests of the Salem merchants, is through their agents in the great cities. There are eight banks in Salem, and they sustain the trade at the legal rate of interest, six per cent. Where there is a branch of the United States Bank, there will be a pressure. But one merchant has failed in Salem since August last, and the United States Bank did not affect him in his business.

"I sent you, some days since, the annual returns of all the banks in Massachusetts. The capital of these banks exceeds twenty-eight millions of dollars. Our currency in New England, as you well know, has long been well established, and uniform, without the aid of the Bank of the United States. In fact, in New England the Bank of the United States does nothing in aid of the currency; their notes over five dollars are often at a discount, while the country bank notes have been current at par, receivable at the banks in Boston, and of course in every part of the New England States. Neither do the New England States need the United States Bank for capital: their own banks can supply the wants of trade, and answer all the purposes of transmission to or from different parts of the country. The United States Bank has realized a very large amount for premiums on inland bills of exchange."

[On the succeeding day, (Tuesday, March 4,) Mr. HILL resumed, and concluded his speech, as follows:]

On yesterday I examined the report of the Committee on Finance, and attempted to show that neither the facts nor the inferences of that report were sufficient to invalidate the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits. I attempted to show that the allegation is untrue, that efforts are making to array the prejudices of the poor against the rich, to the injury of the bank. I attempted to show that one of the present fast and influential friends of the bank presented, fourteen years ago, such an array of facts and inferences as demonstrate most clearly, that those who then opposed and now support the bank, are condemned from their own mouths. I attempted to show that the present party opposed to the administration, have for a long time been panic-makers, whenever, out of place and power, they could invent any plausible pretext for creating excitement. I attempted to show that the branch bank in New Hampshire, in 1829, and previous, played the same game of expansion and curtailment that is now playing by the mother bank and its branches in all parts of the United States; and that although it succeeded in bringing ruin on some, it failed to make itself popular or acceptable to the people of New Hampshire. I challenged the proof of the charge made by the directors of the bank in their publication of December last, that the "principal chiefs" of the administration had a meeting in this city in 1829, for the purpose of concerting measures to make the bank a political engine; and have disproved that charge so far as strong presumptive evidence could disprove it. I have shown that the bank itself voluntarily put the question of re-charter or no charter on the result of the last Presidential election; that it took this position from choice, and put all its means, without limitation, into the contest, interfering and attempting to influence the elections to the full extent of its ability; and that the bank now stands in the position of that individual who should propose his own terms, make his own bargain; and after he should have availed himself of all the privileges of his own terms, should insist that a decision should go for nothing, because it had been discovered that the right belonged to the other party; and claimed a new trial by a tribunal which the people (the opposite party) never had sanctioned. I have shown that the bank has wantonly, and with malice aforethought, contrived the means which should break up the currency of the country, and destroy the facilities of trade and exchange; and that within the last six months it has premeditated embarrassment and ruin to the trade of the country; that, through distress and suffering, it might force on the people what it could not obtain by a fair use of its capital and influence. I have shown that a great portion of the suffering and pecuniary distress has been caused by overtrading and an inflated paper credit; and that this distress could at any time be produced by the bank, whenever its owners and directors should feel it to be for their interest to bring the distress into operation to further their purposes. I have shown that the pecuniary distress has not been confined to the United States; that it preceded, and was more severe in the British provinces on the North, and in the West Indies, than it is in this country; and that it is even felt to a considerable extent in Great Britain, where a national bank had just been re-chartered: from which facts it may fairly be inferred, either that the present distress would not have occurred at this time if the United States Bank had not wantonly produced it, or that we might have had partial distress, with the exercise of the best disposition on the part of the bank. I have shown that in New England, the sound state of the currency is not at all dependent on the United States Bank—that the local banks there regulate the currency. I have also shown that the prices of the farmers' produce have there been higher within the last two months than they have been at any corresponding period for several years—that where there has been no overtrading, there is no uncommon pecuniary distress; and that the great mass of the community are better off in a pecuniary point of view than they had before been for many years.

These, Mr. President, are some of the points which I on yesterday attempted to establish. I regret not to have been able to finish my remarks then commenced. If my own strength, laboring under indisposition of body, had not been exhausted, I know that a long speech, exhibiting no graces of oratory, and adverting to facts which might be unwelcome to a majority, would surely exhaust the patience of the Senate. I shall detain the Senate not a great length of time, to complete all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. President, the idea of a hard money system meets with no favor from those who contend that a United States bank is a panacea for all evils. Gentlemen may rest assured, that any system of currency that has not hard money for its basis, must fail. It is the essence of money to possess intrinsic value. Money, or a given quantity of gold or silver, is not only the common measure and common representative of all other commodities, but also the common and universal equivalent. Paper currency has, obviously, no intrinsic value. A promissory note, under whatever form, or from whatever source it may issue, represents value. It does so, inasmuch as it is an undertaking to pay, in money, the sum for which it is issued. The money or coin of a country is so much of its capital. Paper currency is no part of the capital of a country. It is so much circulating credit. These propositions, taken from an eminent writer on currency, (Mr. Huskisson,) are axioms established by experience, and will not be disputed.

Now, sir, any attempt to substitute paper currency, which has no intrinsic value as a foundation, in the place of specie, must fail. The Government itself receiving such paper as specie in payment of all its dues, or disbursing it in payment of its debts, cannot long maintain for it a uniform value. The British Government, from stern necessity, authorized the Bank of England to suspend specie payments—in other words, to make its own paper a substitute for gold and silver. The same Government also made it an offence punishable with severe penalties, to melt a guinea weighing more than 5 dwts. 8 grs., or to reduce it, by clipping, filing, or any other process, below that weight. By law, a guinea of that weight could not be exchanged for more than 21s. in Bank of England paper; for to sell them for more, was an offence also highly punishable. What was the consequence of this Government attempt to force a paper standard of money? Mr. Huskisson informs us:

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[MARCH 4, 1834.]

"The state of the law, therefore, is this: the possessor of a heavy guinea, which is intrinsically worth about 24s. 6d. in bank paper, who should exchange it for more than 21s. of that same paper, would be liable to fine and imprisonment. The more fortunate possessor of a light guinea is entitled by law to exchange it for what it will fetch, which would be about 24s. 3d.

"A light guinea, therefore, cried down, no longer current, no longer a legal tender, is, at the present moment, more valuable than a guinea of full weight, in the proportion of 24s. 3d. to 21s.

"The light guinea, by melting, is converted into 5 dwts. 7½ grains of bullion.

"The heavy guinea, being by law incapable of being converted into bullion or of being reduced, by a diminution of quantity, into the more valuable shape of a light guinea, is equivalent to 4 dwts. 14 grs. of gold. The difference of value in favor of the light guinea is 17½ grains of gold."

Such, in Great Britain, was the anomalous state of the currency produced by the attempt to make paper money a substitute for gold and silver. By law it was attempted to fix the guinea as a standard for the irredeemable paper; and this law lessened the value of the perfect guinea one-sixth, or equal to the amount of depreciation of the paper of the bank. The consequence was what may well be supposed—hard money was driven out of the country, and the currency had no uniform intrinsic value. It would not be difficult, Mr. President, to trace back the origin of the present distress to the attempt to make a paper currency a complete substitute for gold and silver. The Bank of the United States, for some purpose, in the year 1832, extended its loans from between forty and fifty millions of dollars to more than seventy millions of dollars. It did not lend specie, nor yet did it lend such ordinary notes payable at the places of issue as were authorized by law: it passed off many millions of paper in the shape of bank notes, but containing really no promise to pay, and which were only a request that the mother bank would redeem them when they were presented. This new paper currency, which did not even possess the redeeming quality of a promissory note, was put into circulation by means of a Treasury order that it might be received in payment of debts due the United States. After it was put in circulation, there was scarcely a probability that the paper would be presented to be redeemed by specie, however great might be the amount put in circulation. For the time, to the Bank of the United States, this paper answered all the purposes of paper issued without liability to specie redemption; for so long as this paper was receivable at all the land offices throughout the great West, and at the custom-houses for duties from one end of the country to the other, there was not the most distant probability that the bank would be called on once a year to redeem with specie one dollar in ten of the amount issued. The managers of the bank soon ascertained that they might issue from ten to twenty millions of this spurious paper—enough to fill up the entire circulation of the West—without a specie foundation, and in addition to their ordinary issues. It was this expansion of paper, in direct violation of the charter, by the Bank of the United States, that has produced overtrading in almost every direction. Reflect, sir, for a moment, what must have been the consequence of a sudden increase of paper circulation by the Bank of the United States of twenty to thirty millions. If the Bank of the United States was so generous, the local banks were obliged to be generous likewise in self-defence. Paper money, for the moment, and until the bubble should burst, was made a complete substitute for gold and silver: no hard money could be wanted when paper facilities, standing in its place, could every where be obtained by the asking. Let us suppose the Bank of the United States had confined itself strictly to the letter of its charter, and issued none of the spurious orders as a money circulation; and that it had never extended its loans beyond fifty millions of dollars, which is fifteen millions of dollars more than its capital: is there a man in the country acquainted with money operations, who can deny that, in such event, much if not all the over trading in the country would have been prevented; and by consequence, that the distresses which now pervade the country as a matter of course, when the bank suddenly and arbitrarily curtails its debts, could not have taken place?

From a statement lately published by the bank commissioners of the State of New York, I find that the united local banks of the three cities of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, (including those in the last-named city only which were subject to the bank-fund law,) with a capital of rising $40,000,000, and loans amounting to $70,000,000, had less than $12,000,000 of bills in circulation—while the United States Bank, with a capital of $35,000,000, and loans amounting to $55,000,000, had bills in circulation amounting to more than $19,000,000. The same statement presents the following table of the capital, circulation, and loans of the local banks of six of the Eastern commercial States, as contrasted with the Bank of the United States, on the 1st January, 1834:

	Capital.	Circulation.	Loans.
Maine -	2,440,000	1,158,350	3,732,583
Rhode Island -	7,112,683	1,208,044	8,550,652
Massachusetts -	28,236,230	7,889,110	46,261,008
Connecticut -	5,708,015	2,557,227	7,425,482
Pennsylvania -	17,061,913	10,366,229	31,520,293
New York -	22,730,264	15,402,707	46,496,492
Bank U. States	35,000,000	19,208,379	54,911,461

The banks in the three cities, with about the same capital as the United States Bank, had, in November, 1832, less than half the amount of paper circulation of the United States Bank, and less than two-thirds of the same bank in January, 1834; and the six States of Maine, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and New York, with a capital of 83 millions, and loans amounting to 143 millions, had only double the circulation of the United States Bank, with a capital of 35 millions, and loans amounting to $55,000,000. Take the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island as a fair sample of the four other States of New England: the banking capital of these two States is a little over 35 millions, the same as the Bank of the United States; their loans are 54,800,000, nearly a million more than the United States Bank, while their paper circulation is nine millions less, and little more than one-half that of the United States Bank. And yet the circulation of the Bank of the United States is less by four or five millions than it had been a year or two since.

If it be true that the pressure of the present time is owing to an overloaded state of the currency—and it will be admitted that the large amount of paper credit has produced overtrading—it must be conceded that the United States Bank has done more than its full share in producing the present state of things.

So far as banks loan capital, their operations are beneficial; but when they extend loans on a created paper currency, pushing that currency beyond its true point, pecuniary revulsions and distresses are sure to follow. The spurious orders or drafts of the Bank of the United States being every where receivable in payment of debts to the Government, have carried the paper circulation of the Bank of the United States far beyond that of the local State banks; and to this paper extension mainly may we attribute that pecuniary distress, which the same bank is enabled to create by suddenly curtailing its discounts.

In this country there is no standard for regulating the amount of paper issues, but the judgment of bank directors. Government cannot here regulate that subject. In New England, where the competition among the banks is great, and where the notes of banks must be redeemed almost as soon as they are issued, there is little danger that any bank will issue beyond what it can redeem. But a monopoly like that of the United States Bank, having its notes every where receivable for debts due to the United States, can issue the paper payable at one branch at a distance from its place of redemption; and this paper will fill up the circulation, for the very reason that it is not worth so much as the local paper. This is the reason why the United States Bank has a greater circulation in proportion to its capital than the State banks.

Mr. President, it is claimed, with an assurance that will not allow of a denial, that the United States Bank has been the great regulator of the currency; that "the old national bank, for twenty years, worked to perfection;" that during an intervening period of five years, public credit became impaired, the revenue defalcated, real and personal property depreciated, and all kinds of business interrupted or embarrassed; and that with the institution of the new bank, these troubles vanished, and for another term of sixteen years the rapid advance of the nation in prosperity has outstripped the most sanguine calculation." This, say the advocates of the bank, is "absolute demonstration" of its utility.

Casting back for twenty-five years, it will be found that facts do not warrant the assumption that the United States Bank has always secured a sound currency. There has been no time since 1790 when the currency of the Eastern States was in a worse state than from 1808 to 1811, when the old national bank might be supposed to have exerted its most potent influence. This bank never had an influence in regulating beneficially the local banks at any time: during the last three years of the old bank, we had such defalcations and swindling among the State banks as we may hope never to witness again. The Farmers' Exchange Bank, the Hillsborough Bank, the Berkshire Bank, the Coos Bank, the Vermont Bank, and many others, were not prevented by the national bank from operations which will long disgrace their authors. And although the war that intervened between 1811 and 1816, when no national bank existed, was accompanied by pecuniary distress, the depreciation of property, and embarrassments in business, yet it must be admitted that during the existence of that war the local State banks were much better managed than they were before the old charter of the Bank of the United States expired, or since the new charter went into operation. The failures of local banks subsequent to 1817 were much more numerous and extensive than they were from 1811 to 1816. And as I have before remarked, the United States Bank itself, had it not been for the helping hand of the Government, would have stopped payment and been in a condition little better than that of the broken State banks, in the year 1819.

If gentlemen will be content that the voice of the people shall rule—if they will consent, as consent they must, that the United States Bank shall go down, to rise no more—they will soon find that the currency of the country cannot be changed for the worse by the death of this bank. Both the currency and the exchange will be in as favorable a position when the national bank is dead as when it is alive. Suppose the notes of this bank no longer receivable for dues to the United States; how much more valuable would be a United States Bank note at New Orleans payable at Boston, than the bill of any local bank payable at the same place? Suppose the ten millions of spurious drafts now in circulation, amalgamated with some hundred kinds of counterfeits, throughout the West, to be discredited, as they ought to be; would they constitute a currency as sound as the genuine notes of the local banks of the West? The truth is, that owing to the circumstance alone of United States Bank notes being receivable at the Treasury, these notes have a general currency in small sums which the local bank notes that are not so received have not. But how easy will it be for any local bank at the South or West to give its notes a currency in Pennsylvania, New York, or New England, by placing funds for their redemption at Philadelphia, New York, or Boston. And how easy at the same points to give the local notes of the Atlantic seaboard a currency, when they are the best article in the world to pay for the purchases that are made in the cities. So long as the vast products of the South and West are vendible either in New York or Boston, or in Europe, so long may exchange be had in abundance at those marts; and so long as those places furnish every species of imported goods that the West consumes, will the balance of trade between the North and the South, the East and the West, be kept up. The facilities to trade will be no less abundant without than with the United States Bank. Let gentlemen suffer the experiment to be made; and one year will not transpire before we shall have ocular demonstration that trade can better regulate itself than can the United States Bank regulate it.

The danger of placing the sole regulation of exchange in one institution is demonstrated by the confusion and embarrassment into which the exchanges between the East, South, and West have been thrown by the secret orders issued by the bank on the 13th August last. The exclusive power over the exchanges which the bank has exercised was given it by its connexion with the government, by the exercise of the functions of a fiscal agent in receiving and disbursing the public money. Now, if the government had had several agents to perform this service instead of one, it never would have been in the power of either to consummate so much mischief, suffering, and misery, as have been produced.

It is complained that if several State banks perform the office of fiscal agents for the government, great evils will result from a want of concert among them. Now, this very want of concert, in my belief, will be a great security against abuse, both to the government and the people. So far as the funds of the government give strength to these several institutions and extend their influence, that strength and influence will be far more salutary while the action of each shall be independent of, than while acting in concert with each other, in whatever relates to the interest of each, separate from the especial interest of the government. While each has its separate interest, and may be said to be put upon its good behaviour, from the knowledge that monopoly is not within its grasp, there will be a guaranty against outrage either on the rights of the people or the government. A concerted attempt to arrest the exchange, to embarrass the whole trade of the country, and to produce universal distress, would not have been made, if the State banks had been employed to do that service which it has been a boon to the Bank of the United States to perform; thereby enabling her to increase her profits and add to her power.

The fact of specie-paying bank notes in North Carolina and other Southern and Western States being at a discount of from three to five per cent. at New York, has been mentioned as a subject of alarm. It ought to be no matter of surprise if the notes of distant banks were even at a greater discount; for, in a healthy and sound state of the currency, the notes of no bank ought to pass at any considerable distance from the place of issue. This, I presume, is the case with the banks of North Carolina and all of the Southern States; none of them ought to be sent for circulation either to Philadelphia or New York. It is entirely unnecessary for merchants at that distance to make remittances to the cities in their local bank notes; they might better remit their own private notes or due bills; because both bank notes and private notes have no intrinsic value; they only represent value, and to represent value truly, they should be very near the point where the value is to be obtained for them. Very few North Carolina bank notes go to Philadelphia at all; and their paucity, together with the difficulty of detecting counterfeits at a distance from their place of issue, and the want of knowledge of their solvency, is good cause of their depreciated value. Did enough of these bills there circulate to have them taken in masses, the interest on the time, and the expense of returning, would constitute all or nearly all the discount.

There would be as much reason to apprehend the breaking up of trade between New York and Liverpool because the bank notes of each place would not pass at or near par at the other place, as that a like calamity will take place because the local bank notes of North Carolina, &c. will not pass at par at Philadelphia. Remittances in neither case are made in bank notes. Money may sometimes be remitted to distant points, but bank notes, the representative of money, never. The merchant of the South purchases goods at Philadelphia or New York, and he makes payment either by shipping cotton or other produce, or purchasing a bill of exchange of some other person, who has sent produce to those places. If there be more goods purchased than there is produce shipped, it is either done on a credit of six months or a year, until more produce can be shipped, or the balance must be paid in money, not in the local bank notes of Alabama, or the branch bank notes of the United States, issued from and made payable at Mobile—for local notes and United States Bank notes of that tenor would be alike exceptionable—but in gold or silver. If paid in bank notes, it must come to the gold and silver at last, by being sent back to their place of issue; and just in proportion to the time and expense of their transmission will be the discount on the notes. If the notes of specie-paying banks in North Carolina may be obtained at five per cent. discount at Philadelphia, the North Carolina man might add much to his profits by shipping his produce to Philadelphia, selling it, and with the avails of those sales buying up the depreciated bills. Taking them hence, he would obtain the intrinsic value, and save his five per cent., if his object were solely to turn his produce into money; so that what would be the loss to the man first passing the bank note, would be gain to the man taking and returning it to the bank; and here the business would end, with as much gain as loss to the citizen of North Carolina, while the bank would have the benefit of the credit during the time the note was absent.

Sir, the President of the United States has been called a tyrant, robber, plunderer, usurper, for having been instrumental in changing the depositories. To prove that the Executive has no power over the keeping of the public money, it is assumed that the clause of the bank charter which gives the Secretary of the Treasury the unqualified right to change the place of deposit is without meaning; and from this construction of the law, the inference is drawn that the Executive usurps a power which did not belong to it. Gentlemen take it for granted that the direction of the public money is not in the Executive Government, but in the will of a money corporation, controlled by men who are not responsible to the people. From time immemorial, it seems to have been the policy of a party in this country to wrest the power from the people. Legislative power has been claimed for judges appointed for life, by contending for extended jurisdiction to all cases where they choose to interfere. But a glorious opportunity now presents for wresting the whole power of the Government from the people: the Bank of the United States will relieve them from all further trouble about Government. Already this bank assumes to be the judge of the duties of the public officers chosen by the people. So late as the 23d of January, Nicholas Biddle writes to the Secretary of War, in relation to the payment of pensions, under the act of Congress of June 7, 1832, as follows: "Having thus ascertained that these directions emanated from the highest authority claiming the power to give them, the board of directors have proceeded to consider how far they would be justified in conforming to them," &c. And who are these directors that "proceeded to consider" and judge of the power of a branch of the Executive to control the disbursement of an appropriation placed by law under the special direction of that branch of the Government? The Government directors surely had no participation in this sitting for judgment on the Executive; for we have had no Government directors, or only one, since the first of January. They are twenty irresponsible men, representatives of foreigners owning stock in the bank, of Baring, Brothers, and Company, of Sir William Keppel, general in his Britannic majesty's forces, of Sir Marmaduke Warren Peacock, lieutenant general, &c., who assume to sit in judgment on the Executive, and gravely decide that the Secretary of War shall not be permitted to control, according to the terms of the law, the appropriations for the payment of the pensions. They are men totally unknown to the people, and to whom no power has been delegated by the people. Even had the Secretary of War mistaken his duty in regard to the appropriation, what right had these men to sit in judgment upon him? But how do they challenge the public reprobation when the fact is considered that they would have just as much right to claim as their property the money of the Government, as to deny the use and custody of the public property when the Government shall call for it. Well has the Attorney General demonstrated that "the refusal of the bank and its president to comply with that order was a breach of trust, and a violation of its duty to the Government," and that "the refusal of the bank to deliver over the books and papers belonging to this agency is a still more palpable breach of the duty which results from the subordination of the agent to his principal."

Encouraged by justification of all its acts on the floor of Congress, there is no assumption that the bank does not seem ready to undertake. Not only does it assume to control the currency of the country, making money plenty or scarce by expansion or contraction of its credit and issues—pressing on one section to whom it owes vengeance, and dispensing favors at other points where its suppliant advocates have earned them—not only does it take the currency into its keeping—but its "board of directors proceed to consider" in what method the Government shall act—in what manner legislative appropriations submitted entirely to Executive discretion shall be disbursed; and these men take on themselves the power of deciding, that if the Bank of the United States shall not be the agent for making payments to the soldiers of the Revolution, no payments shall be made. The withholding of the books and papers which were furnished by the War Department, and which are the property of the Government, can be justified on no principle of right acknowledged in any civilized country: the age of feudal barbarism may furnish parallel breaches of trust, where force has stood in the place of law; but never, in any Government of laws, has a mere corporation with impunity attempted to stand in the place of the Government, or to instruct the Government what are its appropriate duties. Talk of tyranny, usurpation, plunder, and robbery! Who is the tyrant and usurper, but the bank that attempts to hold on to that which does not belong to it, for the purpose of preventing the Government from disbursing the public money in its own way? And how much better than plunder and robbery is that secret exercise of power by the bank which attempts to force the representatives of the people to concede all its wishes through the public distress which it is able to produce? Do those who are continually magnifying the importance and necessity of the Bank of the United States reflect that, in the midst of all the present misery and suffering, this same United States Bank still exists, with her original amount of thirty-five millions of capital? If the existence of this bank be of such consequence to our pecuniary welfare, why does it not afford pecuniary relief? There cannot be a doubt that this bank has been the guilty cause of that overtrading which produces distress, by expanding its credit and its issues; and what prevents the bank from affording at the moment all that relief which is in its power? Is it, that having failed in every other experiment, and finding the people opposed to a re-charter, the bank is now determined to force its object through distress and ruin? What right have the stockholders of this bank to force a continuance of the charter? Because they have had the immense privilege twenty years, does it follow that they are entitled to it forever? The credit system, Mr. President, principally through the aid of this institution, has been blown up to an immense bubble, and sooner or later, that bubble must burst. Look through the country, and see how the means of men have been magnified on mere credit. The man who is worth a hundred thousand, and even a million, has overtraded not less than the man of ten thousand, or one thousand, or he who was worth nothing when he commenced. In some communities, the whole mass of trading men have gone into debt two or three times as much as they are worth. By temptation in the prospect of gain, the man of a hundred thousand extends his operations to half a million, or a million; and the man of a million hesitates not to increase his two and three-fold that amount. The joint stock companies, with millions of nominal capital, are increasing in numbers, and the passion for gambling in these stocks is as strong as that of the successful player of loo or brag. I have often been surprised, in passing through the country, to see with what facility enterprises requiring large sums of money are undertaken by persons whom I had supposed to be possessed of small means. In one place I see a cotton or woollen factory spring up almost in a day, with a capital of one, two, or five hundred thousand dollars, all the owners of which together are not worth the tenth of its cost. This concern will go along in good times, so long as the article it produces bears a high price, and will sell for cash; but it exists purely on credit, generally on such paper facilities as are afforded by a bank—and the moment times change, down goes the whole establishment. In another place, I see hundreds of men at work on a canal or rail-road, whose stock in the principal cities is kept up by the constant excitement of speculation; and this stock has for its foundation a paper credit. I get on board a new and elegant steamboat, whose cost is eighty or a hundred thousand dollars: this runs perhaps in opposition to others of equal cost, on the same line; I ask if the owners are likely to be remunerated for their investment; and am told that when this boat shall have run the others off the line, it will be good property. This speculation also is founded on paper credit obtained from the banks. It is this state of things that is now taken advantage of by the Bank of the United States. Were there no forced speculations, the situation of this country is such, that a forced and unnatural curtailment of credit must produce distress; for in all newly-settled communities, a large portion of labor is expended necessarily, not for present subsistence, but for such improvements as may be denominated permanent capital: the labor of clearing forests, erecting buildings, making fences, &c., may be included in this class. Hence it is, that newly-settled countries are always in debt beyond the present means of payment. The Bank of the United States has blown up the bubble of paper credit, and this paper credit has caused overtrading, and investments in a great variety of splendid projects; and it now curtails its enormous loans, made two and three years ago for the purpose of enticing the public favor, in such rapid ratio, as shall drive the community to beg the privilege of taking upon them the yoke of the bank! Millions can, and will be expended by the bank to obtain a re-charter. The foreigners who own a large portion of the stock, can afford to pay it—for the moment the bank is re-chartered, the stock rises fifty per cent. We know that many thousands have been expended to corrupt the public press, and to spread that kind of information which is calculated to poison public opinion. I am told that the expedient has lately been resorted to of buying up the stock of those State banks which have been selected as the deposite banks, with the avowed purpose of so controlling them that they shall ask of the Government that the deposites may be taken from them and given back to the United States Bank. Our last advices from the city of the bank are, that we shall have nothing but agitation, agitation, agitation—that we are to have “no peace, but a sword,” until the deposites shall be restored, and the bank shall be re-chartered.

That eminent organ and advocate of the bank, at its very door, Robert Walsh, so late as Saturday last, thus issues the new declaration of war which the bank intends waging, until its object shall be gained:

“The struggle [that is, all the appliances of the means of the bank to produce pecuniary distress] for the republican system, the constitution, the laws, and the currency, will be continued in Congress, and throughout the Union, with all the resolution and perseverance which the defence of such interests inspires and prescribes.”

In all former times there has been nothing in the history of this Government that has equalled the present experiment of the bank, in shameless effrontery, and recklessness of means to the accomplishment of its purposes.

I have said that the Bank of the United States is the cause of the existing evils. The unparalleled expansion of its paper credits and issues during a few months near the time it applied to be re-chartered, followed by the late sudden curtailment of one-half and two-thirds of its whole debts, at points where the business was most active—as at Nashville and Boston—is ample demonstration of the truth of my position. What could be expected from such a course but ruin and distress? The greater activity and prosperity of business, the more intense must be the suffering. And do we not find the bank applying its instruments of torture at those points where there was the greatest amount of business? Add to this, the secret manœuvre of the bank to cut off or dam up the usual channels of exchange by which money and funds had been transmitted from one part to the other. Whatever of evil has resulted, it may in truth be said that this bank has been the author of it all; and that it has done what no other corporation ever did before—wantonly designed the ruin of men of business and the distress of the whole community. If there were not other and more powerful measures for putting an end to such an institution, this reason alone would be sufficient.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILKINS] has shown that Mr. Biddle knew full well what would be the effect of his course of conduct. By granting the small favor of fifty thousand dollars in 1825, the panic was then stayed and the banks were saved from destruction. Yet, Mr. Biddle has been unable to show that when he had the very best intentions, this bank was able to prevent extended bankruptcy in the country. In the years 1825 and 1826, the commerce and business of the country was in a more alarming condition than it now is. The price of cotton fell at that time from 30 and 25 to 13, 10, and 8 cents. There was a wide-spread dismay. This was produced by overtrading in Europe, producing overtrading in this country; and not all the credit and resources of the Bank of the United States could prevent it.

Again in 1828–9, after the passage of the tariff law for the encouragement of manufactures, ruin and distress prevailed among the manufacturers of the Eastern States; the stock fell down to less than half of its original cost, and the panic became general. This resulted from unwise legislation inviting supplies of manufactured goods from abroad which we had the abundant ability to furnish at home. Yet, then the credit and means of the Bank of the United States were not extended to prevent the evil.

From these three instances it will be seen, that although in one case the Bank of the United States is positively the author of the evil, in the two others, where it was not the direct cause, the same bank either had not the power, or failed to exercise it, of preventing the evil.

It is becoming abundantly evident, that the cry of distress that comes in here from different parts of the country, is made in most cases in answer to the signals that the cry is wanted from this place: the simultaneous petitions "without distinctions of place," differing only in time, as the mail has to travel a shorter or a longer distance, coming from the banks and from the exertions of those dependent on banks, furnish abundant evidence that the whole machinery is moved by a central directory;—nay, the very language of the petitions and remonstrances and resolutions is in most instances a literal copy of that made use of on the floor of either House of Congress in favor of the bank. The bank likewise follows faithfully in the path pointed out from this place; it carries at once into execution whatever alarm is raised here. If I have not mistaken the signs of the last week, an experiment is next to be made on some of the State banks in a certain quarter. A run is probably contemplated on some of them that have not signified their adhesion to the United States Bank, that the predictions here that State banks cannot be relied on, may be verified.

A display of petitions in favor of the bank is made almost every day. And it is here worthy of remark, that after all the efforts that have been made on the commercial and trading places, much the largest petition from the city of New York has come in against the restoration of the deposits. How are the petitions got up? At the instigation of the bank itself. That same fund, consisting in part of the money of the people of the United States, is put in requisition to pay persons for travelling the rounds to procure the signatures of men and boys, and in some instances, as is asserted, females, asking, either or both, that the deposits may be restored and the bank may be re-chartered, mixed with a due proportion of complaints of distress and ruin—that same fund is put in requisition for this purpose, that is so profusely poured out to pay for the printing of hundreds of thousands of speeches, pamphlets, and newspapers, impugning the motives and calling down vengeance upon the Executive head of the Government. Yet, with all the exertions that are made for this object—with all the noise made by the parade of committees and individuals sent here to overawe the constituted authorities—how few are the numbers whose names came up here in favor of the bank? Not one in a hundred—nay, scarcely one of a thousand of the United States. The local banks are everywhere—no, not all of them, for there are several local banks within my knowledge already that have refused to obey the orders which have been sent them—the local banks are petitioning for the restoration and re-charter. Do these local banks, even when they act freely and without the influence of the threat of the mammoth that they can at any time be crushed—do these local banks speak the sentiments of the people? Far from it. These banks, in their aggregate or corporate capacity, in the State I represent, are directly opposed to the voice of the people: of the twenty-four banks in New Hampshire, there are not more than two, a major part of whose stock is owned or controlled by friends of either the State or National administrations; and yet all the recent elections have shown those friends as nearly two to one of the opposite party. The more substantial men in the country, the owners and tillers of the soil—the men of surest means and most substantial wealth—are naturally jealous of all banks, and therefore it cannot be supposed they will readily enter into those mercenary considerations which most influence aggregate bank corporations. This is the reason why the larger portion of bank capital is owned and controlled by persons who are not supporters of the present administration.

As a general rule, every banking institution ought to wind up its concerns at the expiration of its charter. For what other object than this is a charter limited as to time? Not the people alone, but the stockholders themselves, have an interest in looking to the bottom of the Bank of the United States. If the charter shall be continued, how can they ever see the bottom? The case of the Essex Bank, in Massachusetts, occurs to me as one somewhat in point. Of that bank, many years ago, William Gray, long esteemed the most wealthy, as he was one of the most upright merchants in the country, was president; the directors and principal stockholders were men of the first character. The stock of the bank, having all along furnished the usual dividend, was supposed to be intrinsically not less valuable than the best stock in the State. The cashier of the bank, with one of the directors, had had pretty much the entire management of this bank. One of these persons absconding, about the time the concerns of the bank were to be wound up, suspicion was excited, and the discovery was soon made, that what between the speculations and wants of the two delinquents and the fair dividends that had been made to the stockholders, there was not a dollar of the original capital stock left; nay, the very special deposits of gold that were here made, as a place of the greatest safety, had been abstracted, and inferior metals, to represent its weight, had been placed in the vault in its stead.

The extraordinary pertinacity with which the bank clings to a determination to be re-chartered, going for this object to the length that it would involve the country in ruin, rather than fail in its object, is calculated to leave a suspicion that those who are in the secret of the true condition of the bank, do not intend that the people or the stockholders ever shall know what is at the bottom of its transactions. Certain it is, that no other institution in this country has ever openly made use of its means with less regard to propriety and to its own purity of character. The world has been made acquainted with its acts of turpitude generally by accident. Much undoubtedly remains behind, that if unfolded would still more disgust the moral sense of the community. It is due to an insulted people, whose means and whose money have been made use of for base purposes, against their consent, that the charter of this bank should be suffered to expire, and that its whole concerns should be settled up before any other national bank shall be even talked of.

It has been said by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. TILLY,] that the bank has been "lawlessly put to death by the Executive;" and this has been done by the exercise of that power which the law gives to the Secretary of the Treasury for the withdrawal of the deposits. I deny both the fact and the inference. The bank has not been unlawfully deprived of any thing given it by law, nor has it been put to death at all. The bank exists at this time, and will live out the full term of its charter, except a scire facias shall be sued out against it—in which case, if it should meet its deserts, there can be scarcely a doubt, without the aid of the Virginia doctrine of unconstitutionality, that an end will at once be put to its charter.

How can those gentlemen who insist that the bank, and the bank alone, is necessary to the stability of the credit and currency of the country, look about them and present exaggerated reports of the derangement of the currency, as evidence to support their proposition? The bank still exists, having its full amount of capital, no part of which has yet been withdrawn by the stockholders. Not only does the bank exist, but it is exerting all its franchises, with no less activity now than at any former time. If it has immense power to do good—to establish a sound currency, and support public and private credit—has it not likewise power to do great evil—to break up the currency, and to destroy public and private credit? And if at any time the bank has been actuated by the spirit of good, does not every event now passing before the people of the United States, prove that it is now actuated by the spirit of evil? The bank is exerting its utmost power to create distress, that a distressed people may be found to acknowledge the necessity of its existence: now if the bank were out of existence, the existence of the distress might be an argument in its favor—but being still alive, and the distress existing at the same time, it may be inferred that we shall be no more exempt from evils with than without the bank.

There are other causes for distress than the hostile attitude assumed by the bank on account of the withdrawal of the deposits. In ordinary times, the change from credit to cash duties on imports, provided by the tariff act of 1832, would be sufficient to produce a money pressure in all the places where goods are extensively imported. The changes made by that act, by the introduction of cash duties and short credits, has increased the demand for money, in the city of New York alone, since the 3d of March last, the time when the act took effect, between ten and twelve millions of dollars. The long credits formerly given on the tea duties, it is well known, for years furnished the extensive tea speculators with capital to carry on business: sales were made at once, and so much money was kept in advance of the payment of the duties as to furnish the capital for purchasing future cargoes at Canton. The credits under the former tariff averaged eight months—under that of 1832, the average credit would be scarcely three months, including about one-fourth of the duties on which no credit is allowed. This change requiring double payments of duties for the term of one year after the law went into operation, would necessarily derange the money operations at the places of importation. The United States Bank selected this peculiar time to commence and carry on a curtailment of its accommodations; and it keeps up these curtailments, not in a spirit to relieve the pressure which the change in the tariff has produced, but refuses all concert of action with the State banks to afford relief: it even refuses a proposition to be passive while the State banks shall extend that relief which they can only safely grant while they may rest under the assurance that the United States Bank will not unnecessarily run upon them for specie. The removal of the deposits furnishes no apology for this hostile attitude of the bank towards the merchants, many of whom are forced to place themselves in whatever position the bank shall command them to take. At some of the places of holding distress meetings, measures have been taken to report the names of all such men of business as refused to sign the memorials to future meetings. This has been done for the purpose of intimidation. We shall soon see whether the New York committee appointed to effect an amicable arrangement between the State banks and the United States Bank, will dare report the fact that the latter absolutely refuses to unite in any measure which shall relieve the wants of the commercial men of that city.

Sir, looking through the vista of the last forty years, when has been the time that the men of our principal towns, who have made enormous wealth by commercial or other moneyed speculations, as a body, have not shown the utmost indifference to the public rights, when the nation had great difficulties to encounter? How was it with these men, as a class, in Mr. Jefferson's time, when the repeated outrages of France and Great Britain on the sacred rights of the American flag, rendered an embargo necessary? How was it, in Mr. Madison's time, when that war was declared which alone saved the nation from disgrace and ruin, and which forced the most potent powers on earth to acknowledge us to be their equal? Has it not always been the policy of the party which is now pressing for the restoration of the deposits, and through that the renewal of the bank charter, to sacrifice independence and principle at the shrine of money? And has not this party at all times made the most noise before the public—has it not, in every exigency, flooded Congress with petitions like those which have been presented from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and elsewhere, predicting and threatening distress and general ruin? And the worst complexion of this party generally has been; that their most strenuous exertions have been directed to bring about the very things they have predicted. "We are in the midst of a revolution." The gladiator, who deals blow for blow, might say—

"Thy wish was father, Harry, to that thought."

I stand merely on the defensive, and impute to no man such motives. But are the words very far from truth? We are in the midst of attempts at revolution; for a recharter of the bank would be a revolution—a revolution of our government from freedom to the worst sort of tyranny. If the bank can succeed in its endeavors, we are no longer a free people. Better that the pressure, were it ten times worse than the most exaggerated accounts make it, should long continue, than that the spirit of freedom should succumb, in despair, to be crushed by the bloated and relentless Juggernaut.

From such a view, Mr. President, I turn with pleasure to the intelligent yeomanry of the country—to the men who now constitute the democracy that elected Andrew Jackson, in spite of the appeals to avarice—in the face of the threats of ruin and distress which were to follow the veto of the bank charter. That intelligent yeomanry have ever been true to themselves when surrounded by peril, or when aroused by the suspicion that the enemies of liberty were insidiously undermining its citadel.

The State I have the honor to represent has sent few resolutions here: especially have not the party friendly to the administration at any time troubled either House of Congress with complaints of grievances, either feigned or felt, or with requests for public money to be expended for their benefit. They have contributed their full share of all the money that has come into the Treasury; but small and trifling has been their portion of the amount that has been disbursed from the Treasury. They send here no resolutions, but, as an offset for other resolutions, I will ask liberty to call the attention of the Senate to the resolutions which were adopted by the affirmative voice of nine Senators (being three-fourths of that body) and one hundred and thirty-nine Representatives (being about two-thirds of that body) in the New Hampshire legislature, June 24, 1831:

"Resolved, That, inasmuch as our bill of rights guarantees to the people of this State 'the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign, and independent State,' that the authorities of this State 'forever hereafter shall exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right pertaining thereto, which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled,' we consider all appropriations by the Congress of the United States of the public money for roads and canals, or other objects of mere internal local improvement, to be a violation of both the constitutions of the United States and the State of New Hampshire; and that in behalf of the people of this State, we renewedly express our approbation of the act of the President, placing his veto on the bill appropriating money to aid in making a road in the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That the people of the United States have never granted any express power to Congress to charter the Bank of the United States. That, with Thomas Jefferson, we consider such an institution, controlling the funds and the money operations of the Government, to be 'one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our constitution'—that we deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, 'possessing in time of war the power to dictate to the nation the peace it should accept, or to bankrupt the Government by withdrawing its aid.' Equally do the republican members of the New Hampshire legislature protest against the admission, that the people of this State have ever expressly granted to the Congress of the United States the power to locate a branch of that bank within the limits of this State, whose specie funds and other estate shall be here placed beyond the reach of State taxation, and possessing a monopoly of privileges which may enable such a bank to swallow up or annihilate every local moneyed institution in the State, at any trying emergency.

Resolved, That this convention disapproves the conduct of the ultra party in relation to the tariff of 1828—that the protection and prosperity of the domestic industry and manufacturing capital of the North, does not require the oppression of the agriculturists and planters of the South—that it is our belief the manufacturing interests do not require such an imposition of taxes upon imported articles as shall raise a revenue more than is necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government—that it is the wish of the people of this State, after the public debt shall be discharged, that the duties on importations shall be reduced, first upon such articles of necessary consumption as do not come in competition with our own manufactures, and afterwards gradually upon such articles as may be manufactured within our borders, so that there may be a monopoly in no one species of production, and all interests may be equally protected.

Resolved, That while this convention disapproves the doctrine that any State has the right forcibly to resist a law of the United States, it is equally averse to the doctrine of consolidation of all power in the Government of the United States, contended for by the ultra party; that the State of New Hampshire views with jealousy and distrust the disposition which has been manifested by the leaders of that party, that the United States Judiciary shall assume power which belongs only to the States—power which has never been expressly granted by the people of this State to any other tribunal than to their own legislative and judicial tribunals. It is the belief of this convention that there is a redeeming power in the whole people of the United States, fully adequate to stop and ultimately to prevent all encroachments on State rights; and that the idea should never for a moment be indulged, that any State may alone become umpire, 'shoot madly from its proper sphere' in the great system of the Union, and thus rashly dissolve one of the 'sacred ties' which connect it in its several parts. The excellent sentiment of our President on this subject is worthy to be engraven on every American heart: 'The Union of the States—it must be preserved.'

These resolutions, expressing the voice of a large majority of the citizens of that State, as decidedly manifested at every election since, and including the year 1829, were framed and passed about one year before the question of re-chartering the Bank of the United States was agitated in the last Congress. I took my seat here in December, 1831; and since that time, as they had been for many years before, the doctrines of these resolutions have been my guide. Whenever I shall deviate from them in any vote given here, I may well deserve the imputation of being unfaithful to the constitution, and to the people whose voice has sent me here. The resolutions, it is believed, cover the whole ground of dispute between the friends and the enemies of such an administration as the voice of the people has willed. They contain the principles which the President has intended to enforce in the measures he has recommended.

The people of my State, at every successive election, have sanctioned the veto of the President on the Maysville road bill, and thus declared that Congress has not the constitutional power to make appropriations for roads and canals, or any other mere object of local improvement.

The same people have sanctioned the veto of the President on the bill re-chartering the Bank of the United States, believing that institution to be "one of the most deadly hostility existing against the principles and form of our constitution," inasmuch as it possesses, "in time of war, the power to dictate to the nation the peace it should accept, or to bankrupt the Government by withdrawing its aid;" and inasmuch as, in time of peace, it has proved itself of sufficient power to agitate the whole country, to break in upon the foundations of its great business, and to threaten its entire mercantile relations with derangement and ruin.

The same people have sanctioned all honest efforts to reduce the taxes on imports, and have discountenanced the idea that our agriculture and manufactures can thrive and flourish only when the Government shall secure to them a domestic monopoly by oppressive taxation. As they have opposed high taxes for protection, so they are opposed to those profuse expenditures which render high taxes necessary. They have seen, not without regret, the disposition of the two last Congresses to increase the public expenditures; they believe that millions are little better than thrown away which have been appropriated to objects of professed improvement; they do not believe it necessary for the welfare or prosperity of the District of Columbia, in addition to the immense amount paid in salaries and improvements of the public property, that there should be from five hundred thousand to a million of dollars annually appropriated to keep in repair or build her roads, bridges, and canals; they do not believe that two or three hundred thousand dollars should be appropriated annually for the benefit of printers employed to oppose and vilify the people's President and the people's administration. In short, the people of New Hampshire have often expressed, and they will continue to express, the opinion that the General Government should confine its action to the objects specified in the constitution; that strict economy should be exercised in the public expenditures; that no taxes should be imposed for protection, believing that community the best protected which is the lightest taxed.

The same people have ever looked upon the two extremes—extremes which seem recently to have embraced each other—of consolidation on the one hand, and nullification of the constitution on the other, with equal abhorrence and disgust. They believe there is a redeeming power in the ballot-boxes of our country, in the intelligence and good sense of the whole people of the United States, not only to furnish a corrective for all encroachments on State rights, but to secure the execution of laws constitutionally enacted, whenever any minor body of the people shall attempt to resist them.

George Washington saved his country by his great prudence and forecast, especially in the winter of 1776-7, when a general despondency had taken hold of the people, and when, almost destitute of means, and with but the skeleton of an army, composed of men reduced to skeletons by privation and suffering, he planned and executed the glorious victory of the 25th December, at Trenton.

Removal of the Deposits.—Philadelphia Resolutions.

[SENATE.]

Andrew Jackson also grasped the drowning honor of his country—shall I say, saved his country from impending ruin—by his prudence and forecast—by that mighty energy of mind which could create the means where the most of human kind would deem it impossible, and which, stilling the clamors and caballing of treachery, converted a mass of the most incongruous materials into a formidable bulwark of defence; and, what is still more matter of wonder, from these materials furnished the means of annoyance and death to an attacking army, which was the flower and pride of the enemy, in the great victory at New Orleans, January 8, 1815.

George Washington preserved the Union from the incendiary machinations of the eastern foes to our republican confederacy, terminating in the abortive treason of the Hartford Convention, by that immortal legacy which enjoined it as our duty to "frown indignantly on the first dawning of any attempt to alienate one portion of the country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which bind its several parts."

Andrew Jackson also preserved the Union against the attempts of fomenters of mischief at the South, who, seizing the occasion of supposed oppression, taught an honest, but deluded people, that no allegiance was due to the constitution of our National Government: he saved it, by energetically and promptly practising, in the winter of 1832, on the sentiment first uttered from his own lips, and which has since been responded by millions of freemen. "The Union: it must be preserved." The bold and resolute stand which he then took, caused a fearful trembling among those who had threatened breaking down the confederacy, and forced them to retreat ingloriously from the field, under the cover of a fire from those who had been the source of their complaints, and finally into the very arms of the party which had been the authors of the oppression of which they complained.

Thomas Jefferson, by his example and his doctrine, restored the constitution to its true reading, and expelled the corruption and abuse of power which a party in this country, obtaining an ascendancy, have been wont to exercise: he confined the operations of the General Government to its legitimate purposes: he opposed lavish appropriations and unnecessary expenditures: he was an enemy to high taxation, and to interference with the rights reserved to the States: he invariably removed from office those imbibed partisans who opposed his administration, and the popular principles of the country. He considered a national bank to be an institution of "the most deadly hostility" to "the principles and form of our constitution;" and had a bill, chartering the bank, passed both Houses of Congress, there cannot be a doubt he would have placed upon it his veto. For his strict democratic principles, for his enthusiastic attachment to the rights of the people, for his strong and lasting hatred to oppression of all kinds, no man has been more abused and vilified than was the illustrious apostle of American liberty.

Andrew Jackson, under a system of increased corruption, has again attempted and is now laboring to restore the constitution to its original reading. He has set his face against corruption and abuse of power. He would confine the public expenditures to the legitimate objects of the constitution. He would relieve the people from unnecessary taxation, and he would prevent all encroachments on State rights. He has removed from office some of the imbibed partisans who deride his principles and his administration. Better than all, he has had the moral courage to take upon himself the sole responsibility of vetoing the charter of a bank of the United States, and has thus preserved the country from that blighting curse, a moneyed corporation, "possessing in time of war the power to dictate to the nation the peace it should accept," and in peace the power at any time to produce extended pecuniary distress. And scarcely less than was the illustrious apostle of liberty is the name of Andrew Jackson held up to reproach by the party which has ever been opposed to free principles.

More than either Washington or Jefferson has Andrew Jackson been successful in his administration of the department of foreign relations; there is no government of the world having intercourse with our own, that does not repose in him all the respect that is due to upright expectations and honest intentions; and his known decision of character has aided the peculiar situation of this country to procure those concessions of right for his administration which had been denied to all others; and truly may it be said, that not only has Jackson filled the place in the field and the cabinet of both Washington and Jefferson, but that he has gone beyond them both in securing for the nation the confidence and respect of all the principal kings, princes, and potentates of the world. Hereafter shall his fame be transcended by but few men whose deeds have shed lustre upon their species.

TUESDAY, MARCH 4.

PHILADELPHIA RESOLUTIONS.

The CHAIR communicated the proceedings of, and resolutions adopted at, a town meeting in Philadelphia, of a large number of its citizens, who describe themselves friendly to the administration, and opposed to the United States Bank, but remonstrating against the removal of the public deposits, as impolitic, unjust, and in violation of the public faith; and ascribing the pecuniary embarrassments of the country to that measure.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. McKEAN moved that they be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that they be printed, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY, before the question was taken, wished to make a few observations on the subject. These resolutions and proceedings, he said, emanated from a large meeting of the real, genuine, and practical friends of General Jackson, as would be seen on referring to them, and we have been told, said he, by the public prints, that the assemblage amounted to several thousand. He had hoped that, considering the quarter from whence the memorial came, that some friend of the administration would have got up; and he expressed his satisfaction that one memorial, at least, had come from the exclusive friends of their party. It has hitherto been said, that all the agitation on this question was a party movement, intended to operate against the administration; but he trusted that gentlemen would now acknowledge that this memorial, in addition to others, gave sufficient evidence that this was not a party question.

Here we see, said Mr. C., as the proceedings will tell us, the pure, genuine, and unadulterated friends of General Jackson, memorializing Congress on this all-absorbing question, and speaking of their grievances, with their hopes and wishes for redress; and yet we see them about to be referred, without any notice, any remark from the friends of the administration, or any answer to the cries of distress which the memorialists convey. He had listened with great pleasure to the reading of the memorial, and was pleased to find that, notwithstanding the extent of the attachment professed for the Executive, the memorialists were opposed to the measures which had produced so much embarrassment and distress. He was pleased, also, to find that the memorialists understood the inevitable consequences of the Executive measures, the establishment of another and a more capacious bank on the ruins of the present one. After such declarations as these, coming from the immediate friends and supporters of the Executive, he trusted that no Senator would rise in his place, and say that the memorials pouring in upon us daily, notwithstanding all the evidences to the contrary, were got up for political effect; and hoped they would believe that the ultimate object of them was to arrest that course of proceeding which had resulted in such ruinous consequences. The memorialists, it seemed, well understood the subject on which they appealed to the Congress of the United States. Was there a candid man in the country who would say, that, with at least five hundred State banks, with twenty-four States who have the right to establish as many banks in addition as they please, and three Territories, Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan, about to be admitted into the Union, who will have the same rights, with twenty-seven State Governments then, who will have the right to establish banks at will, when it is recollected that in the times of the old Bank of the United States there was not one bank in ten to what there is now; with all this, he said, will any candid man pretend to say, that the Government of the United States can get along without a national bank?

Would any one say, after what we have witnessed—ruinous scenes of distress, worse than the devastations of an invading army—that we can get on without a national bank? No! After years of suffering, gentlemen would get up and say, that their experiment had not been worked out, and they would propose a bank in a certain street and a certain city he had before named; and if the statute of limitation, to which he had alluded, as to political opinions, should not be rescinded, such a proposition would no doubt be supported by gentlemen now opposed to a bank. He had made these few observations because the memorial, coming from the source it did, was about to be referred, without one single remark, without one word expressive of satisfaction from the friends of the administration.

Mr. McKEAN rose, and said that the gentlemen who had signed this memorial were certainly of the first respectability. But, as the proceedings had not been committed to his charge, but had been communicated through the Vice-President, he did not consider himself specially called on to say anything in reference to them. He believed that the gentlemen who had prepared the memorials had taken time to frame their opinions, and possessing, as they did, much ability, and having taken pains to make the expression of their sentiments succinct and comprehensive, they had, doubtless, done this better than he could have done it. Even the ability of the gentleman from Kentucky could not have thrown much new light on the subject. He would say nothing more.

Mr. GRUNDY observed, that he had hitherto abstained from saying any thing on the subject of these memorials, so many of which had been presented to the Senate. When they shall all have been received, referred, and acted on in committee, we shall, said he, then have the opportunity to weigh them well, and give to them that disposition which the Senate shall decide upon. This course he would pursue, as far as he was concerned. His object, therefore, in rising, was to give his opinion on only one point. These memorialists seemed to apprehend that there is a design to transfer the Bank of the United States from Philadelphia to New York. Now, as far as he knew, and he spoke only of what he did know, there was no such design in contemplation. He would say now, what he should always say on this subject, that whenever the question was, whether a bank of the United States should be located in Philadelphia or New York, Philadelphia should have it, if in his power to give it to her.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR communicated the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting held in the county of West Chester, Pennsylvania, of a numerous body of its citizens, on the subject of the pecuniary embarrassments of the country, adverse to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and in favor of their restoration.

Mr. McKEAN said, that, while he did not doubt the existence of pecuniary embarrassments and distress in the country—on the contrary, believing it to exist to some extent—he did not feel himself compelled to express his entire satisfaction in all the sentiments expressed by his friend from Kentucky. The subject-matter of the memorials had been well described by the gentleman, and the Senate had, no doubt, been better entertained by hearing them read, than by any remarks he could make. He moved that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed; which motion was carried.

RHODE ISLAND SENATOR.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the select committee to whom was referred the credentials of the Honorable ASHES ROBBINS and ELISHA R. POTTER, on the subject of the contest between those two gentlemen for a seat in the Senate, made a report, which Mr. P. read at the Secretary's table, adverse to the claims of Mr. POTTER, and favorable to the right of Mr. ROBBINS, the sitting member, to his seat.

After the report had been read,

Mr. POINDEXTER said he declined making any observations upon the subject now. He merely wished to move the printing of the report and the documents. He understood that the minority of the committee wanted to submit a counter report, and he wished to give them time for that purpose, and when the report came up for consideration, he would submit his views.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was bound, in justice to himself and to the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] who, it would be recollected by the Senate, was a member of this select committee, but who had upon a late day, resigned his seat in this body, to state a few facts in relation to the proceedings of the committee. According to his recollection, the meeting of the committee to decide the important matters referred to it was held three weeks ago on Saturday last. At that meeting the views of each member of the committee were fully expressed, and it was found that himself and his honorable friend from Virginia, entertained the same opinions, and that their opinions differed with those entertained by the other three members of the committee. He, Mr. W., then understood that the report of the majority of the committee would be drawn up and submitted to the minority at a much earlier period; but he found no fault with the treatment which the minority of the committee had received from the majority. He knew, from his own experience, how little time any member of the Senate could get, from his other duties, to think and write upon subjects so important as those submitted to this select committee. The honorable chairman of the committee, as much pressed with other official duties as any other member of the body, had found it necessary to retain the papers on which the report was to be predicated until the present time, to enable him to draw up the report of the majority of the committee; and his (Mr. W.'s) knowledge of the case enabled him to say, that no person could write a report upon this subject without the possession of the papers before the committee. Such had been the course permitted to the parties by the committee, that those papers were indispensable in drawing a report taking either side of the great questions.

He, Mr. W., by the resignation of the gentleman from Virginia, was now left alone as the minority of the committee, and unexpectedly the labor of drawing up a report, expressing the opinion of the minority of the committee, was devolved upon him; as before the resignation of the honorable Senator, it was understood between them, that that able and much more competent individual should perform that labor. He, Mr. W., should have asked the Senate to elect a member of the committee to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of his honorable friend, had it not been for the fact that the case had been finally decided by the committee before that event happened; but, with his best reflection upon the subject, he had come to the conclusion that placing, at this late period of their action, a new member upon the committee, would give little aid to their deliberations, while it would impose an arduous labor upon some member of the Senate.

A question had been suggested in the committee as to the right, under the rules and practice of the Senate, of the minority of its committees to submit a report. His present object was to say, that himself and his colleague before named upon the committee, had discussed this subject, and in view of the importance of the questions involved, they had considered it to be their duty to present their views to the Senate, in case it should be considered admissible for them to do so. He was aware that he ought to have been prepared, at this time, to submit those views, but want of possession of the papers had prevented him from having made that preparation, and his expectation, entertained until one week ago on Saturday last, that the Senator from Virginia would perform the labor, furnished another reason for his want of preparation.

He would now submit to the Senate the disposition of the whole matter, declaring his disposition, according to his best ability, to discharge his duty as a member of the committee, but entertaining no feeling as to the course which the Senate should indicate. The honorable chairman had moved the printing of the report of the majority, and if the Senate should so order, and no other expression should be made, he should feel it to be his duty, as soon as he could obtain the possession of the papers from the committee, to draw up a report containing the views of the minority of the committee, so far as they came in conflict with those which had been given to the Senate by the majority. Still, if such a report would not be received by the Senate, he desired to be saved the labor of making it, and, therefore, he hoped such expression would be now made as might direct him as to his duty. For himself, he felt no anxiety whatever, but rather regretted that this responsible duty had devolved upon him; but under the circumstances, and standing alone in the minority, he felt so strongly the importance of the questions, that he should not shrink from the attempt to present his views of them, in case they would be received by the Senate, and in that event those views should be presented at the earliest day at which his other duties, and the possession of the papers, would enable him to give them.

Mr. CLAY said that the time had arrived for proceeding to the orders of the day; but he would say, that the parliamentary propriety of allowing a counter report of a committee, no doubt, was not warranted by usage, as it had been applied in this country, until within a few years past. As regarded the practice of the Senate on this subject, he did not know what it was, but he thought it a bad one to introduce. He had no objection to receiving the report of the minority, but he wished now to move the postponement of the subject till to-morrow, and proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he was aware that, until a late period, it was not the practice to present counter reports; it grew up in the House of Representatives, and this morning there were two reports made in that body on the same subject. A few years since, the question was raised in this body. A Senator from South Carolina presented a majority report on the subject of reducing the duty on imported iron; a Senator from New Jersey presented the minority report, on the permission of the Senate. The report was received, for the purpose of enabling the minority fairly and fully to express their views and opinions. He hoped the view of the gentleman from Kentucky would not be carried into effect. If the report could be sent back to the committee, so that the opinions of both the majority and minority could be presented in one view, he thought it would be the preferable course.

Mr. CLAY said the gentleman from Alabama misunderstood him. He was not opposed to a minority report. He only said the practice was unparliamentary. The gentleman relied upon a single precedent, and Mr. C. would submit, whether a single precedent ought to control the Senate now and hereafter. As he understood that case, a paper was reported by a majority, and another by the minority. In this instance, he would prefer allowing a minority report, but at the same time with an expression of opinion that it should not be considered as a general rule, because he thought it a bad one. But he hoped the subject would be postponed till to-morrow, and the gentleman from New Hampshire, who had the floor, be allowed to proceed in the speech which he had begun upon the special order.

Mr. POINDEXTER thanked the gentleman from Alabama for referring to the precedent. He was quite willing that the minority should have an opportunity to make their report.

Mr. SPRAGUE was very unwilling the minority should be deprived of the opportunity of making a counter report. But he thought it could not be yielded to them as a matter of right. He would rather lay down a prospective rule than appeal to the present. He hoped such a course would be adopted as would enable the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAIGHT] to make his report; as he believed, from his statement, that he would have had much difficulty before in doing so.

Mr. CLAYTON understood the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama was, to re-commit the whole subject, which he was opposed to. He hoped every facility would be given the gentleman from New York to make his report, but he thought the rule, as a matter of practice, objectionable, as it would, in every case of difference of opinion in a committee, enable a minority to obstruct and delay the action of the majority. He thought it better to print the report, and give an opportunity to the gentleman to examine it and the documents, and then submit his report.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he recollected the case alluded to by the gentleman from Alabama, and if his object was to re-commit this report, he thought if the gentleman examined it more closely, he would find himself mistaken in the extent to which he supposed the precedent went, as a justification of a minority report. [Mr. C. here read an extract from the Senate Journal.] Here there was no re-commitment. In the progress of the proceeding, the minority presented a paper expressive of their views, which was received, and he was willing to extend the same indulgence to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was in the Chair on the occasion alluded to, and had a distinct recollection of it. It was submitted as a paper, and printed as a paper, not as a report.

Mr. KING replied, that the minority made a report, and it purported to be the report of a minority of the committee, call it by what name you please, and it was also ordered to be printed. What distinction was there in calling it a paper, when it was a report, and was called a report? Now, he was anxious to know the grounds, not only on which the majority, but also the minority, founded their opinions; and when a subject of so much importance was presented as one involving the right of an individual to a seat in the Senate of the United States, it was highly desirable to have the whole subject before us, so that Senators might be enabled to examine it thoroughly. He would withdraw his motion to re-commit the report, and he hoped the gentleman from New York, on the part of the minority, would present his views on the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT said it was immaterial to him what disposition was made of the question. His object was to discharge his duty as a member of the committee, to the best of his ability, and if it was not a part of his duty to draw up a counter report, he had no desire to do it, but if it was, he would cheerfully undertake it. But from the general expression of the gentleman from Alabama and others on the subject, he would endeavor to do his duty as early as he could get possession of the papers and prepare the report.

The report was then ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR being about to call the special order—

Mr. GRUNDY asked and obtained leave to move for the printing of a correspondence between the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the Postmaster General, with respect to some of the provisions in a bill before the Senate, which would be called up in a few days, and which correspondence it was important to lay before the Senate, prior to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRUNDY then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to report to the Senate the amount of money paid by the Post Office Department, since the 1st of July, 1828, for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to that date; also, the amount of money paid since the 1st of April, 1829, for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to that date; and, also, whether any balance remains due from that Department, and, if any, what amount, for services rendered and expenses incurred prior to the above periods.

Mr. GRUNDY stated that, a few days since, the Senator from Delaware had introduced a resolution calling on the Postmaster General for the amount of postage received at stated periods, and the amount which was still unpaid. The reply to that resolution would of course place the Postmaster General in the position of a considerable debtor, as he had received large sums which the reply to this call would present as still remaining in his hands. The resolution he had now offered would obtain the credit side of the question, and show how these sums had been expended. He requested that the resolution be now considered.

Mr. CLAYTON expressed his entire acquiescence, not only in the immediate consideration of the resolution, but in all the calls which the gentleman from Tennessee might be disposed to make, for the purpose of obtaining full information.

The resolution was then considered, and agreed to.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Mr. CLAY's resolutions in relation to the removal of the deposits &c.; when

Mr. HILL resumed and concluded his remarks, as given entire in preceding pages.

On motion of Mr. CHAMBERS, the Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; after which, The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5.

Mr. PRESTON presented the credentials of BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. WILLIAM C. RIVES.

The credentials of Mr. LEIGH having been read, the oath to support the constitution of the United States was administered to him by the VICE PRESIDENT.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. TOMLINSON presented the joint memorial of the Norwich Bank, the Thames Bank, the Quinebaug Bank, and the Merchants' Bank, being all the banking institutions in the city of Norwich, in the State of Connecticut, concerning the deranged state of the currency, and the suspension of business occasioned by the altered relations of the Government to the Bank of the United States; also, resolutions passed by the directors of the Norwich and Thames Banks, on the same subject; and a copy of the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Norwich, at the Town Hall, pursuant to public notice, for the purpose of adopting measures in relation to the existing distress in the country.

In presenting these papers, Mr. T. said he deemed it proper to state, that they came from an important section of the State of Connecticut, and were entitled to the most respectful consideration. They emanated, he said, from men of long experience and sound views on the subjects to which the papers relate, whose respectability of character precluded all suspicion of their practising deception upon others. They allege, unequivocally, that great pecuniary distress pervades the community, in consequence of the deranged condition of the commercial and banking interests, and the suspension of the enterprise and industry of all classes in society.

The citizens of Norwich, and its vicinity, said Mr. T., have not been, and are not appalled by ordinary difficulties and embarrassments. For enterprise, energy, industry, and perseverance, they are highly distinguished. Indeed, in these characteristics they are equalled by few, and probably excelled by none. When under the necessity of abandoning one lucrative employment, they have proved themselves capable of resorting to some other pursuit, with great facility and success. Formerly, the foreign trade of Norwich was extensive and profitable—the surplus products of agriculture, in the eastern part of Connecticut, there found a ready and good market for exportation. But their commercial business having been interrupted, by causes which it is not necessary to detail, they promptly and judiciously invested their capital in manufacturing establishments, drawing thither large investments from other portions of the country. The consequence has been, that the city is greatly advanced in population, wealth, and improvement, and that on the banks of the streams watering the eastern section of Connecticut, and forming the river Thames by their junction at Norwich, numerous and flourishing manufacturing villages have sprung into existence, with gratifying rapidity, and, he would add, have become the habitations of comfort and intelligence.

A home market for agricultural productions has thus been created. The course of trade there has consequently changed. Instead of exporting such productions, they now import them from other States. Large importations of flour and other articles from the middle States have become necessary to supply the wants of the great number of men, women, and children, concerned in various ways in manufacturing the cotton of the South, and the iron of Pennsylvania, as well as the wool of New York and Ohio. But the business thus intimately connected with other parts of the Union, is already embarrassed, and likely, in the apprehension of those concerned, to be completely paralyzed, by the failure of individuals and manufacturing establishments. Under such circumstances, men extensively engaged and interested in the diversified business of that recently flourishing city, appeal to Congress as the only source of relief, and pray for the adoption of measures which will restore mercantile confidence, and enable them to resume and pursue their accustomed employments.

In the judgment of these experienced and practical men, the restoration of the public deposits would immediately produce these desirable results, by putting an end to the existing panic in the country, and tranquillizing the public mind. But to continue the public tranquillity, and the mercantile confidence indispensable to the general welfare, they do not hesitate to pronounce the agency of a national bank, in some form, absolutely essential. They therefore ask the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, with suitable modifications, or, if that cannot be accomplished, the incorporation of a new bank, with restricted powers, as the only effectual and adequate means of restoring and perpetuating the national prosperity, so unfortunately interrupted by an Executive measure in their opinion alike unnecessary, unwarrantable, and disastrous.

Mr. T. said he was not disposed, at this time, to discuss the propositions contained in the memorial and resolutions; which, on his motion, were read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

ESSEX COUNTY (N. J.) MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose, and said he had received two memorials, from a very respectable portion of his fellow-citizens, on the absorbing subject of the public deposits. The one, said he, is from three hundred citizens of the township of Orange, in the county of Essex, being a majority of the legal voters in that township, as now organized. My friend who enclosed the memorial assures me that, had it been hoped with good reason that complaints would have prevailed here, nine-tenths of the township might have been readily obtained, as memorialists. The other, sir, is from the adjacent township of Bloomfield, in the same county, and consists of about three hundred names, being a clear majority of that community. So that, as far as the public voice of the people has reached us, the Senators who represent New Jersey are consoled by the reflection that it speaks to them in opposition to the tenor of their instructions from the legislature. On the whole, I will say, Mr. President, that these are no "pot-house politicians"—they are the sinew of our manufacturing and agricultural strength. No department of the country can present a greater amount of respectable intelligence and enterprise, or of private and personal worth, and purity of character. I notice among them, with peculiar pleasure, the venerated name of a predecessor on this floor. John Condit, of Essex, who for many years fulfilled the high trusts of a Senator from New Jersey, has felt it to be his solemn duty, among, probably, the last acts of a virtuous and honorable life, to leave his public testimony against this alarming act of Executive interference. And what gives effectiveness to his testimony, is the interesting fact, that, when the re-charter of the old United States Bank was under the consideration of Congress, in 1811, when the most of Mr. Condit's political friends stood as a party arrayed against the bank, he, with the elevated independence and manly firmness of an upright Senator, did all that in him lay, by his votes and influence, to sustain a useful, and, as he deemed it, an indispensable financial agent. It is to me, sir, most refreshing, that, after the lapse of twenty-three years, when this same institution is assailed by the clamors of prejudice, I may be permitted to recall such a precedent, and receive the countenance of such a name. I will remark, further, of these memorials, to render them more grateful to certain ears, that the greater part of the subscribers form a branch of the early and consistent democracy of the country, of the Jefferson school, and who, in '98 and onwards, sustained the struggles and aided the triumphs of that party. But there is one pretension to which they make no claim—they are not the members of a school that denies all purity and patriotism to political adversaries. They are not of that sect which denounces and vilifies every interest and advocate that does not range within its own contracted, miserable circle. They believe men may politically differ—may run broad lines of discrimination—and still retain the courtesies of life, and cherish the charities of humanity.

The memorials were read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

On motion of Mr. EWING, the resolution offered some time ago by Mr. MANGUM, to rescind the resolution of 1830, by which documents printed by the other House were to be procured from its printers, was now taken up. Mr. MANGUM offered the following, as containing some modifications of his former resolution:

Resolved, [That the resolution adopted on the fourteenth of May, eighteen hundred and thirty, directing the Secretary of the Senate to contract with the printer of the House of Representatives for copies of the documents printed by order of the House, be and the same is hereby repealed; and the orders of the Senate for printing be executed without regard to the printing of the House.

Mr. FORSYTH called for the reading of the correspondence between the Secretary of the Senate and the printers of the other House; from which it appeared, that they had declined to print documents for the Senate, from a motive of delicacy toward the printer of the Senate.

Mr. F. said, that, under the rule which it was now desired to repeal, the printers of the other House had refused to contract with the Secretary of the Senate. It seemed to him singular that they should have done so upon the grounds they had assigned. The terms of the refusal charged the Senate with a breach of contract towards the Senate printer. The printing which the House printers had been requested to undertake, had nothing to do with the contract. He had risen to inquire what expense would be saved by the proposed changing of the rule. It was certainly a small matter, but he thought the outlay for printing ought to be lessened as much as possible.

The SECRETARY said he could not give the necessary information at present.

Mr. F. then moved to lay the resolution on the table, until the information could be procured.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, if he understood the matter, it was right to pass the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM.] The Senate had a rule which did not obtain in the House. The practical effect, therefore, was, that when an extra number of copies of the documents was required by the House, the printers of the House, in the ordinary course of their duty, printed them. In the Senate, when a document was to be printed, Senators were to wait till it was ascertained whether the printer of the House was engaged in doing the same work for the House, and whether the Senate could obtain the printing from the House printer on better terms. This was wrong, he thought, in principle. If the House had the same rule, there might be an equality, a reciprocity, which would render exact justice and relieve each branch from a state of unpleasant dependence. In this view he was opposed to any delay to make the inquiry suggested, because, let the expense be more or less, he was indisposed to obtain a cheaper bargain by a course of proceeding wrong in itself. One word as an act of justice to the printers of the House in regard to their letter. He did not think the letter justly subject to the criticism made by the Senator from Georgia. An application was made by the Secretary in virtue of a rule of the Senate. The House printers declined entering into the proposed contract, but did not deem it respectful to stop short with a simple negative. They gave their reason for declining, which was, that, in their view, it would be indelicate to the printer of the Senate. This, without further explanation, would have been a reason too general to be understood, and they added, "indelicate, because in their opinion, the printer to the Senate had a just ground to expect all the printing required by the Senate, and they were unwilling to interpose." His (Mr. C.'s) knowledge of these gentlemen convinced him they had not the smallest intention to use language in this letter offensive to any one.

Mr. FORSYTH believed this matter related to extra copies. He wished to know the difference of expense between printing under the rule as it now stood, and under that which it was proposed to substitute. The expenses were increased $25,000 per annum by having two printers. The Senator from Maryland seemed to look only to the interests of the printers; he (Mr. F.) looked to that of the people. He did not suppose the printers to the House meant any thing offensive by their letter. He was only so unfortunate as not to be able to discover any grounds for what they had said.

Mr. CHAMBERS did not present himself as the advocate of the interests of all or any of the printers to Congress. Certainly, general and public considerations should determine this question, and he was opposed on principle to the doctrines of the Senator from Georgia. Let the Senate suppose an abstract proposition, and see if the principle did not apply as contended for. If a document should be sent to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury, of which was required a large number of extra copies, would the Senator from Georgia be willing to send the Secretary of the Senate into the market to procure bidders to do this work at the least cost? [Mr. FORSYTH said, Certainly not.] Then, sir, why endeavor to bargain with the printers of the House? The principle which governed one case would equally govern the other. If a reciprocal practice had obtained, there might be some propriety in alternating with the House; but there was no such rule in the House, and therefore, no equality.

Mr. PRESTON hoped the Senator from Georgia would not persist in his inquiry. The Senator admitted that the printers to the House could refuse to perform the printing of the Senate, and those individuals had so refused. What could the Senate do in the matter? Suppose the printing in question were to cost $20,000 more, they were not justified in having it done by any other than the printer who had been chosen by the Senate. But it would not be done by any one cheaper than by the latter. If the Senate could do what was proposed by the Senator from Georgia, what was the use of appointing a printer? If he (Mr. P.) understood the resolution rightly, its object was to put the Senate printer on the same terms as the printer to the House, and to make the Senate independent of the latter. This was one of those subjects respecting which the Senate ought to stand upon its own grounds, it ought not to leave itself at the caprice of the House. He supposed the printing in question had already been done—necessarily been done, by the Senate printer, in consequence of its having been refused by the other printers. It seemed to him that the Senate ought to control its own expenses.

Mr. FORSYTH renewed his motion to lay the subject on the table until information required could be procured, and called for the yeas and nays, when there appeared—

AYES.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Waggaman, White, Wilkins, Wright.—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Sprague, Swift.—20.

Mr. POINDEXTER then moved to postpone the special order of the day until Monday next, with a view to dispose of the great mass of business on the general orders of the day. It had been six or eight weeks since this accumulation of business had commenced. He thought it was due to the public to postpone the absorbing business which had so long occupied it, and to take up the orders.

After a few words from Mr. BIBB, delivered in a very low tone, in which he was understood to have expressed his wish to make some remarks on the subject, the motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the following resolutions, moved by Mr. POINDEXTER, on Monday last:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the circumstances attending the recent sales of the public lands in the States of Mississippi and Alabama; and whether the proclamations of the President of the United States, causing the public lands in the districts of country acquired from the Choctaw tribe of Indians by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, and from the Creek tribe of Indians in Alabama, to be offered at public sale, were issued and promulgated a reasonable length of time prior to the day on which said sales were directed to be commenced in each of said districts, to give proper notice to the people of the United States of the days appointed for said sales.

2. Resolved, That the same committee inquire whether any fraudulent practices, to the injury of the public interests, took place at said sales by reason of combinations of companies or individuals, interdicting or unfavorable to a fair competition between bidders for the public lands offered for sale in said districts; and, if so, whether the officers superintending said sales had knowledge of, or participated in, such fraudulent practices or combinations.

3. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to inquire whether the registers of the land offices and the receivers of public moneys at any of the land offices of the United States, or either of them, have, in violation of law and of their official duties, demanded or accepted a bonus or premium from any purchaser or purchasers of the public lands, at public or private sale, for the benefit of such officer or officers, as a condition on which such purchaser or purchasers should be allowed to enter or purchase any tract or tracts of land offered for sale by the United States; and, also, whether any register or receiver as aforesaid has been guilty of fraud or partiality in the sales of the public lands, by adopting rules and regulations, in their respective offices, inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

4. Resolved, That the said committee inquire whether the public lands, at any land office in the State of Mississippi, have been sold otherwise than for cash; and whether any register or receiver in said State has at any time taken in payment the promissory note of any purchaser or purchasers, bearing an interest to accrue to the benefit of such register or receiver.

5. Resolved, That, in prosecution of said inquiries, the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses before them on oath, touching the matters aforesaid.

Mr. POINDEXTER hoped that these being mere resolutions of inquiry, that no Senator would object to them. They were necessary in order to invest the committee with the requisite power.

Mr. MORRIS said, it was necessary that the committee should know the grounds on which it proceeded. The power given to it by the resolutions was one authorizing them to send for persons and papers to every part of the United States. He was by no means opposed to the inquiry. He had been informed that abuses existed in the land offices, such as, if proved, and he had the power, would induce him to remove from office the unworthy incumbents. He would propose an amendment, to which he hoped the honorable Senator from Mississippi would not object. Mr. M. then proposed the following resolution, to be appended to those of Mr. POINDEXTER.

Resolved, That the committee, before they proceed to inquire into the conduct of any register or receiver of the public moneys, at any land office in the United States, make out a specification of charges and facts which the committee believe to be true, and into which they shall be of opinion an inquiry ought to be made; that they transmit a copy of the same to such register or receiver, who shall have the privilege to produce before the committee such testimony in his favor as he shall think proper.

Mr. POINDEXTER did not propose the resolutions with a view of establishing a rule of practice. The idea of the committee taking upon themselves to make out specific charges was a novel mode of proceeding. The committee knew nothing; was presumed to know nothing; but the business would be brought forward, first before the committee, and then before the Senate. He hoped the Senate would not adopt the amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that the adoption of the resolution would place the committee in the position of a grand jury who were to find a bill before they heard the evidence. It would be charging the land officers with improper conduct, and after making out a presentment, to try them.

Mr. MORRIS asked, what was to be the result of the inquiry. Implications were contained in the resolutions against the public officers. As long as he had a stand on that floor, he would raise his voice in defence of the citizens, and against inquisitorial powers. Was it to be believed that individuals would not come before the committee with accusations against those persons, many of which would be groundless? He would ask the honorable Senator from Mississippi if this power should be given without some specified cause. He owed it to himself and to his constituents, and when he was called upon to act, he would discharge his duty without fear. But it was no more than justice, if these men were to be accused before the committee, that they should be heard in their own defence. If the committee knew nothing, why was this extraordinary power asked for them? It might be right, but it was not according to his idea of justice. It was to protect the innocent from injury in their character that he had proposed the amendment. He had hoped that some more experienced Senator would have taken the task, but, as he saw no gentleman do it, he had undertaken it himself.

Mr. SHEPLEY called for the reading of the amendment.

Mr. MORRIS wished his amendment to be appended to the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, as a new resolution.

Mr. SHEPLEY wished the question to be taken on the resolutions separately. He was ever disposed to have a full and fair examination of the affairs of Government, and was never disposed to refuse all proper information. But, while he was disposed to vote for the first and second resolutions, he could not vote for the third and fifth. The object of the third resolution was to instruct the committee to inquire into the conduct of all the officers, registers and receivers. He objected to that inquiry. Suppose such an inquiry were to be made as to the Senate, or any other class of officers, and that the committee making such inquiry were empowered to call for persons and papers, and to inquire into the conduct of the whole class, was it consistent to inquire as to the conduct of the whole class of any set of officers? There might be delinquents; and the inquiry should be made as to the particular officers, not as to the whole class.

He had one remark to make on the last resolution. It said to send for persons and papers. This he looked upon as an anomaly, and very oppressive to the people. It would subject citizens to great inconvenience to be brought from the further parts of the States, without the Senate being first acquainted with the necessity.

No one should be compelled to attend without the necessity being known, or some ground being established to justify it. He would be under the necessity of voting against the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT was about to put the question, when

Mr. POINDEXTER rose, and said that when the subject was up the other day, gentlemen attempted to bring forward inquiries on the conduct of the land officers. He now accepted their challenge. The Senator from Ohio had received information from persons wishing to inculpate the land officers. He would say that the committee would receive no such testimony. If fraud was stated, it was proper that the fraud should be inquired into. The Senate represented a great national interest; and gentlemen had been told that there was a system of speculation going on by which large sums of money were taken out of the public purse. Registers and receivers were generally well acquainted with the nature of the land; and suppose they were to make a pencil mark upon their plan on a piece of particularly excellent quality, so far that a person going into the office was led to suppose that particular lot to be sold, and the land agent were to obtain a considerable profit upon that lot, suppose transactions of that kind were to come up—if the individuals supposed to be guilty of those transactions were named previous to the inquiry being made, it would cast a stigma upon the name of such individual, perhaps undeservedly. He had named no individual.

When the committee gave its evidence to the Senate, it was not to be evidence arising out of prejudice against individuals, but such evidence as the gentleman himself could not refuse. Such an inquiry was necessary for the protection of the public.

Mr. GRUNDY had no objection to the inquiry, but wished it to be made in a way that would do justice both to the public and individuals. He repeated, that if the public interest had been in any way neglected or injured, the parties who had acted improperly ought to be exposed. He should not throw any obstacles in the way of the present inquiry, but wished to see justice done to all. He was without experience as to the usual action of committees, such as that to which it was proposed to refer this matter, and would therefore ask the Senator from Mississippi how the committee intended to proceed; whether they would not be liable to be influenced by ex parte statements? He (Mr. G.) could readily conceive what ought to be done, but did not so well know what would be done. Say the registers had been culpable, he presumed it was not intended to bring witnesses here, but to send interrogatories to the parties at their own places of residence. Now he was sure that it would be thought right and proper that the men implicated should have some means of replying to and cross-examining their accusers. If the committee would furnish the accused parties with the copies of the interrogatories, there would be no difficulty. But he would go further. Every one knew that there were such things as false witnesses, and he would give the accused parties an opportunity of bringing forward exculpatory evidence. He had no doubt that the committee would pursue a proper course in this respect; but he wished the resolutions offered separately, in order that amendments might be added.

The CHAIR stated that any amendments could be offered.

Mr. GRUNDY then moved to add to the first resolution—"and the causes why the usual public notice was not given."

This was a very proper inquiry, as far as he could learn; but he thought the proper notice was not yet given. There might be good reasons for the conduct of the accused persons, and he wished the committee to inquire whether this was the case.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, it was not possible for the committee to get at any reasons. If they were to call upon the President, they had already experienced that he would give no reply. If the Senator from Tennessee wished to know why the lands had been hurried into the market, he (the Senator from Tennessee) might be able to procure the information; the President would perhaps tell him—but it would be useless for others to apply for it.

Mr. CLAYTON said it appeared to him that when a statement relative to this subject was made the other day, there was a great desire to have it investigated, but this was not now the case; this feeling had not been followed up; there was no longer the ardor for inquiry which had been manifested the other day. Two motions were now before the Senate, one, that of the Senator from Tennessee, and the other, that of the Senator from Ohio. He could not see how the Senator from Tennessee could be in order at the moment when the motion of the Senator from Ohio was under the consideration of the Senate.

The CHAIR explained, to the satisfaction of Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. CLAYTON. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee proposed to go into the reasons of the President. He had always thought the honorable Senator particularly opposed to inquiring into the reasons of the Executive. He (Mr. C.) could point the honorable Senator to his own vote in support of this assertion. He was opposed to asking even the Postmaster for his reasons; and now, all at once, he wished to propound queries to the President. The Senate had three distinct capacities—judicial, legislative, and executive; it did not follow that it was never to institute an inquiry, because it might be called upon to pass a judgment. He believed the Senate was competent to inquire whenever it liked. It was done every week in Executive session. They inquired on those occasions into the character and conduct of their officers. He had risen to say that there did not appear to him the same willingness to encounter this investigation which had been exhibited when it was mentioned the other day. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was calculated to obstruct the inquiry; and, as to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, nothing was plainer than that that would have the effect of defeating the scrutiny altogether. He saw enough to convince him there was not the same disposition to investigate as had been displayed the other day, and he began to think with the Senator from Mississippi, that "there was something rotten in the state of Denmark." They were now told that they should not examine at all, unless they took upon themselves the personal responsibility of indicting all the officers. It was contrary to the practice of all courts, to condemn a man before he was heard in his defence; yet this was the course recommended by those gentlemen who were so anxious that justice should be done to the accused parties. The Senator from Tennessee had said he was inexperienced in these matters, and did not know how the committee would go on. He seemed to think that every thing was to be left to the committee. This was not the case; the committee were to inquire, but they should not decide for him, (Mr. C.) they were only to inquire, and state facts. He would only trust the committee with the investigation. He would conclude, by saying that he hoped those who had asked for an inquiry would not now shrink back, when their request was complied with.

Mr. GRUNDY had no objection, on his part, for that matter to go into the committee of inquiry. He wished it done, but so done, that no individual could complain of the mode of the inquiry. The Senators who resided in that part of the country would perhaps state that circumstances existed there which did not exist elsewhere. Now if the lands were sold at a short notice, it might be proper to inquire the reasons for such precipitation.

Gentlemen must have viewed his conduct strangely, when they accused him of throwing difficulties in the way of inquiry. He wished not to throw any difficulties in the way. Of course, he could not vote for the resolution of the honorable Senator from Ohio. Let the inquiry be made, but let it be made so as to embrace the whole—whether there was any thing in the country, or any peculiar circumstance, which called for such actions. He wished it done to all individuals who had any agency in the transaction. He had changed the expression in the amendment, for the reason that they might, if transactions such as were complained of did exist, know the causes for such transactions.

Mr. POINDEXTER would say to the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that if there was any evidence at all on the subject, the committee would obtain it; but could assign no cause whatever. The only way to get at the cause, would be to call on the President to state the cause that operated on him, when he issued the proclamation; and that could not be obtained. It might, indeed, be given to the honorable Senator near him, [Mr. FOSTER, as we understood,] but it would not be given to him. It would be derogatory to a Senator to examine him on oath, before a committee, on what he ought to state in his place, to the Senate openly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked how was the resolution of the honorable Senator [Mr. MORRIS] to protect the innocent? Why, by shutting up all power of inquiry. It was a left-handed way of protecting the innocent. By this resolution the committee would not have the power to make any inquiry, until they had made this specification. When it was avowed by the honorable Senator, that the committee ought to be so restricted in their inquiries, and when his resolution was read to the Senate, it appeared to him that there was some lurking fear on the subject. When he was told that the committee should not make any inquiry until they had made a specification, it seemed to him a glorious way of enlightening the public mind, and of protecting the innocent. Let the inquiry be as broad as the accusation had been broad. Why reduce the action of the committee to personal implication before an inquiry was made? Was the Senate afraid to trust its own committees? If there was no foundation for the rumors, the inquiry would establish that fact, and if thus, the innocent would be protected.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said he was in favor of as broad an inquiry as the Senator from New Jersey; and the proposition now was to make the inquiry broader than by the original resolution. Did Senators wish to condemn any one, without knowing the ground on which the act was done? Would they condemn the short notice given of the sales, without knowing the cause? With the Senator from Tennessee, he would go in favor of an examination of the whole subject-matter. The very mode of insinuating that there was something wrong, would leave the imagination to suspect a great deal more than really existed. The officers implicated, as far as he knew, were free from every species of charge, and he would repeat, that it was his object to have an inquiry made, as fully as gentlemen could wish; but he wished the resolution to be framed so as to give the inquiry the proper direction, and do no injustice. He was in favor of the amendment by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, it appeared to him that all these matters were embraced in his first resolution; and if it were not so, he would consent to the amendment. He thought it right to inquire into the circumstances which induced the early sale.

Mr. P. read from the resolution.

If the committee, he continued, were instructed to inquire into the circumstances, by the resolution, it of course meant all the circumstances in regard to the motives of the President, as well as the state of the country, and he therefore was opposed to the amendment, unless gentlemen could satisfy him that it was not substantially imbodyed in his first resolution. Suspensions, he said, on this subject, had gone abroad; they had taken a deep hold on the public mind; and it was of importance—more for the sake of the officers themselves, and every honest man among the officers of the United States must feel glad to get rid of a suspicion which embraced them all—to separate the wheat from the chaff, the guilty from the innocent. He could not conceive what objections there could be to the measure. A grand jury would send for proof against all supposed violations of public order; and when their inquiry had been made, they would state the facts before the court. It will be so in this case. The inquiry could be followed out in no other way, but by clothing the committee with such powers as were proposed. If the accused were innocent, they could proceed no further, the committee could not go beyond their proper scope. Mr. P. said he would vote for the resolution as it was, and against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. PRESTON said, he believed with the Senator from Mississippi, that the substance of the amendment was in the resolution as it now stood; but he was disposed, like the Senator from Tennessee, to make it more pointed. The inquiry was, whether reasonable notice was given; which implied an inquiry into the reasons of that notice. The committee should make an inquiry into the direct causes of the shortness of that notice. It has been stated before that this time was unnecessarily short; it was a third or fourth shorter than such a notice had ever been before, and it was admitted on all sides of the House that injury might have resulted, even if it had not resulted, from the shortness of the notice. The time of the notice was unusual, and not sufficient; and he would be glad to know the reasons why such an unusual notice had been given by the President of the United States. Neither did he feel as the Senator from Mississippi did, in regard to the difficulty of getting information. If it was to be had, the committee could get it; they could go to the bottom; they could inquire into all the causes which had induced this unusual course of proceeding on the part of the President. The fact was admitted, that the notice was insufficient, and might have done injury; and if there had been no other reason, this would have been a sufficient one to send for persons and papers, to examine into this matter.

The opinion of the House had been, that there was something in this transaction which ought to be explained. He would say, if there had been injury done to the country, it ought to be looked into by the Senate. If there had been improper notices on the part of the President, the Senate would not be acting on an impeachment, but instituting an inquiry, and condemning the conduct of the President; but if, on the contrary, there should nothing be found but wise and patriotic motives, it was desirable that it should be known, and that all suspicion should be removed from their minds. The Senator from Mississippi was at the head of the committee, and relying on his courage and promptitude, they might be sure he would look into the subject, and bring the result before the Senate, and if there was any thing wrong, none could hesitate to apply a remedy. Concurring so far with the Senator from Tennessee, he differed from him in regard to the suspicions which had been aroused; that House and the country were full of them, and they ought to be removed or confirmed. He would acknowledge that his suspicions were aroused; he would not affirm the truth of those suspicions; but still he suspected, and strongly, what was suspected there and elsewhere. It was due to the gentlemen implicated, that, for their own sakes, an investigation should be made; it was due to the country, from the suspicions abroad, that an examination should be made, for the sake of the public weal, and that a remedy should be applied to whatever might be wrong. In doing this, what was the power proposed to be given to the committee? Were they to proceed by a bill of indictment, on mere rumors? Not at all. These were necessary powers; and if the committee were to exercise these powers at their own discretion, who would get up and say that they would direct the course of the committee? The committee might be instructed; but when investing them with power, the only proper course was to let them exercise that power according to their own discretion—guided, however, by parliamentary rules. But was it proper to say to them, distrusting your judgment, we give you the mode of making your inquiries? Free discretion should be allowed the committee, and if their information should not be sufficient to satisfy gentlemen, another investigation should be made, or other instructions given. He would venture to say, that according to parliamentary rules, the committee were to be instructed as to the mode of proceeding, and he had confidence in the committee that they would adopt the proper mode. As to the feeling that the Senate were now on ground not belonging to it, but to the other House, they had hardly had a discussion in which the same thing had not been intimated. He knew the Senate could not impeach; but they could drag a scoundrel from his lurking place, and expose him to public indignation, and a lawful trial. If any individual had committed a fraud, they could not impeach him for it, but they could pass a law to prevent fraud. The object was not to punish the individual, but to prevent a recurrence of the evil. Every opportunity would be given to individuals to clear themselves; an inquiry into their motives would not be made by the Senate, but of their acts, and the consequences; he was in favor of a free and full investigation. He would say again, that he had suspicions of fraud, which he desired might be removed or confirmed, and the only way was by a free and full investigation, and by investing the committee with all proper powers. He would give the Senator from Tennessee leave to send for witnesses during his inquiry into the Post Office Department. He said this, because he was desirous of having a full investigation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN did not think he had been out of order. The resolution of the Senator from Ohio controlled all others, and prohibited all inquiry. He could not consider the subject without referring to this resolution—it was the controlling one. He rose to say that he did not intend to insinuate any thing against the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator; he merely argued upon the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CLAYTON said, that, as the motion of the Senator from Tennessee had been modified, and as the only objection made to it by the Senator from Mississippi was that it did not increase the power of inquiry, he (Mr. C.) hoped that it would now be accepted.

Mr. POINDEXTER had no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; but it would give rise to another resolution calling upon the President.

Mr. GRUNDY. And if it should give rise to a call upon the President, what objection could there be to that? If the call was a proper one, it ought to be made. Mr. G. begged to say, that no particular importance was to be attached to the quarter from whence the amendment came. Whether it proved beneficial or otherwise, the idea was his (Mr. G.'s) own.

Mr. CLAY regretted the adoption of the amendment. He had no objection to an inquiry being made as to the cause of the short notice which had been given of the sale of the lands in question, but it would be useless for the committee to make this inquiry. The President would not respond. If the Senate wished to know why the notice had been so short, they should have passed a resolution calling upon the President for the information. This was the customary and most respectful mode.

Public Lands.

[MARCH 5, 1834.]

Mr. POINDEXTER had accepted the modification because his friends seemed to wish it. He never believed it would do any good. The committee could do nothing without calling upon the President.

Mr. GRUNDY said he thought it not unlikely that the whole would be found explained by documents in the Land Office, for which the Senate might very properly apply.

Mr. MORRIS said he viewed the resolution as a commission to the Senate to inquire into certain facts, and he was willing that that inquiry should take place in its broadest and fullest extent. It seemed to him that the idea he had suggested had been mistaken; he did not mean to shut out inquiry; he was rather for extending it. From the operations of this investigation he did not believe any one was exempt. The President stood on the same grounds as any other citizen. He (Mr. M.) would not at this time attempt to remove the misunderstanding which existed as to his amendment, but would take another opportunity of doing so. He begged to state that he agreed with the Senator from Tennessee. What was the committee to do under this broad inquiry? If it were an inquiry into the Post Office Department, which had been alluded to by the Senator from South Carolina, or into any particular land office, he would desire nothing more than an immediate scrutiny. But it was not so. This was to be an inquiry into the conduct of all the officers of all the different land offices. It was but just, that the parties whose conduct was to be the subject of animadversion should have notice of the fact. In no instance had an inquiry of this kind been made without some specific charges. All that he wanted was something specific: if his amendment went beyond that, it did more than he intended to be done. Permit him to say that, if charges were made against any individual brought before this committee, they must be made by some one. Was the committee to do this? Were they to arraign individuals? The committee must search the public records; beyond this they could do nothing, if they had not some other knowledge; and if they had this other knowledge, ought they not to let the accused know what was going forward against him, and give him an opportunity of bringing forward exculpatory evidence, if he possessed any? Ought not the committee to hear testimony in favor of the accused as well as against him? He wished the result of the inquiry to be before the Senate; but he wished, at the same time, that no individual should be accused without having the opportunity of the witnesses being confronted on the accusation.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, by yeas and nays, and was carried nem. con.

The second resolution was then carried.

On the fourth resolution, the yeas and nays were called for by Mr. SHEPLEY.

The result was, that Mr. SHEPLEY stood alone in the minority.

On the fifth resolution, Mr. MORRIS proposed, as an amendment, to make the powers of the committee more extensive.

The amendment was accepted by Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. FORSYTH made an observation, the tenor of which were unable to hear.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished that the honorable gentleman [Mr. MORRIS] would provide also for a court. He did not see how the provisions of his amendment could be carried into effect without one.

Mr. SHEPLEY thought there would be no difficulty in taking the examinations by the way of commission: Mr. S. then offered the following amendment:

Strike out all after the first line, and insert, "have power to cause to be taken on oath, when any misconduct is supposed to have taken place, touching the matters aforesaid; and in case any person is implicated, such person be notified, and be entitled to introduce testimony in exculpation of himself, and to cross-examine all witnesses introduced against him."

Mr. CLAYTON opposed the amendment. He said the question seemed to be, whether the Senate could trust its own committee.

Mr. PORTER would suggest to the Senate, that although the offence might have taken place in Ohio or elsewhere, still there would be a greater convenience in taking the depositions of witnesses. The probability was that many of the witnesses were now here.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, the reason of the honorable Senator for proposing the amendment was, that it was supposed the persons concerned would have their residence near the place where the circumstance took place, and the offence ought to be tried in the vicinity of the place where it was committed. He had not heard of any witnesses being here at present; all that he had heard was of letters, of communications which gentlemen had received.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the proposition of the Senator from Maine, and wished the resolution to pass as it stood.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As modified. Mr. P. here read the modification.

The VICE PRESIDENT was about to put the question, when

Mr. PRESTON observed that the resolution, as modified, did not afford the accused party an opportunity of examining witnesses.

Mr. SMITH said the committee were not appointed for the purpose of trying any person, but merely for the purpose of making inquiries. If a man were to be tried for his life, the grand jury first made inquiries. If they found sufficient cause against him, they made a presentment; and, when the examination was to take place, then the party accused had the power and the opportunity of defending himself by bringing forward his witnesses, employing counsel, cross-examining witnesses, or otherwise. The inquiry would be useless and endless on any other ground. The mode of proceeding by way of allegation was novel. A grand jury might inquire whether there had been a violation of the laws. The inquiry was made for the purpose of finding if there was sufficient ground for bringing the party to trial.

Mr. KING trusted that the committee, when they took depositions, would give notice to the party implicated. The Senator from Connecticut was mistaken: in various instances of the kind, (some of which Mr. K. mentioned,) when testimony was taken, the accused was previously notified. He trusted the committee would consider it due to themselves to give proper notice. Mr. K. was under the impression that the committee should make their examination, before they asked the power to send for persons and papers. Such had been the practice heretofore. He had risen to put the Senator right; they were not acting as a court of justice, but their object was to get at the truth; they were not acting with regard to the mode, but to the proceeding itself.

Mr. SMITH said he would put the Senator himself right, on the question whether or not his cases were facts. The one he had mentioned, on an individual, was a totally different case.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that, on the inquiry whether there had been fraudulent practices, it might be necessary to call on individuals who would not be willing to give evidence, and supposing they declined in the neighborhood of the place, the committee would have no power, and thus all persons who had participated in the fraud might escape. With respect to the justice of giving notice, it was right and proper that the person accused might have an opportunity to defend himself. But Mr. S. believed that in no instance had the Senate prescribed the manner of the committee's thus discharging their duty; it was always left to the sense of justice in the committee themselves.

Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

Mr. SHEPLEY would modify his amendment, so as to allow testimony to be taken here, and in the vicinity of the alleged fraud.

Mr. BELL said it was consistent with the principles of justice that the persons implicated should have notice; but heretofore it had been left to the discretion of the committee, who, it was presumed, would proceed with equity and justice, and he had confidence in this committee; the committee would report to the Senate, and he should object to the evidence, if the party had not been notified. There was no necessity for departing from usage in such cases.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he should have considered the modification made by the honorable chairman of the committee full and sufficient, but for declarations which had fallen from other members of the Senate. He did not rise to express any want of confidence in the committee. Under the modification of the resolution, he should have assumed that the committee would have given notice to any officer of the Government whose official acts were impugned by any evidence appearing before them, and that they would have given such officer an opportunity for exculpation by testimony, before they would report matters of accusation or impeachment. He would have entertained this opinion, because the course would be so palpably required in justice to accused public officers; and, but for the declarations to which he referred, he would have cheerfully concurred in the remark made by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] and would have presumed that the course of the committee, in making their investigations, would be such as he had indicated. He was, however, not now at liberty to make this presumption, because it had been distinctly declared by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] and intimated by several other members, in the course of their remarks, that it would not be the duty of the committee to give any notice to any accused officer; that the committees were a mere inquest; that they were to act as grand jurors, and in no other character; that they were not to hear exculpatory evidence, if offered, but that they were to act exclusively in an ex parte and accusatory character. This was presenting the duties of the standing committees of this body in a new light to him. Were they mere bodies of inquest, mere ex parte examiners of the subjects referred to them? He had not so understood the matter. He had understood that the duty of a standing committee of the Senate was to examine the merits of the questions referred to them, and to advise the Senate as to its final action. Now, it seemed that they were mere bodies of ex parte inquiry; and what, he would ask, was to be done with such a report when it came in? What was this ulterior and final action of which gentlemen spoke? Was it to refer the report back to the same committee, with instructions to examine the other side of the subject? What else could it be? If the Senate was not to obtain full information through its committees, how was that information to be obtained? What was the course of the committees upon ordinary subjects? Was it merely to make ex parte inquiry? If so, where was the testimony upon the other side to come from? Mr. W. said, the position was a mistaken one. The committees of this body are not placed in the situation of grand jurors. It is not their duty to make ex parte examinations, but to inquire into the merits of all subjects referred to them, and to make a report advising the Senate as to its final action. Until, therefore, he could receive some intimation that this committee would so consider its duties, that it would feel bound to notify such officers as might be accused before it, and to give them an opportunity to be heard in their defence, he could not vote for the resolution, as modified by the honorable mover, but must vote for the amendment which made that an express duty. He could not believe it was the intention of the Senate to make the duties of this committee under the resolutions accusatory only; to put whole classes of officers within their power, for the purpose of having them report to the Senate, and spread before the public, ex parte examinations and accusations, which the persons accused had had no opportunity to answer or explain. Still, such had been the practical effect of the opinions and views expressed by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] and, as he understood, assented to by others, and until counter indications should be given by the committee, he must be in favor of the amendment.

Mr. CLAY said it appeared to him that gentlemen who advocated the amendment, proceeded on totally mistaken ground, as to the inquiry, supposing that the trial by the examination of witnesses, would of course be confirmed; and there seemed to be very little reference to the public interest. There had been a sale which had been suspected to be unfair; and it was now proposed that the committee should go into an inquiry, to see whether the public had been fairly dealt with. It might be necessary to examine certain companies, which were said to have been formed at night, after the sale had been checked, in consequence of which land had been sold by them at eight or ten dollars per acre, after they had given the minimum price. Companies were implicated, and persons attending the sale; and were the committees to give them notice? Mr. C. would give no such notice; the trial would come afterwards, when witnesses would be confronted. The object now was to ascertain whether there had been frauds; whether the public domain had been disposed of in an improper manner, in order to provide a remedy, either by a judicial tribunal, as in Arkansas, or by an act for preventing fraudulent practices. All this was for subsequent legislation, without at this time implicating individuals.

As to the idea of giving notice, that was totally inapplicable to the case. Suppose these companies had been made, and the land officers had co-operated with them, if notice were given, the witnesses would be put out of the way, or suborned. He would refer the Senator from Maine to a precedent which he was sure would be acceptable, and would be thought conclusive. The President of the United States recently believed it necessary to institute an inquiry into the concerns of the bank. Did the President direct the Government directors to give notice to their brethren? No! Although sitting with the latter at the same board, no notice was given. He (Mr. C.) should think this precedent would be found sufficient. There ought not to be any notice given in the present case. If, after the investigation, facts should come out of such a nature as to render it necessary to put the parties on trial, or to refer to the President or other House to remove them from their offices, let them have notice. The duty of the Senate was to investigate and to supply any defect in the existing laws relative to this subject.

Mr. WRIGHT said, the second resolution refers to the combinations and companies to which the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] alludes. To those persons he did not ask that notice should be given. He cared not what the result of an investigation might be to them. They were not public officers, and had acted upon their private responsibility only. But if the honorable Senator had cast his eye over the third resolution, he would have seen that he was widely mistaken in supposing that the express direction to the committee was not to inquire into the official conduct of every land office in the whole United States. He would read the resolution. It was as follows:

"3. Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

inquire whether the registers of the land offices and the receivers of public money, at any of the land offices of the United States, or either of them, have, in violation of law, and of their official duties, demanded or accepted a bonus or premium from any purchaser or purchasers of the public lands, at public or private sale, for the benefit of such officer or officers, as a condition on which such purchaser or purchasers should be allowed to enter or purchase any tract or tracts of land offered for sale by the United States; and, also, whether any register or receiver, as aforesaid, had been guilty of fraud or partiality in the sales of public lands, by adopting rules and regulations, in their respective offices, inconsistent with the laws of the United States."

Here was a positive direction to inquire into the conduct of these officers, and into their violations of the laws of the United States, and to make those inquiries only. It was to such officers that he thought notice should be given. He did not believe that they should be condemned unheard. If the honorable Senator would look further, he would find that the fourth resolution contained the same direction, confined to the land offices in the State of Mississippi, and to a particular description of illegal acts. [Here some Senator remarked that this resolution had been so modified as to extend to all the land offices of the United States.] Mr. W. proceeded. He said he stood corrected: that he was told this resolution also had been made as broad as the third, and it only strengthened the ground for which he contended. The Senate would see that he could feel no interest in these inquiries. The land offices were so far removed from his State that neither himself nor his constituents knew much about them or the officers who occupied them. That abuses might exist was more than likely, and he hoped to be believed when he said that no member of the Senate was more willing or anxious than he was, that where they existed they should be ferreted out and the guilty punished. Still he was unprepared to say that ex parte accusations should be spread before the public against any officer of the Government. All ought to be heard and to have an opportunity for explanation and defence, and his present object was to cause the question before the Senate to be clearly understood, that every member might vote as his judgment should dictate. For his own part, after the distinct declaration of an honorable member of the committee, [Mr. CLAY,] that notice ought not to be given, that he, as a member of the committee, should not feel bound to give such notice, but should consider it improper to give it, he, Mr. W., had no alternative but to vote for the amendment, which required that notice should be given to any accused officer, and that he should be allowed to cross-examine the witnesses against him, and to make his defence.

Mr. SHEPLEY took occasion to ask whether the officers were to be charged with a violation of their duties and the law, without having any notice given to them? If so, he should move that the question be taken by ayes and noes, in order that he might have an opportunity of recording his vote against such a procedure.

Mr. MORRIS wished to be clearly understood. He admitted the substance of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine to be the same as that which he (Mr. M.) had first presented. The committee was to be vested with an inquisitorial power, with the power of a grand jury. He did not believe this was proper, and he was told that this power would not be exercised. If so—if notice was to be given—why not so express it in the resolution? Where an individual was implicated, he (Mr. M.) like the Senator from Maine, would record his vote against trying him without giving him notice. Precedents had been spoken of. He asked for any precedent which would apply to this case, which was as broad as the inquiry now proposed. The case referred to by the Senator from Alabama was a case in which specific charges had been made against an individual. He (Mr. M.) repeated, that had this inquiry been directed against any particular individual or land office, he would have voted for it.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, when there appeared—

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, King of Alab., King of Geo., Linn, Morris, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright.—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith, Sprague, Swift, Silsbee, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—27.

The amendment was, consequently, lost.

The resolution, as modified, was then put, and carried; when, on motion of Mr. BELL, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6.

After disposing of the morning business, the Senate proceeded to the orders of the day, and went through several bills, &c., of a public and private nature; among which—

The memorial of citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, relative to the removal of the deposits, presented some days ago by Mr. CLAY, was taken up and referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

The report from the Committee on the Judiciary, on the pension fund and the United States Bank, was taken up, together with the concluding resolution, that the Secretary of War should not establish a pension agency where there was a bank or branch bank of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON said if the gentleman wished to oppose it, he hoped he would name a day when it should be again taken up.

It was then made the order of the day for Friday week.

The bill for the relief of Archibald Small was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, again laid on the table, in consequence of the absence of the chairman of the committee by whom it was reported.

The bill to revive the act of 1830, granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was taken up.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER made a few remarks on the importance of the bill, and in favor of now acting upon it.

Mr. TIPTON moved an amendment, to the effect that any person inhabiting one quarter section and cultivating another, should be permitted to enter either at his discretion.

Mr. EWING suggested that the individual should give notice which quarter section he intended to hold, otherwise two quarters would be kept out of the market. He would move, as a further amendment, "provided he shall designate to the receiver, within six months after the passage of this act, which quarter he has chosen."

This suggestion being accepted by Mr. TIPTON, the amendment was agreed to; after which the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, then offered an amendment, giving pre-emption rights to all persons located on the public lands previous to 1829. Mr. K. observed that he thought the amendment necessary, as the construction given to the law by the Secretary of the Treasury, was, that only two of the actual settlers could receive pre-emptions.

This amendment being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill to procure a marble bust of the late Chief Justice ELLSWORTH, to be placed in the Capitol, being taken up,

[SENATE.]

Mr. ROBBINS said: The Senate are aware that we already have, standing as the ornament of the court room of the Supreme Court, the bust of the late Chief Justice JAY, a great and celebrated name. The country, by doing this honor to that name, has done equal honor to herself. For, as great men impart their glory to the country which they inhabit, so that country shows herself deserving of that glory, by monuments to attest her sense of their merit. To the name of ELLSWORTH, a name not inferior—for they may be justly considered, as par nobile fratrum—this bill proposes to do like honor, as alike due from the country to him and to herself. His bust, if authorized, will be executed by a young American artist, already of great celebrity; one who emulates the fame of the great masters of his art, and one, as I am told, who promises to be their compeer in fame. He will undertake to execute this monument of his skill, not for profit, but for fame; for he engages to deliver it finished, in his best possible manner, at the trifling sum of six hundred and fifty dollars—a sum that will scarcely be an indemnity for the material, which is to be of the most costly kind, and for the manual labor, at the ordinary wages of manual labor. But with this he will be content: for he looks to the execution of this monument of his skill, as I said, merely to acquire celebrity as an artist. Sir, there is a blank in the bill which I now move to be filled, by inserting the words “eight hundred.” This appropriation will then cover the purchase money, and all the incidental expenses.

The blank was then filled with $800, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON,

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

The doors were re-opened at a quarter before three o'clock; when,

After taking up and ordering several bills to be engrossed for a third reading, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 7.

LANCASTER COUNTY (Pa.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. McKEAN presented a memorial, signed by 2,500 or 3,000 of the citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, complaining of pecuniary distress, which they ascribe to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and praying for their restoration. Mr. McK. moved that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would not interfere with the memorial before the Senate, uncalled for; but he thought the subject of sufficient importance to demand some notice. He wished to observe, that, if there was any thing that could impress on the minds of those who lead the Government of this country, a conviction of the necessity of applying a prompt and effectual remedy to the evils brought on the country by Executive measures, it would be found in these frequent memorials, coming, not from one State only, but from all the States, and proceeding not from one class only, but from all the various classes of the community, from all the various trades, occupations, and conditions, of our fellow-citizens. This memorial came from the county of Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, and was signed by from 2,500 to 3,000 of its citizens, and it was well known to all the members of the Senate, that this was one of the most populous, the most wealthy, and the most beautiful counties of the State. We also know, said Mr. W., that Lancaster is strictly an agricultural county. It did not depend for its wealth on the mineral productions of the earth, nor on manufacturing or commercial enterprise. It was a community of prosperous, thriving, and industrious farmers; and with what industry and success their avocations have been pursued, every one who had visited that beautiful valley could bear witness. This memorial came wholly from the agricultural interest. The memorialists were not, as had been alleged of others, brokers, speculators, or stock-jobbers; they were not political agitators, nor yet those who traded on borrowed capital—their capital consisted of their own lands, with the products of their own industry; and he beseeched gentlemen not to believe that any thing of a party nature entered into the formation of the meeting from whence this memorial emanated. Sir, when the agricultural interest of the country comes to speak, it must be and shall be heard.

Whatever interest might take to itself the appellation, the real lion of the country was the agricultural interest. It is yet sleeping; it lies quiet and is not easily roused; it desires nothing from the country but the absence of oppression and the faithful execution of the laws. It was not easily connected with the population of the cities, nor with the manufacturing interests; and when this lion is roused, every thing must give way to its power. In the progress of these measures, which have so seriously affected the community, every other interest in the country had felt the pressure of pecuniary distress, which, after affecting all these, at last reached the farmer; the price of his produce was affected, and his industry failed to receive that reward he had a right to anticipate. Being the last affected by the general pressure, and slow to believe that distress could reach him in a country so blessed by the bounties of Providence, the farmer had not been so prominent in his demands for redress as others; but when at last he does speak, Government must listen to his voice, and is bound to respect it. Mr. W. said he was impelled to make these few remarks in relation to the memorial, which was drawn up in the best tempered manner, and expressed their feelings and views in firm, but most respectful language.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PHILADELPHIA MECHANICS' MEMORIAL.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of the building mechanics of the city of Philadelphia; which, on Mr. W's. motion, was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed. On the introduction of the memorial—

Mr. W. addressed the Chair as follows:

I rise, sir, said Mr. W., to perform a pleasing duty. It is to lay before the Senate the proceedings of a meeting of the building mechanics of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened for the purpose of expressing their opinions on the present state of the country, on the 24th of February. This meeting consisted of three thousand persons, and was composed of carpenters, masons, brick-makers, bricklayers, painters and glaziers, lime-burners, plasterers, lumber merchants, and others, whose occupations are connected with the building of houses. I am proud, sir, that so respectable, so important, and so substantial a class of mechanics, have intrusted me with the presentment of their opinions and feelings, respecting the present distress of the country, to the Senate. I am happy if they have seen, in the course pursued by me here, a policy favorable to the protection of their interest, and the prosperity of their families. These intelligent and sensible men, these highly useful citizens, have witnessed the effect of the late measures of Government upon their own concerns; and the resolutions which I have now to present, fully express their convictions on the subject. They propose not to reason, but to testify; they speak what they do know.

Mr. President, the members of this meeting have not transmitted their proceedings by mail, nor have they rested satisfied with merely causing them, in any way, to reach the two Houses of Congress, and to be read and disposed of in the ordinary manner. They have forwarded them by a committee of thirty persons of their own body, and those thirty persons are now within the walls of the Senate. I wish, sir, that honorable Senators would converse with these gentlemen; I wish they would use the opportunity of satisfying themselves of their intelligence, their fairness, their freedom from the influence of all oblique or improper motives, and the unquestionable truth of the existence of that distress which they come here to represent. Such a communication would convince honorable members, that there is no pretence, no fiction, no exaggeration, in the whole matter, but that all their words are words of truth and soberness.

Mr. President, Congress has now been a good while in session. When we left our respective homes, the pressure had not come on, and we left our friends and neighbors prosperous and happy. We have been here three months, without intercourse with our constituents and our neighbors; in the meantime, the whole condition of things is changed, fearfully changed; and, I verily believe, we do not fully know or feel the full extent of this change, and all the difficulty and distress which now pervade the people. If we were at home, if we were each in our own respective circles, amidst the men of business, and mingling with all classes, and if we were hearing, as in that case we should hear, every hour, of more and more trouble, of new individual disasters, and of still increasing fear and alarm, and if we could witness, as we then should witness, the despondency of those heads of families whose occupations and means of living have been thus suddenly cut off, we should be convinced that it is the imperative and solemn duty of Congress to relieve the country without a moment's delay. Sir, if half the time and the study which are now devoted to the finding out of plausible arguments to justify the Secretary, were given to an honest and thorough inquiry into the real state of the country, I fully believe all would see the absolute necessity of immediate redress. Sir, while we sit here, in long debates, the country is plunging deeper and deeper in distress. We must not turn away from this. Sir, let us keep our eyes earnestly on the country; for, be assured, the eyes of the country are kept earnestly on us. And let us, sir, take this occasion to look into facts, and examine particulars. Let us see whether there be any thing, and, if so, what it is, of which these, our fellow-citizens, complain. Do they only join in a general cry raised by others? Do they deal in unmeaning generalities, and set up an undefined and invisible cause of distress? Sir, listen to the statement; hear the facts. The committee state, sir, that eight thousand persons are ordinarily employed in building houses, in the city and county of Philadelphia; a number which, with their families, would make quite a considerable town. They further state, that the average number of houses which this body of mechanics has built, for the last five years, is twelve hundred houses a year. The average cost of these houses is computed at two thousand dollars each. Here is a business, then, sir, of two millions four hundred thousand dollars a year. Such has been the average of the last five years. And what is it now? Sir, the committee state that the business has fallen off seventy-five per cent. at least; that is to say, that, at most, only one-quarter part of their usual employment now remains. This is the season of the year in which building contracts are made. It is now known what is to be the business of the year. Many of these persons, who have heretofore had, every year, contracts for several houses on hand, have this year no contract at all. They have been obliged to dismiss their hands, to turn them over to any scraps of employment they could find, or to leave them in idleness, for want of any employment. But, sir, let us look into the particulars of this case still a little further. It is well for us to dwell on them. As we have facts before us useful for us to know, let us not hasten away from them.

Sir, how has this building business been usually carried on? Has it been by employing these mechanics as mere day laborers? No, sir; that, probably, would be generally the case in other countries; but in this, hitherto, and especially of late years, something better has been done by the building mechanics. Many of our young beginners, say the committee, buy a lot, partly for cash, and perhaps mostly on credit. They go to work, and build a house upon it; those who furnish bricks and lumber have a lien on the land for their security. They thus unite capital, or its substitute, credit, with their labor; and by prudent management, in prosperous times, they are able to sell their houses, when thus built and completed, at prices handsomely remunerating them. They are thus proprietors and owners, as well as laborers; and this practical ownership of property, this substantial interest in the community, is one of the causes which give independence and respectability to the mechanics in the cities of the United States, far beyond the general experience of other countries. But see, sir, how the Secretary's "experiment" has affected the interest of these persons. On the one hand, they can now obtain no new credits, they can commence no new operations on their own account, and other and richer persons will not build houses, in the present state of things, so that these mechanics are out of employment; and, on the other hand, nobody buys, at fair and usual prices, the houses which they have already built; but they are obliged to sell them to capitalists, or others, at great loss. At the same time, therefore, that they are deprived of employment for the present, and the hope of it for the future, they are subjected, also, to great sacrifices in the earnings of former years.

These, sir, are plain matters of fact, and they are manifestly the results of the measures of Government; and have not these mechanics, then, a right to complain? Ought they to hold their tongues, and starve, in order to enable the Secretary to try his experiment? Are they to be the willing victims of such fantastical and arrogant schemes? No, sir, that is not their notion of patriotism and duty. They think the Government was established for them, and the rest of the people of the United States, for their protection, security, and happiness. They think it not a subject for the practice of every raw conceit, every presumptuous theory, every impulse of arrogant and self-sufficient love of change. Sir, they are not the dupes of the Secretary's experiment; and, if they can help it, they do not intend to be its victims. They know full well in what purpose those measures originated, which have since obtained the name of the "experiment." They think they have a right to demand of Congress not to sanction such purposes, to their ruin. As American citizens, they demand the shelter of the laws; as tax-payers to Government, they demand the protection of Government; as industrious citizens, they demand security for their industry; and they protest, solemnly protest—in their name, sir, in their behalf, in their presence, I now enter their protest—against these unnecessary and wanton measures, which destroy their property, break up their employments, and reduce them and their children to want and beggary!

Mr. President, the Senate will perceive that, in one of the resolutions, this meeting of mechanics expressed their hope that the Governor of Pennsylvania would adhere to his former opinions, and lend his countenance and support to the restoration of the currency, by re-chartering the bank. In this hope they have been disappointed. They feel it to be a great misfortune certainly, that they do not come here, sustained by the government of the State at home. No doubt, sir, it is a great misfortune; at least, I agree with them in thinking it such. They most assuredly had expected a different result to the Governor's deliberations. In addition to their intense individual interest in this great question, they feel an interest, also, in the public works of the State, which have come, or may come, to a stop, in consequence of the pressure of the times, although it is true, perhaps, that they have not so direct an interest as their fellow-citizens of Lancaster county, whose memorial had just been presented, since the great western railway is to penetrate that important county from end to end. I refer to the proceedings of Governor Wolf, sir, with entire respect, personal and public; but I cannot help expressing my deep regret at the views which he seems to have adopted. I would even hope that the subject has not yet passed beyond his reconsideration, because I am fully aware of the weight and influence of Pennsylvania on this great question. Yet, sir, I see nothing in this proceeding to alter my own view in the slightest degree. The state of things is now changed. The promulgation of such opinions by the Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania, is, in my judgment, unfortunate, because its only effect is to prolong the sufferings of the country, by postponing the only adequate remedy.

Sir, the agitations of the country are not to be hushed by authority. Opinions, from however high quarters, will not quiet them. The condition of the nation calls for action, for measures, for the prompt interposition of Congress; and until Congress shall act, be it sooner or be it later, there will be no content, no repose, no restoration of former prosperity. Whoever supposes, sir, that he, or that any man, can quiet the discontents, or hush the complaints of the people, by merely saying "Peace! be still!" mistakes, shockingly mistakes, the real condition of things. It is an agitation of interests, not of opinions; a severe pressure on men's property and their means of living, not a barren contest about abstract sentiments. Even, sir, the voice of party, often so sovereign, is not of power to subdue discontents and stifle complaints. The people, sir, feel great interests to be at stake, and they are rousing themselves to protect those interests. They consider the question to be, whether the Government is made for the people, or the people for the Government. They hold the former of these two propositions, and they mean to prove it.

Mr. President, this measure of the Secretary has produced a degree of evil that cannot be borne. Talk about it as we will, it cannot be borne. A tottering state of credit, cramped means, loss of property, and loss of employment, doubts of the condition of others, doubts of their own condition, constant fears of failures and new explosions, an awful dread of the future—sir, when a consciousness of all these things accompanies a man at his breakfast, his dinner, and his supper; when it attends him through his hours both of labor and rest; when it even disturbs and haunts his dreams, and when he feels, too, that that which is thus gnawing upon him is the pure result of foolish and rash measures of Government, dependent upon it he will not bear it. A deranged and disordered currency, the ruin of occupation, distress for present means, the prostration of credit and confidence, and all this without hope of improvement or change, is a state of things which no intelligent people can long endure.

Mr. CLAY rose and said: I have been requested by the committee from Philadelphia charged with presenting the memorial to Congress, to say a few words on the subject; and, although, after the ample and very satisfactory exposition which it has received from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] further observations are entirely unnecessary, I cannot deny myself the gratification of complying with a request, proceeding from a source so highly worthy of respectful consideration.

The experiment which the President of the United States has thought proper to institute on the currency of the country, has now been in operation five months; and never, in so short a time, has a great people been precipitated from the loftiest height of unexampled prosperity to the lowest depth of unmerited distress and misery. Its calamitous effects are felt every where, by every class, by every interest, in every section of our wide-spread confederacy. And the evils now experienced, great as they are, undoubtedly, are imbibed by the reflection that no one can discern the period of their termination, and it is to be apprehended that still severer lie in advance before us. If they had been a providential infliction, they would have been borne with manly resignation and Christian fortitude; but they are aggravated by the conviction that they are the work of one mortal man, the produce of one individual will, prompted by vindictive passion, or guided by erroneous views of the public interest.

The experiment, besides its influence on the general business of the country, the dismissal of thousands of the laboring classes from employment, and the check on commercial operations and other enterprises, has occasioned a very great depreciation in the value of most descriptions of property, and especially of stocks. I should be glad to see an estimate (and it would be a most interesting and not impracticable estimate) of the aggregate amount of national and individual loss produced by this most improvident measure, in the property, business, and capital of the country. I have somewhere seen a statement that the total value of all the property, real and personal, in the single State of New York, is estimated at eight hundred millions of dollars. It will not be deemed extravagant to suppose that this property, by the operation of the recent measure of the Executive, has been subjected to an average depreciation of ten per cent. Assuming the correctness of this calculation, the loss in that State would be eighty millions. The State of New York contains about one-sixth of the whole population of the United States, and probably about one-fifth of the property. If property in other parts of the Union has depreciated in the same proportion as in New York, (and it has not been less,) the reduction in value throughout the Union would be equal to the enormous sum of four hundred millions of dollars! More than double the sum which the last war with Great Britain cost the United States!

But the depreciation in the value of capital and property is only one, although not an unimportant item, in the account of losses which have accrued from the rash proceeding of the Executive. Its effect on agricultural products, and other products of industry, on the labor of the country, on commerce, on public funds, and in the stagnation of the general business of the people, has occasioned a loss scarcely inferior to that to which the capital and property of the country have been most unwisely subjected.

And what is the remedy to be provided for by this most unhappy state of the country? I have conversed freely with the members of the Philadelphia committee. They are real, practical, working men; intelligent, well acquainted with the general condition, and with the sufferings of their particular community. No one, who has not a heart of steel, can listen to them, without feeling the deepest sympathy for the privations and sufferings unnecessarily brought upon the laboring classes. Both the committee and the memorial declare that their reliance is, exclusively, on the legislative branch of the Government. Mr. President, it is with subdued feelings, of the profoundest humility and mortification, that I am compelled to say that, constituted as Congress now is, no relief will be afforded by it, unless its members shall be enlightened and instructed by the people themselves. A large portion of the body, whatever may be their private judgment upon the course of the President, believed it to be their duty, at all events safest for themselves, to sustain him, without regard to the consequences of his measures upon the public interests. And nothing but clear, decided, and unequivocal demonstrations of the popular disapprobation of what has been done, will divert them from their present purpose.

But there is another quarter which possesses sufficient power and influence to relieve the public distresses. In twenty-four hours, the Executive branch could adopt a measure which would afford an efficacious and substantial remedy, and re-establish confidence. And those who, in this chamber, support the administration, could not render a better service than to repair to the Executive mansion, and, placing before the Chief Magistrate the naked and undisguised truth, prevail upon him to retrace his steps and abandon his fatal experiment. No one, sir, can perform that duty with more propriety than yourself.* You can, if you will, induce him to change his course. To you, then, sir, in no unfriendly spirit, but with feelings softened and subdued by the deep distress which pervades every class of our countrymen, I make the appeal. By your official and personal relations with the President, you maintain with him an intercourse which I neither enjoy nor covet. Go to him and tell him, without exaggeration, but in the language of truth and sincerity, the actual condition of his bleeding country. Tell him it is nearly ruined and undone by the measures which he has been induced to put in operation. Tell him that his experiment is operating on the nation like the philosopher's experiment upon a convulsed animal, in an exhausted receiver, and that it must expire, in agony, if he does not pause, give it free and sound circulation, and suffer the energies of the people to be revived and restored. Tell him that, in a single city, more than sixty bankruptcies, involving a loss of upwards of fifteen millions of dollars, have occurred. Tell him of the alarming decline in the value of all property, of the depreciation of all the products of industry, of the stagnation in every branch of business, and of the close of numerous manufacturing establishments, which, a few short months ago, were in active and flourishing operation. Depict to him, if you can find language to portray, the heart-rending wretchedness of thousands of the working classes cast out of employment. Tell him of the tears of helpless widows, no longer able to earn their bread, and of unclad and unfed orphans who have been driven, by his policy, out of the busy pursuits in which but yesterday they were gaining an honest livelihood. Say to him that, if firmness be honorable, when guided by truth and justice, it is intimately allied to another quality, of the most pernicious tendency, in the prosecution of an erroneous system. Tell him how much more true glory is to be won by retracing false steps, than by blindly rushing on until his country is overwhelmed in bankruptcy and ruin. Tell him of the ardent attachment, the unbounded devotion, the enthusiastic gratitude, towards him, so often signally manifested by the American people, and that they deserve at his hands better treatment. Tell him to guard himself against the possibility of an odious comparison with that worst of the Roman Emperors who, contemplating with indifference the conflagration of the mistress of the world, regaled himself during the terrific scene in the throng of his dancing courtiers. If you desire to secure for yourself the reputation of a public benefactor, describe to him truly the universal distress already produced, and the certain ruin which must ensue from perseverance in his measures. Tell him that he has been abused, deceived, betrayed, by the wicked counsels of unprincipled men around him.

Inform him that all efforts in Congress to alleviate or terminate the public distress are paralyzed and likely to prove totally unavailing, from his influence upon a large portion of the members, who are unwilling to withdraw their support, or to take a course repugnant to his wishes and feelings. Tell him that, in his bosom alone, under actual circumstances, does the power abide to relieve the country; and that, unless he opens it to conviction, and corrects the errors of his administration, no human imagination can conceive, and no human tongue can express, the awful consequences which may follow. Entreat him to pause, and to reflect that there is a point beyond which human endurance cannot go, and let him not drive this brave, generous, and patriotic people to madness and despair.

Mr. President, unaffectedly indisposed, and unwilling as I am to trespass upon the Senate, I could not decline complying with a request addressed to me by a respectable portion of my fellow-citizens, part of the bone and sinew of the American public. Like the Senator from Massachusetts, who has been intrusted with the presentation of their petition to the Senate, I found them plain, judicious, sensible men, clearly understanding their own interests, and, with the rest of the community, writhing under the operation of the measures of the Executive. If I have deviated from the beaten track of debate in the Senate, my apology must be found in the anxious solicitude which I feel for the condition of the country. And, sir, if I shall have been successful in touching your heart, and exciting in you a glow of patriotism, I shall be most happy. You can prevail upon the President to abandon his ruinous course, and, if you will exert the influence which you possess, you will command the thanks and the plaudits of a grateful people.

The memorial was then referred, as before stated.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The Senate now proceeded to the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. MANUM, to rescind the rule of the Senate, for obtaining documents printed by the other House from the printer of that House.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had taken some pains to consider the two resolutions which had been given to his care, and would state to the Senate what the probable effect of their adoption might be.

He understood that, until the adoption of the resolution of the 14th of May, 1830, it was not the custom to pay for the composition but once; that the ordinary printing, if ordered in one House, was not ordered in the other; but each House was supplied by the same expense of composition. This rule was not applicable where the Senate ordered extra printing. The object of the resolution was to reach all the printing, and to ascertain whether it was more beneficial to Congress for each House to employ different printers, or for both Houses to employ the same. There did not exist any necessity for making such a contract until this time, because, for several years past, the same individual had executed the printing for both Houses. The printers for the House had hesitated to supply the Senate with documents and papers ordered by the other House, lest it should appear to be a voluntary infringement, on their part, of the privileges of the printer to the Senate. He thought the objection was honorable on their part, but that they were mistaken in the view which they took of the subject. The rule contemplated that the printing for the two Houses might be executed by different parties. [Mr. W. here read the rule.] He supposed that the printers for the House would be willing to undertake to supply the Senate, as proposed, if they were shown that, in so doing, they would not be acting dishonorably towards the printer for the Senate. A large portion of the printing of both Houses consisted of documents which were presented to both Houses. He understood that the composition was paid for by both Houses, and that the Senate, on that account, had to pay twice as much as it would have to pay if the work was done by the same printer. He understood the usual practice was to charge half the price for the composition. It seemed desirable to avoid expense; and the expense of setting up the types twice, might, he thought, be avoided, without injury.

The rule that each printer should supply copies to each House seemed to him to create an unnecessary expense, which should be avoided, if possible. He proposed to move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The resolution not only rescinded the order of May, 1830, but the printing for the Senate, exclusively, without reference to the House, would probably have a retro-active effect. He would make no motion, but wished to have from the committee all the information which could be obtained.

Mr. MANGUM thought the whole subject of the public printing would be better on the same footing as the House of Representatives. He did not look at the subject of expense so much as that of convenience. A joint resolution, bottomed on the reduction of the whole expenditure, would meet his approbation.

Mr. KNIGHT said it was unnecessary to act hastily on the subject. He would propose an amendment to the resolution, either as a substitute, or to strike out so much of the original resolution as his amendment referred to. Mr. K. then offered the following amendment:

"When any message, report, or other document, communicated to both Houses of Congress, shall be ordered to be printed by the Senate, the Secretary shall ascertain whether the same shall have been ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives, if so, the copies will be furnished by the printer to the House, for the use of the Senate, under the law and usage now in force; and when the same person shall be printer to both Houses of Congress, and any message, report, or other document, communicated to both Houses, and printed by the House, and an additional number of copies thereof shall be ordered to be printed by the Senate, the printer shall charge for the same after the rate allowed by law for the press-work, including paper, folding, stitching, and excluding composition; and that the resolution of the 14th of May, 1830, be, and the same is hereby repealed."

Mr. K. said his object was to reduce it to the same practice which was now pursued. The price of the composition was fixed by law, and cost no more by being done by the printer for the Senate, than by the printer for the House.

Mr. BIBB said the only objection that he had to the rule, as it now stood, was, that it made the Senate subordinate to the House, except it made a special order. The adoption of the rule now could not have a retro-active effect. He would proceed to place the Senate on the same footing with the House of Representatives, and then proceed by a joint rule.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the amendment would be adopted; it would obviate a great part of the present expense; it would supersede the duplicate printing of ordinary documents. As a single instance of expense, he had been assured, that the printing of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on imports and exports, cost regularly from $1,800 to $2,000, and the expense was in the same ratio for all Executive documents.

Mr. BIBB would ask the gentleman from New York, whether, as a Senator, he was willing that such a document should not be in the possession of the Senate till after the wants of the House had been supplied, and that Senators should be the last to send their constituents such documents, after they had been thus furnished. Mr. B.'s proposition met the case at once, to rescind the rule, and place the two Houses on an equality. He was willing to diminish the expenses, but not to place the Senate under an inconvenience, to which the House was not willing to subject itself; they ought both to be placed on a footing of equality.

Mr. CLAY thought it was best to refer the subject, as it was one with which he did not feel fully acquainted.

Mr. FORSYTH hoped the reference would take place, and he had no doubt that after the subject had been investigated, the rule would be continued in its present form. He would say a word on the reciprocity of the two Houses. What was the present usage? When documents were presented to the two Houses, it was the custom of the House to order a sufficient number to be printed for both Houses. But when the Senate had first ordered the printing, it was the custom of the House to employ their printer to print the same document, and they thus increase the benefit to their own printer. He moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and it was so ordered.

REMOVAL OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. CLAY rose to present four resolutions, which he said he had prepared for the consideration of the Senate. It was not his (Mr. C.'s) purpose now to engage in the discussion of them; but to propose that they be assigned to some convenient day, and made the special order for that day. He wished, however, to accompany their presentation with one or two explanatory observations.

The first resolution asserted that the President, by the constitution, is not invested with the power of removal from office at his pleasure. The second, declared that Congress is authorized by the constitution to prescribe the tenure, terms, and conditions, of all offices established by law, where the constitution itself has not affixed the tenure. The third, instructed the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, that removal from office shall not, in future, be made without the concurrence of the Senate; and, when that body is not in session, the power shall only be exercised provisionally, subject to the consideration of the Senate when it convenes. And the fourth directs an inquiry by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, into the propriety of making provision by law for requiring the concurrence of the Senate in the appointment of all deputy postmasters, under certain restrictions.

These resolutions comprehend grave questions, of the highest importance, and which he (Mr. C.) verily believed involved the just equilibrium between the several branches of the Government, and the purity, if not the actual continuance, of the Government. The three first proceeded upon the assumption that the President is not clothed, by the constitution, with the power of removal from office. That power, he was fully aware, by a vote of 34 to 20 in the House of Representatives, and by the casting vote of the Vice President, had, in the first Congress, been conceded to the Chief Magistrate. Except in an incidental debate which arose in the Senate about four years ago, the propriety of that concession had never, he believed, been directly and deliberately considered. He had examined the constitution with the utmost care and attention of which he was capable, and he felt firmly convinced that it did not grant any such power to the President. It was sustained in the first Congress as an implied or constructive power. And he felt himself authorized to pronounce that there was not another instance, among all the constructive powers which had been controverted, of one which has so little foundation to rest upon as this power of removal at the pleasure of the President. The concession of it had been improvidently, in his opinion, made by the first Congress. It was made, probably, among other considerations, in consequence of the unbounded confidence reposed in the prudence, moderation, and wisdom, of the Father of his Country, then President of the United States. And it is remarkable that it was made with qualifications, which have been totally disregarded by the present Chief Magistrate.

The doctrines of the present administration, and the principles asserted by its supporters, during the progress of the debate on the deposite question, maintain that all persons employed in the Executive Department of the Government, throughout all its ramifications, are bound to conform to the will of the President, no matter how contrary to their own judgment that will may be. The total number of persons, in all the various branches of the public service attached to the Executive Department of the Government, has been estimated at not less than forty thousand; and he presumed, from the size of the Blue Book, that the estimate was rather below than above the mark. There are upwards of ten thousand deputy postmasters; and the number of persons employed in that single department, including postmasters, contractors, clerks, stage-drivers, and other carriers of the mail, is not probably short of thirty thousand. If this immense mass is to be actuated by one spirit, to obey one impulse, and to conform to the will of one man, it is not difficult to anticipate the arrival of the day when all the guaranties which we have supposed ourselves to possess for our liberties, will be utterly vain and unavailing. It has been a settled axiom in all free governments, and among all friends of civil liberty, that a standing army, in time of peace, is dangerous to the existence of freedom. A standing army is separate and distinct from the mass of society; dispersed and divided into different, and, perhaps, distant corps, stationed in their barracks or quarters. The amount of the danger arising from it can be seen, estimated, and guarded against. But what precautions can the community employ against the operations and influence of a standing army of forty thousand official incumbents? They are every where; in the cities and villages, at the taverns, at the cross-roads, and at every public place, mixing in the mass of society; and, if they have orders from headquarters, they will, without doubt, attempt to direct all the political movements of the country. In the possession of all the channels of intelligence, the mails and the post offices, how is it possible to resist their combined influence? Such a tremendous official corps, if a corrective be not applied, will, sooner or later, acquire the power to control and dispose of the succession of the Presidential office, as certainly as the less formidable Pretorian band of Rome disposed, at will, of the imperial crown.

The object of the resolutions which he (Mr. C.) was about to present, was to invite a deliberate review of the constitutional powers of the President and of Congress; and to ascertain if the wisdom of our fathers had really rendered subservient to the will of one man, a vast power, capable of totally changing the character of the Government, and rendering it, although in form a republic, in fact a despotism. He hoped gentlemen who supported the Executive prerogative would come to the discussion prepared to show, from the terms of the constitution itself, that the power was granted to the President. He hoped that they would not intrrench themselves behind one solitary precedent. Precedents were entitled, he admitted, to respect. They had been correctly defined to be the evidence of truth; but they were only evidence. And he did not think that a single precedent, without further examination into the constitution, ought to be allowed to transform our free Government into a practical despotism.

If greater stability can be conferred on the tenure by which public offices are held, the functionary will be rendered less dependent on the capricious pleasure of one man. They will feel, as they ought to feel, that they have an equal right with other citizens to exercise the elective franchise, without responsibility to any man. Their continuance in office ought not to depend upon the independent manner of its exercise, but upon the ability, integrity, and fidelity, with which their official duties are performed. Filled, as most of the Executive offices are, with partisans of the present administration, he (Mr. C.) could not be justly accused of any improper motive in proposing a measure which may give greater security to their abiding in them. The constitution expressly provides for one and only one mode of removal from office—by impeachment. It may be expedient to authorize some more summary process in cases of ascertained unfitness or delinquency. The resolutions look to that object, but seek to provide a remedy against the possible prejudices, passions, or imperfections, of one man. He seriously and solemnly believed that the accomplishment of the purpose contemplated by the resolutions, in some way or other, was essential to the purity and durability of the Government.

With these feelings, views, and opinions, he (Mr. C.) submitted the resolutions to the Senate, and moved that they be printed, and be made the special order of the day for the first Monday in April next. All of which was ordered accordingly.

The resolutions thus offered were the following:

1. Resolved, That the constitution of the United States does not vest in the President power to remove at his pleasure officers under the Government of the United States, whose offices have been established by law.
2. Resolved, That, in all cases of offices created by law, the tenure of holding which is not prescribed by the constitution, Congress is authorized by the constitution to prescribe the tenure, terms, and conditions on which they are to be holden.
3. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that in all instances of appointment to office by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, other than diplomatic appointments, the power of removal shall be exercised only in concurrence with the Senate, and, when the Senate is not in session, that the President may suspend any such officer, communicating his reasons for the suspension to the Senate at its first succeeding session; and, if the Senate concur with him, the officer shall be removed, but if it do not concur with him, the officer shall be restored to office.
4. Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of all deputy postmasters, whose annual emoluments exceed a prescribed amount.

After the transaction of some other business, the Senate adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, MARCH 10.

MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. SILSBEE rose and said, that he had received from the Governor of Massachusetts a copy of resolutions which had recently been adopted by the legislature of that State, in relation to the currency, and to the removal of the deposites of the public money from the Bank of the United States.

That these resolutions (which passed one branch of that legislature with but a single dissenting vote, and the other branch by a vote of three hundred and seven to one hundred and twenty-five) expressed the sentiments of a large majority of the legislature, recently assembled at Boston from every part of the commonwealth, and who carried with them a knowledge of the present and past condition of the agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and other great interests of that State.

That these resolutions proclaimed the existence of a distressing scarcity of money, and the belief that the reremoval of the deposits of the public money had been the principal, if not the only immediate cause for it, and that his colleague and himself were instructed by these resolutions "to use their influence for the purpose of procuring the restoration of the deposits of the public money to the Bank of the United States, and of continuing to the people the advantages resulting from a national bank, by a renewal of the charter of the present one, or in some other way."

Mr. S. thought these resolutions would not have been sent here if the existing pecuniary embarrassments of the country were not so oppressive as, in the judgment of those who sent them, to call loudly for the interposition of Congress to relieve them. Mr. S. said it was inconceivable to him that any one, who had either ears to hear or eyes to see, could longer entertain a doubt that there was, from some cause or other, a heavy pressure in the money markets of those sections of the country where such pressures are generally first felt, and that this pressure must and would reach the other, and all the other sections of the country, if not already there. Yet he (Mr. S.) understood that there were some, though he believed not many, who even now not only doubted, but even denied the existence of any such distress or pressure.

In Boston, said Mr. S., where the legislature of Massachusetts is now in session, there is probably as much circulating capital, in proportion to its population and its trade, as in any city or town of the Union, and their banks and their capitalists are as accommodating as those of any part of the country; yet even there, Mr. S. said, (as his letters informed him,) the money market was in such a state as had not been known for many years, if ever. That this was the case elsewhere than in Boston, and to a considerable extent every where in our country, the present depressed price of stocks, and the exorbitant rates of interest, afforded the strongest and most positive proofs. These were not the only proofs of distress; they were to be seen in whatever direction we looked. It was not only the stocks that were depressed in price, but he believed it would be difficult to find any kind of property that was not more or less depressed in price. He doubted if there was a single member of the Senate whose property, whatever might be its kind or character, would now sell for, or be estimated at so much by from ten to twenty per cent. as might have been obtained for it six months since. He said it was impracticable to make sales to any extent for cash, and it was but a small portion of the community who now possessed sufficient credit to purchase on time. He had recently been informed that a gentleman residing in one of our commercial cities, of undoubted wealth and credit, on being asked to make a purchase on time, declared the application to be the greatest compliment he had ever received. Mr. S. said he had been informed that commission merchants, generally, now decline not only to guaranty sales made by themselves, but also decline making any advances whatever on goods consigned to them for sale, which had not been the case heretofore. A gentleman of this district had lately informed him, that, upon a shipment of flour to an eastern city, he had, as usual heretofore, drawn for a part, and but a small part, of its value; his draft was accepted, but he was at the same time advised that he must refund the money by return mail, or authorize a sufficient quantity of his flour to be sold immediately for cash, at whatever price it might bring, to remunerate the draft. He had been advised of the result of another shipment, from a southern to an eastern port, a shipment valued at three thousand dollars, and subject to a freight of five hundred dollars; but upon which it was found so impracticable to raise the five hundred dollars in cash, that the shipment was surrendered to the ship-owner, to obtain his freight therefrom. Scarcely a mail arrives, said Mr. S., that does not bring us accounts of failures in our commercial cities and towns; already we have heard of more than seventy in a lately flourishing seaport of Massachusetts. We hear almost daily, also, of the stoppage of some of our manufacturing establishments and of hundreds of workmen and workwomen being thrown out of employ in consequence of the inability of the owners of those establishments to obtain money enough, either by a sale or pledge of their fabrics, to pay their laborers. The instances of exorbitant rates of interest lately paid, Mr. S. said, were without precedent in this country, either in peace or in war. Six months since, it was difficult, if not impracticable, to obtain legal interest for money, or $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. per month; now 3 to 4 per cent. per month have become common rates, and even 5 per cent. not an uncommon rate. He had heard of 1 per cent. having been paid for two days, equal to 15 per cent. per month. Mr. S. said that the commercial pursuits in which he had always been engaged, had naturally and necessarily afforded him some knowledge of the vicissitudes of the money market, and he had no recollection of any change which could be compared with that which had taken place within the last six months.

Mr. S. concurred with the legislature of Massachusetts in the opinion that the existing pecuniary embarrassments were to be attributed mainly, if not entirely, to the dissolution of that union of interest and of action which had heretofore so beneficially existed between the Government, the Bank of the United States, and the State banks—a union that was more needed at this time than at any period for many years past, and the disturbances of which could not fail to affect the pecuniary concerns of the Government, as well as those of individuals. He said that a sound and useful paper currency, (and he felt confident that his life would not be long enough to see the establishment of any other currency in this country,) such a currency as we had had for some years past, could not be sustained but by the aid of public confidence. This confidence, I say it in sadness rather than in anger, said Mr. S., has been greatly impaired, if not destroyed, by recent events; this has caused the numerous applications for relief which have reached us from a suffering community, who, if not relieved, may shortly find themselves not only without confidence, without currency, and without credit, but a portion of them without occupation. But, said Mr. S., the resolutions will speak for themselves better than I can speak for them; therefore, without detaining the Senate longer, I move that they be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER next addressed the Senate. My colleague (said Mr. W.) has left me little to say on the present occasion. In all his observations, I heartily concur, and cheerfully unite with him in laying these opinions of the legislature of Massachusetts before the Senate, and in asking for them due consideration.

No doubt can be entertained, that the sentiments of these resolutions are the sentiments of the people of Massachusetts. There is not a county or district, and perhaps hardly a township or parish, in the whole State, in which the removal of the deposits is not either severely reprobated, or deeply deplored. We should not be true representatives of Massachusetts, sir, if, on this subject, we did not hold language, unequivocally clear, and decidedly strong. We should not be true representatives, if we did not say, that she has no particle of doubt that the distresses of the country are to be attributed to the conduct of the Executive towards the bank. The State expects us, in the name of her suffering citizens, to call on Congress for relief and redress. She expects us, in her name, to declare that her course of prosperity is arrested, her great interests all deeply injured, and misfortune and distress brought upon her people. She expects us to say, that, as one of the States, she looks to Congress to protect the currency of the country, to guard the public treasures, by law, and to interfere, by its own power, efficiently and promptly, to rescue that currency from derangement and depreciation, and to restore those treasures to a safe and legal custody. She expects us to call your attention to her commerce, cramped and obstructed; to her manufactures, suffering the severest distress; and to the pressure, felt by individuals in every class of her community, from loss of confidence, loss of security, and loss of employment.

Mr. President, in one of the resolutions which have been read, the legislature of Massachusetts has signified its opinion, as to the appropriate remedy for existing difficulties: and I think the time has now come to submit a measure proposing such remedy, to the consideration of Congress and the country. It is now several weeks, sir, since I pledged myself here to propose the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, with more or less modification, and for a longer or shorter period, if no other measure promising to afford relief should be brought forward. It is now nearly three months since the existence of a general and very uncommon pressure in the country was alleged; and though the truth of this statement was then denied or doubted, yet, for the last month, the evidence has been too strong to be longer resisted, and no man now stands up here to say that the country is not in an alarming condition. No man will doubt that these things must change of themselves, or be changed by our legislation. I cannot but suppose, Mr. President, that the Executive Government sees and laments the distress of the country, but still it has nothing to recommend to us. It lives in the hope that affairs will change for the better of themselves, under the operation of the existing experiments. It is fair and just, I presume, to consider the purposes of the administration, as made known by the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the House of Representatives. That report may no doubt be received as an authentic declaration, that the administration proposes no change in its measures. Its language is, that the deposits ought not to be restored, and that the bank ought not to be re-chartered. As the administration, therefore, has nothing to recommend, the time has come to redeem my pledge; and I give notice that, on Monday next, by direction and authority of a majority of the Committee on Finance, I propose to bring forward a measure for the consideration of the Senate. I am aware, sir, fully aware, of the great responsibility assumed by this movement. I see all the difficulties which lie in the way of success. But, with me, and others of the committee, the sense of duty does not allow us to shrink from an encounter with these difficulties, formidable and numerous as they certainly are. I shall, at present, sir, say but little of the particular provisions of the intended measure, but I will say, that in proposing a measure to meet the exigencies of the present crisis, regard must be had not only to the state of the currency, and the state of business in the country, but to the state of opinion also. Two objects, therefore, are to be kept in view, in deciding on the nature of the measure which is to be brought forward.

1. It must be prompt and efficient. It must be such as will bring immediate and effectual relief to the community; and I know no such measure, except the restoration of the deposits, and the re-chartering of the bank for some period. We cannot establish a new bank, to come into existence before 1836; being expressly prohibited from so doing by the charter of the existing bank. It is idle, therefore, to hold out to the country any hopes of relief from a new bank. Yet I am entirely willing to leave open the question of a new bank, for consideration and decision hereafter. But, at present, relief from any such quarter is absolutely impossible. Nothing remains, then, but either to endure the present state of things, and make up our minds to stand it through, or to prolong the existence of the present bank. No one can doubt, that a restoration of the deposits, and the re-chartering of the bank, whether for a shorter or a longer period, would remove the distresses of all classes, and bring to the country immediate and effectual relief. And a new bank being out of the question, no other remedy whatever is proposed or suggested. The restoration of the deposits, therefore, and a continuance of the bank charter, obviously constitute that remedy which the currency and the business of the country now demand. These two things will afford relief, at once efficient and prompt.

2. The second great object is, to propose the measure in that form which shall be most likely to unite different opinions. With this view, the measure should go to the extreme of conciliation. It should be such as the country will say, men of different opinions ought to agree to without hesitation. It should yield every thing which can be yielded, with safety to the main object. And here, two modes of proceeding present themselves:

The one is, to propose a continuance of the charter of the bank for a short period—a period no longer than shall enable it to call in its great amount of debt without injury and distress to the people; and to continue it, for this short period, with no essential alteration, except that Congress should be left at liberty to make any other bank, if it should see fit so to do, after March, 1836; thus giving Congress and the country an opportunity to reconsider, deliberately, the whole subject of the currency, and the general propriety of a bank, and to establish a new bank, should it so think best, with whatever changes and modifications its wisdom may dictate; and to bring the new bank, should one be created, into existence, while the present bank shall be gradually retiring; thus avoiding the shock which would always attend the sudden change of one institution for another, the fear of which shock may be supposed to give an undue preference to the existing institution. This will leave the question between the old and a new bank open, upon fair and equal terms. If such a measure as is here suggested should be proposed, it will present an intelligible and simple question to Congress, and to the country: "Shall the charter of the present bank be continued, for a short time, until Congress can maturely consider and decide on some more permanent measure, and leaving them at full liberty to do so, or shall the present state of things continue?"

The other mode is, to introduce the measure in a more permanent form, to propose a re-charter for fifteen or twenty years, with or without an augmentation of capital, and with such modifications, in other respects, as it may be hoped will be satisfactory to the community, looking to the great objects for which the bank is to exist, viz. the distribution of the revenue, and the regulation of the currency. The selection must necessarily lie between these modes of proceeding. There is no other alternative, as it appears to me.

There is one other provision, which may wisely be incorporated into the measure, whether its form be the temporary or the more permanent one. It will be recollected that, in the bill which passed both Houses in 1832, for continuing the bank charter, a section was introduced which authorized Congress to restrain the bank, after 1836, from issuing notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. This was intended as the commencement of measures for extending, in a considerable degree, the specie circulation of the country, by withdrawing small notes. The general idea then expressed, being, that if the State banks would withdraw all notes less than five dollars, the Bank of the United States ought to withdraw all less than twenty; thus giving to our circulation a broad ground-work of specie in the first place; then an exclusive space between five dollars and twenty, for the notes of local banks; and, lastly, a common field for State banks and the Bank of the United States, as to notes and bills of all denominations of or above twenty dollars. This object I think of great importance, and one which ought to be kept in view in all our legislation.

When we consider the present state of opinion within the walls of Congress, and with the Chief Executive Magistrate, it is evident that, whatever measure be proposed, it must be submitted to the people in a more direct and emphatic manner than is usual in ordinary cases. The intelligence of the country, and the distress of the country, will, without doubt, sufficiently attract the attention of the people to any measure which may be proposed; and their will must decide its fate.

I wish now, sir, in conclusion, to say two things:

First: to avoid raising hopes which may be disappointed, I wish to say that every well-informed man in Congress and in the country is just as good a judge as I am of the probable success or defeat of the measure. I have no private information respecting men's opinions or purposes, still less any private understanding with any of those public men who have hitherto supported the removal of the deposits. And, secondly, sir, I wish to say, that, while the present state of embarrassment and distress shall continue, an adjournment of Congress is a thing not to be thought of. Our constituents will not welcome us; they ought not to welcome us to our own homes, if we should leave our seats here without having relieved the country. We have the power to relieve them; nobody else can relieve them; and it is our business, I think, to remain where we are till we fulfil the just expectation of the country.

Mr. FORSYTH said, that, from the beginning of the session to the present hour, not one memorial or petition had been presented to the Senate which had not asked its prompt and immediate attention to the wants and distresses of the country. The Senate had been told by the honorable Senator who had just taken his seat, [Mr. WEBSTER,] that the condition of the country would not admit of speculation. Such, he (Mr. F.) would say, had been the condition of the country for the last three months, and yet the Senate had been three months speculating on it.

Now it was told that the moment had arrived when legislative action must take place. Why then delay another week? Why speculate another week on the distresses of the country? A proposition is to be made, but not at present; it is to lie on the table for a week, and we are to speculate for that length of time on the sufferings of the people. Why not let the Senate have the proposition at once? Why had gentlemen delayed presenting it for three months? He (Mr. F.) conceived the object of the proposition of the honorable Senator to be to put an end to the distresses of the country by obtaining the re-charter of the bank with certain modifications. That no mistake might be made on that subject, with respect to himself, he would merely state to the honorable Senator the terms on which he is to expect his (Mr. F.'s) aid in re-chartering the bank. The rate of interest must be reduced to 5 per cent; the power of the State Governments to tax the bank funds which are used in each State must be distinctly recognised in the charter of incorporation; and the question of the power of the Government over its action must be settled—clearly and distinctly understood—or he would not go for a re-charter. He was of opinion that for some years past the power of the Government over the bank had not been sufficient, and that it ought to be increased in the event of a re-charter. The vexed question as to the character of the Government directors must be settled, and their power recognised, or the bill to re-charter the bank should never receive his vote. The control of the Government must be made greater, equal, at least, to that proposed by Mr. Dallas.

Before he took leave of this subject, he begged to express his surprise and regret at the extraordinary announcement of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—that the Senate was to continue in session until the distresses of the country are relieved—which was only to be done by the honorable gentleman's plan of re-chartering the bank. He (Mr. F.) would ask, were Senators to sit here to compel the other branch of the Legislature, or the Executive, to accede to this proposition, which the gentleman, in his judgment, thinks the public interests require? Was this the honorable Senator's announcement? Was the Senate to take a stand of this sort to compel a co-ordinate branch of the Government to submit their consciences to its behests? Now, this was very strange, and more especially strange, when honorable Senators were told that the State Governments are powerless, and cannot give relief to the people, but that we have the power. From whence did the Senate obtain the power, but from the people? He (Mr. F.) called the honorable Senator's attention to facts. The gentleman could not shut his eyes to the fact that the people of the State Governments do not desire the re-charter of the bank. Was there a man in this assembly that could shut his eyes to the fact that the people of the United States were absolutely determined that the bank should not be re-chartered? If the fact was otherwise, if the people were determined it should exist, it would be continued in existence without the aid of Senators. There was no necessity for Senators sitting here till the month of August or September, for, if the people decided to re-charter the bank, they would effect it. The bank would be re-chartered! It appeared to him (Mr. F.) that the object the honorable Senator had in view was to raise the question before the people two years hence. Why, this question had been raised already before the people, and they had settled it. We saw every day strong indications of what their opinion is on that subject. He (Mr. F.) believed the question was definitively settled by the people, and every effort that might be made hereafter, to raise it again, would more strongly show their opinion. He trusted that the Senate would not prolong their sitting to try any such experiment, for the fact was already most clearly decided; and he did not think that, by Senators remaining here till September, any purpose could be effected.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that it had struck him with some surprise that the gentleman from Georgia should complain of delay in bringing forward a measure of relief, which the gentleman knew, probably against his own opinion, was in opposition to the will of the Executive; and which the gentleman had told the Senate, over and over again, the Executive never would sanction, and over and over again, a measure which would not be consonant with the public will. Would it have been a proper course, in the eyes of the gentleman, to anticipate the design of the Executive in reference to the subject of a remedy? How long was it since the gentleman from Georgia had told the Senate that the Executive might have a plan to present to the country? How long was it since the gentleman had said that this plan would have been ere now presented, but for the peculiar organization of the committees. In a manner calculated to deter others from acting, the gentleman had told the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury had a plan to present; and that this plan would have been made known before this time, if relations of more intimate intercourse had existed between the committees and the President; and he (Mr. W.) had waited until the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, whose relations of intercourse with the President were of a more intimate character, had announced that no plan of relief was to be expected from the Executive branch of the Government. Now, for the first time, this announcement had been made, and no remedy was now expected by gentlemen on this side, unless it came from another quarter than the Executive. He had himself, two months ago, when he had first adverted to the plan of a remedy, expressed a wish rather to follow, than to lead, the movements of the Executive. He had said that he should prefer to see some plan introduced under the favor of the Executive. Nothing of the kind had made its appearance; and, until the report which was made by the Committee of Ways and Means, no one of those who are in the way of understanding the views of the Executive had intimated that nothing was to come from that quarter. It was now stated, distinctly enough, that the experiment which was now in progress was the only remedy which was to be presented from the Executive. It was not, therefore, in his opinion, at all out of time, to present his plan. He had waited to see if some one else would move. No one had made any movement; and now a plan was about to emanate from the other side.

As to the terms on which the gentleman from Georgia would give his support to the re-charter of the bank, highly as he respected the opinion of that gentleman, and much as he should value his aid, he did not know that it would be possible to obtain him as an auxiliary. But that gentleman would do what would entitle him to the everlasting gratitude of the people, if he could, or if he would, name any terms on which the passage of the bill could be secured, so as that it should receive the full form and force of law. If the gentleman would name any such terms, he (Mr. W.) should receive them as affording some gleam of hope in the midst of the terrible darkness with which the country was surrounded. He only understood the gentleman as speaking for himself, he wished he could understand him as speaking for some one else. If there was any gentleman who occupied a station nearer to the Executive than that gentleman did, and who would bring forward any proposal of terms on which the final passage of a bill to re-charter the bank could be secured; if these terms assumed any character within the extreme verge of absurdity, he (Mr. W.) would pledge himself to vote for their incorporation into the measure.

As to the terms stated by the gentleman from Georgia—the reduction of the rate of interest, the power of the States to tax the stock, and the extension of the control of the Government—they were all topics of great importance, and would, when necessary to be considered, receive all due consideration. But in the short and simple form in which he proposed to introduce the bill, merely to continue the charter of the bank for a brief period, he had supposed, as the gentleman from Georgia had voted for the re-charter bill of last Congress, that he would have preferred to take the institution, even in its present form, in order to give relief to the numerous important and suffering institutions which would be relieved by the re-charter of the bank.

The gentleman from Georgia had said, that the power to re-charter the bank was with the people, and that, if they desired its re-charter, it would be re-chartered. He agreed that he power was with the people, but it was a power which the people could only exercise through the organization of Congress. The people could never accomplish the re-charter of the bank in any other way. The gentleman from Georgia had said, that the people would do it by filling the halls of legislation, in the next Congress, with those who would represent their wishes. But, although there was one way in which the people could effect their object, there was also a shorter way in which they could make their desires known and obeyed: the people could, by another process, so express their opinion, as to make it imperative on the conduct of their representatives, in spite of any prejudices, predispositions, or predilections, which they might have entertained. The gentleman from Georgia, however, had said, that the people had already decided that the bank should not be re-chartered. Where was the proof of the fact? When the proof was asked for, the gentleman gave back nothing more than what had been so repeatedly stated, and so repeatedly answered before.

Mr. W. denied that the circumstances of the re-election of General Jackson led to any such conclusion. If such was the sentiment of the people, the bank could not be re-chartered. But it was his belief, and he believed it as firmly as he believed any thing under Heaven, that a majority of the people of the United States desire to see the bank re-chartered. In order to relieve them from the distresses under which they now labored, he believed that, if the question were now put to the people, not less than three-fourths of them would give an affirmative response.

He did not admit himself to be obnoxious to the charge of endeavoring to force the two Houses and the Executive to any particular result. It would be a hopeless task for him to run his wishes against those of both Houses, if he did not entertain the belief that the people would so act and speak as to control the opinions [and action] of the Government. The gentleman had asked him if he was of the opinion that Congress, that the Senate, should continue to sit here to control the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

So far from desiring to control, he would not do this even to persuade them to the adoption of a different course. He was as willing to stay here all the summer, to see if gentlemen on the other side could bring him over to their opinions, as much as to see if they would subscribe to his. But here, in one end of the Capitol, as well as in the other, and not only here, but in every stately dwelling throughout the country, even in every moderate dwelling, and in every cottage, an opinion would shortly prevail, that a measure of relief was necessary, was indispensable, and that it was imperative in Congress to provide for such remedy, before it should separate. For himself, he was willing to go over to any measure of the administration, if they would present to him any which had the semblance of being an efficient and a speedy remedy. He had not desired, he had not courted, the responsibility of bringing forward a measure. He had no desire to carry any particular object; all that he wished was, to obtain some plan which would succeed in gaining the form and force of law. But he had no alternative. No one else would move. There seemed to be no disposition in any other quarter to bring forward any plan of relief. They who had, with him, adopted the measure he should propose, had done so under the belief that the distress of the country required a prompt action. They believe that there was no design among the friends of the administration to prescribe any remedy in a legislative form; and he was therefore called upon to submit the plan which had received the sanction of a majority of the Committee on Finance, and then to leave a more permanent measure to the decision of the country. The people would not fail to do justice to the motives which had actuated him, and those with whom he acted, for they would see that there was no other course left which could be pursued by those who did not occupy that relation of intercourse with the Executive which would enable them to acquire and act upon his views.

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said that, from the nature of the motion before the Senate, no member could feel himself called on to give at length his views on the subject of the memorial from Massachusetts. But, he said, he might be justified in following the example of others, so far as to express his opinions upon the subject, without going at length into the reasons which might be expected to sustain them. He said, then, he would state, that he had heretofore, and still believed, in the utility of a bank of the United States, for several reasons, but principally to afford a general, as distinguished from a local, currency; to afford and facilitate domestic exchanges; to afford a safe place of deposit for the public treasury; and assist the Government in the administration of the finances.

It is true, sir, said Mr. K., I never would have voted, as on an original question, for the present or any similar bank of the United States. I believe the constitutional power of Congress, to charter such an institution, as extremely, at least as reasonably, doubtful; and the only safe rule upon which we can act, in legislating upon constitutional questions, is always to give the constitution the advantage of our doubts. But, said Mr. K., I have thought myself, and all politicians of the present day, as relieved, in a great measure, from responsibility upon this point. The question has been decided and acted on by all the political parties who have governed the country, since the adoption of the constitution. And what is more important with me, it has been decided by the highest judicial tribunal known to the Government, and having final jurisdiction of all questions arising under the constitution. Believing myself relieved then, said Mr. K., from responsibility upon the constitutional points, I should deem myself free to act according to my views of expediency.

I should, however, here remark, said Mr. K., that although I believe the people and Government of the United States could do something better with a bank, yet, at the same time, I believe that, if we were entirely rid of the institution, we could do very well without it. And, said Mr. K., it is with wounded national pride, and with the deepest and most humiliating feelings of regret, that I have heard it so frequently announced on this floor, and readily echoed by so large a portion of the American people, that "the Bank of the United States is indispensable to the well-being and prosperity of the people of the United States." If, indeed, it be true, said Mr. K., that the spirit and energies of the people of the United States are reduced so low, that they can only crawl and move by the breath and strength afforded them at the pleasure of a banking corporation; that they can stand alone, only by leaning for support upon a moneyed monopoly; if it be true that the destruction of this bank places the people, as stated by the Senator from Kentucky, in the unhappy condition of the animal subjected to philosophical experiment in an exhausted receiver, and without it they are to gasp and die—why then, said Mr. K., they are prepared for slavery—they will be, and they deserve to be, slaves.

But no, said Mr. K., the prosperity of the people of this country, thank God, does not depend on the mere accident of a bank. Their aggregate prosperity depends upon their economy and productive industry; and, though a bank might be a useful agent to direct their resources, the aggregate wealth and productive industry would be not greatly changed by the operation of such an institution.

Sir, said Mr. K., I deem it due to myself to be explicit on another point. That is, that the favor I now bear, and have ever borne, to a bank of the United States, is principally drawn from my hostility to the whole paper banking system, from beginning to end. Yes, sir, from its first modest conception, up to its present gross maturity and demoralizing corruption, I have ever considered it, said Mr. K., as one of the most pernicious and wicked systems that ever was invented by the moneyed and speculating interests, to tax the laboring and productive classes of the community. Mr. K. said that he hoped to show, at some time, when the question might be more directly before the Senate, that the people were taxed by the operation of this system without any equivalent advantage, to the amount of between five and eight millions of dollars per annum. Sir, said Mr. K., a few years since, I was in conversation with that great and good man, Sir James McIntosh, of England, who asked me to what cause I attributed the acknowledged fact, that there were ten bankruptcies in the United States, and the worst kind of bankruptcies, to where there is one in any other portion of the world sustaining the same amount of commercial interests. I answered him according to my conviction then, and now, that it was owing to paper currency, and the abuses of the paper banking system, in this country. He answered me that I was right; and added, that he had "always been astonished that a people so well acquainted with political economy, and at the same time so jealous of their liberties, and of that republican equality guaranteed by their constitution, as the Americans certainly were, ever should have suffered a system so hostile to all these objects, to be ingrafted on the policy of the country." Sir, said Mr. K., he was right. The political tendencies of the system are in direct hostility to the nature of our institutions, as well as injurious to our national industry.

I am then opposed (said Mr. K.) to the whole system; but, under existing circumstances, what are we to do? If we cannot cure the evil at present, we should endeavor to mitigate it. But I cannot agree with those (said Mr. K.) who would do this by putting their foot upon the head of the monster, when by the very surge they make to strangle it, they force up, with a sort of lever power, and with a mushroom rapidity, hundreds of others of the same genus, of more pernicious tendency. Sir, (said Mr. K.) with all the help of this national regulator, there are too many hands hold of our currency. A currency consisting principally of paper credit, should be handled with great delicacy. This was one of the cases, he said, in which too many physicians were apt to kill the patient. Currency (said Mr. K.) should be dug from the mine by the miner; coined, and its value regulated by Government; and earned by the productive industry of the people. This is the only currency that will ever answer as a steady standard of value. He was surprised, he said, to hear gentlemen gravely assert that the Bank of the United States had established a standard equally steady and uniform with gold and silver. There could be scarcely an apology, he said, for so gross an error, unless gentlemen were misled by a false comparison. They must compare currency with currency; that is, currency in one part of the country, with currency in another. They could certainly not consider, in such a proposition, the relation between the whole currency and the wealth of the country which it represented. It may perhaps be assumed with safety, (said Mr. K.,) that three-fourths of the currency of the country consists of paper. To this extent, then, there is a latitude of expansion and contraction by the banks—a power they constantly exercise whenever policy dictates, or their interests tempt them. Hence, we see the quantity of currency ever fluctuating and changing, and the relative value of property changing and fluctuating with it. And therefore it is, that we find the property of the country always afloat on the sea of uncertainty, private fortunes so suddenly wrecked, and the wealth of individuals continually changing hands.

Sir, said Mr. K., you will never establish a standard of value that will ensure a steady and progressive prosperity among the people, and promise a sure and certain reward to honest industry, until you establish your currency upon the steady principle, that if a yard of cloth be worth five dollars, it is because it may be thought as good a business to make this yard of cloth as to extract five dollars from the mines.

To conclude, said Mr. K., I think we should come to some action upon the subject before us, and settle it one way or the other. I admit there is great distress in many portions of the country. Yes, I will even admit distress in some of the northern cities, in all the degrees of comparison stated a few days since by an honorable Senator from Maryland—"Great distress, deep distress, unexampled distress." But I beseech gentlemen to be content with the glory which they have already acquired by their brilliant displays of rhetoric, and employ for a moment that sober reasoning power which the God of nature gave them, and judge truly what portion of this distress is to be attributed to the direct and necessary agency of the removal of the deposits. Is it not apparent to all that this measure has been made the pretext rather than the cause of the mischief?

Sir, said Mr. K., since the step was taken by the Executive, to which all this distress is constantly ascribed, I have travelled through four populous States in the South and Southwest, before I set out for this city. I heard a great deal of conversation from time to time upon this Executive measure, and saw much notice taken of it in the public prints, and must say, that the act, as one of expediency, was generally disapproved. Some thought it an act of injustice to the bank, but the most common sentiment, I think, was, that whatever might be the claims or the conduct of the bank, that it had great power, and that this measure would afford a pretext to the bank and its friends for inflicting a great deal of injury upon the country, with a view to political effect. And with these sentiments, I believe a great majority even of the friends of the administration assembled at this Capitol; and I am hence disposed to believe, said Mr. K., (though I am an unpractised politician, and may be mistaken,) that, if it had not best suited the friends of the bank to make this purely a party question, and even one of existence, with the administration, the deposits might have been restored before their removal could be made the pretext for mischief, by perhaps so large a majority as two-thirds of both Houses. He inferred this, because he thought that the measure was generally condemned as inexpedient, for the reasons before stated. But never had he heard any where, or from any party, that by this measure the President had transcended his constitutional powers, or usurped the whole powers of Government, until these propositions were asserted in this Capitol. Such sentiments may have been expressed, but he had not before heard them. Yes, said Mr. K., I think this alarming discovery was reserved for Senatorial sagacity, and was first made known here. And how were the friends of the administration met on this question, when they assembled at this Capitol? It was not proposed simply to correct an error, but to break down an administration; not simply to disapprove the error, if it was one, but to make it a stepping-stool to power. They asked the restoration of the deposits, to be sure, but they asked this because, in their removal, the President had violated the laws, usurped all the powers of Government, and trampled the constitution under foot. To restore the deposits for such reasons was at once, as many thought, to give up the administration as wholly unworthy a share in the Government. Thus driven to the wall, many thought themselves forced to choose between the administration and the bank. The present administration professes and acts upon some great and leading principles of national policy, which they desire to see sustained, and which they consider of much more importance to the happiness and prosperity of the people than a national bank, or the restoration of the deposits—the removal and restoration of which they look on as mere measures of expediency. If forced to a choice, then, they may naturally choose what they believe the greatest good, and support the administration, though they may think the removal inexpedient at the time it was effected.

And it cannot be disguised, Mr. President, said Mr. K., that the footing upon which this question has been placed, and the manner of treating it, has produced much the greater portion of the distress of which the people complain. Instead of calmly debating this question as one of expediency, on which there was honest differences of opinion, the session had scarcely opened before the people heard from the Capitol that a dangerous revolution had been effected in their Government. "The premonitory symptoms of despotism are upon us, and the collapse is at hand," says one. "Our liberty is lost, our constitution is gone," says a second. "Despotism has triumphed over the free institutions of the country; all power is usurped and wielded by the hand of a tyrant," says a third. "We are in the midst of a revolution, bloodless, as yet, but behold the coming storm," says a fourth; and so on. And in the midst of this Demosthenian pouring-out of the shreds and patches of old Grecian orations, some noble patriot—some generous monitor—some disinterested friend to the people, doubtless, sits down, perhaps in this chamber, I know not where, and deliberately writes letter after letter for publication in the northern cities—warning "the small capitalist to husband his little store"—"the poor man, who might fortunately have a five or a ten dollar bill, to make a run upon the banks for specie, whilst specie was to be had;" and warning all classes "prudently to prepare" for all the evils which usually follow a violent revolution. Well, sir, what is the instantaneous effect of all this terrifying stuff? Why, if Blucher with his hussars, or Platoff with his Cossacks, had been within the sound of the bugle, some of the honest yeomanry of the country could not have felt greater perturbation and alarm. Well, sir, they did as they were advised; many, no doubt from honest alarm, but a still greater number because they perfectly understood the quarter from which the alarm was sounded. The oracles had spoken, and the prediction must be fulfilled. It had been stated that the country was likely to be ruined by the measures of the administration, and it must be done. And who so blind as not to see, sir, the wicked agencies and engines that have been wilfully at work to bring the country into its present distressed condition. The "pressure" has been made the pretext for deranging the whole business of the country, deposits have been withdrawn frequently from no real alarm for their safety, but to force the banks to curtail their discounts, draw in their debts, and make their customers feel the "pressure." Specie has been also demanded with no other motive. Every species of bad faith has even been justified by no other excuse than the "pressure." The creditor will not wait, and the debtor will not pay, if they are opposed to the administration, and wish to increase the "pressure." The wealthy creditor who has, perhaps, been receiving interest on a loan for years, with no occasion for the principal, and no apprehension of its safety, demands his money, that the debtor may feel the "pressure." The wealthy debtor, often with thousands of ready means in his coffers, turns off the honest mechanic with his bill: he cannot pay till the deposits are restored, and the "pressure" removed! The merchant, whose affairs have become troublesome, from embarrassment and want of means; who has, perhaps, been long keeping up appearances by all those contrivances which are resorted to by men who trade mostly upon credit, including the usual resort of drawing and re-drawing—men, I say, who, to use the mercantile phrase, are "hard run" to make ends meet, and only wanting an honorable excuse to fail—when they receive the magic touch of the "pressure," they burst, like a bombshell, tottering and shaking all around who have had the misfortune to be connected with them. The settlement they find an easy one. The "pressure" accounts for their misfortune, and, at least from all good opposition men, they expect an honorable discharge. By these, they are rather honored than disgraced. They are considered as failing in the cause of the country. Yes, sir, the "pressure" here, the "pressure" there, the "pressure" every where—for any thing and every thing that deranges trade, and destroys confidence, the "pressure" is a ready excuse, and satisfactory account.

Can gentlemen reason seriously upon the subject, and honestly conclude that all this alleged distress has been the necessary effect of removing the deposits? Can the simple act of changing the place of deposit for eight millions of the money of the Government, produce all the distress which is witnessed in the country? These deposits, by-the-by, wherever they be, do not constitute a fund upon which the people should rely for accommodation. They do not belong to the bank, but belong to the Government, and are at all times subject to be drawn when needed by the Government. If they had been drawn out, then, and put in no other banks to discount on, the effect should not have been felt, either by the bank or the people. Yet it is gravely stated, that the removal of the deposits has produced the direct effect of depreciating the property of the country four hundred millions. I presume this is a very gross calculation, and must be made up, I think, of a great number of items, or rather, it would be something like the account of Sir Larry—64d to the blind beggar, and £7,000 sundries. He might put down, perhaps, a trifle as the direct effect of this measure, but the balance he should make up by charging a few millions to his own speech; a few millions each to many others; many millions to the compromise bill, (if that could be called a compromise where all the advantages were on one side,) and the balance to the bank. For the bank, he said, had certainly, whether justified or not, for the present, produced the largest item in the distress.

This bank, he said, from its position and advantages, had monopolized inland exchange. This exchange was a sort of currency, which entered largely into the commerce of the country. It was a means of raising money by some, of receiving it by others, and, with many others, of continuing their business for a time (by drawing and re-drawing) without any capital at all. The bank, then, through its branches, furnishing the principal conduits through which the wealth of the country, to a great extent, circulated, has thought proper, it is said, abruptly, to tear them up, and leave the commerce, previously fed through them, to stagnate and perish. This cause of embarrassment, it must be readily perceived, from its nature, must be only temporary. Individuals will do the same business, if the bank withdraws from the competition, though probably not on quite as good terms as the bank, when it has the advantage of the Government deposits and distribution of the revenue.

I will conclude by saying to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that I think I shall vote for his project for a short extension of the charter of the bank, provided the modifications suit me—hoping that it may quiet the country, and that, before the extension expires, the people will be preparing to dispense with the system altogether.

Mr. CHAMBERS rose and said, he had heard with very great surprise some of the remarks made by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. KING.] He has indeed allowed (said Mr. C.) that a very inconsiderable portion of the pecuniary embarrassment, the full extent of which he admits, is justly attributable to the late measures of the Executive, but infinitely the larger portion he considers to have been produced by the action of this body, and especially that portion of it which is opposed to the administration. The Senator, though he travelled much through the country, did not hear of distress and pecuniary depression, but more emphatically he did not hear a whisper of Executive usurpation or violation of law, until he heard the speeches of honorable Senators on this floor. The surprise, Mr. President, which I felt at this course of remark, arose, in no small degree, from the fact that late disclosures have demonstrated that the first denunciations of the Executive usurpation and violation of law, as well as the first announcement of distress and embarrassment, came from the very council-chamber of the Executive. When the Senator from Georgia imputes to those on this floor, who have seen, in the movements of the President against the bank, a reckless violation of chartered rights, and an assumption of powers that belong to the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, the sole motive to break down this administration, and on its ruin to erect the fortunes of other aspirants, when he rebukes us for playing a part, and for alarming the country by a false cry of danger and pecuniary derangement, does he forget that the personal and political and bosom friends of the President were the first to say that these were the natural and necessary results of his policy? Does the Senator forget that William J. Duane and Louis McLane, as long ago as July last, sounded in the President's ear the warning voice of caution, and foretold, with prophetic accuracy, the results of his mischievous "experiment?" Yes, sir, as long ago, I believe, as the 10th of July, did these men admonish the President that the rights of Congress, the laws of the land, and the happiness of the whole community, must be violated and disregarded before he could consummate his hostile purposes. But that warning voice did not turn aside his wrath.

Mr. Duane was selected from amongst the whole mass of devoted friends scattered throughout this Union. Without the expression of a wish on his own part or on the part of his friends, without even a desire for the office, he was invited, solicited, and entreated to occupy the high and responsible station, to which his long and ardent attachment to the President, his undeviating support of his measures, and his cherished devotion to his person, and his known opposition to the bank, made his elevation so particularly desirable. He came into the office with no feeling, with no motive, that did not look to the honor and fame of Andrew Jackson, and the glory and popularity of his administration. What he has said is known to us, and from a reference made by him to another, we can form some estimate what that other has said. It is much to be regretted that we are unable to raise the veil which conceals from public view the secret, the cabinet history of this transaction. We have once essayed to look beyond this veil, but a sagacity which well knew how difficult it might be, when a search was commenced, to arrest its progress until all was discovered, took the alarm, and repulsed our first advance. If our respectful request for a paper, given to the world through every newspaper, was refused, how perfectly idle is it to ask the disclosure of another, which would be wormwood and gall to those in whose hands it is sleeping in darkness? But, sir, we are at no loss to know, from Mr. Duane's letter, the general character of Mr. McLane's views. And I will here ask the Senator whether Mr. McLane is an alarmist; whether his object was to create a panic, and to break down the administration? Can this be said of one who has been basking in the sunshine of Executive favor for so many years, who has been carried through posts of honor, and places of high political trust, continually ascending, until he has attained that position which is the most distinguished of all in the power and command of the President, and who is at this very moment his prime minister, his confidential friend, and his constitutional counsellor? No, sir, no, sir; the Senator from Georgia will not impute to these distinguished men any motive but a pure and honest exhibition of the truth, an anxious desire to dispel the mists of error and the clouds of passion and prejudice to which they discovered their much loved chief was about to be a victim.

Massachusetts Resolutions.

The kindness of my friend near me has furnished me with the letter of Mr. Duane—his 4th letter to the people of the United States. The Senate shall hear passages from it:

"The undersigned is persuaded that the measure would be regarded as extreme and arbitrary, for these reasons.

"How can the undersigned justify the assumption of the powers of jury, judge, and executioner? Is he to punish unheard, at his own pleasure, and without being able to assign to Congress reasons for such an arbitrary act? Is it consistent with the principles of justice, or the genius of our institutions, that any man should be able to constitute himself a dictator in matters affecting the character of the country, the welfare of the people, and the fame of men who are entitled, at least, to the rights of felons."

Again, in the fourth and fifth of the numerous columns over which these reasons are spread, the Secretary's letter says: "Supposing that in adopting the proposed measure the faith of the country would not be violated; that contempt to the last and next Congress would not be evinced; that the power to contract with State banks exists, and that it would not be unwise to make the contract; still the question presents itself, what would be the effect upon society? Would the operations of the Government, or of the commercial world, be facilitated? Would confidence between man and man be promoted? Would the facility to stand a shock, in the event of a war in Europe, for instance, be given to the local banks?

"These questions, and others of an analogous character, need not be discussed by the undersigned, for his predecessor, on all accounts so much more competent to advise the President than he is, has placed this part of the subject, especially, in a point of view that cannot, he respectfully thinks, be overlooked by a Chief Magistrate so anxious as the President has proved himself to be to protect the mass of the community from embarrassment. From want of experience or information, the undersigned may not anticipate evil so extensive as that apprehended by his predecessor; but his fears are still so strong, that he is quite unwilling to put the match to a train, the end of which he has not the sagacity to discern."

Mr. Secretary Duane might not anticipate evil so extensive as that apprehended by Mr. Secretary McLane, and yet Mr. Duane apprehended that "much more trivial changes than that proposed by the President have produced great commercial convulsions," and he also apprehended that, "in any attempt to maim the bank, the agents of the bank would be the most likely to escape; the wound would be felt in the cottage of the farmer rather than in the palace of the banker." What, Mr. President, must have been the fearful features of that portrait, drawn by the hand of the prime Secretary of the President, which could have predicted a condition so much more disastrous and alarming than those anticipated by this letter?

Now, sir, I ask the Senator if he can see in this language no such idea as Executive usurpation—no such idea as a grasping at the powers of Congress, at the powers of the courts, and of the juries—no such idea as bringing ruin and distress upon the country? He must, therefore, select either alternative of the dilemma, and admit Mr. Duane and Mr. McLane to have been traitorous to their obligations, to their honor, and their oaths, or he must acquit us, who have applied to the same act, not the same language, but the same sentiment. Surely it could not be asked or expected by the Senator, or by any other person, that Senators are to sit here with their arms folded, and their voices dumb, when measures are pursued by the Executive which his nearest and most devoted friends deliberately declare to be violations of law, and ruinous to the nation. If we did, we should be faithless to our duty, faithless to ourselves, and our States, faithless to the constitution and the country, faithless to our consciences and our God.

A word or two on another matter. The Senator from Georgia, in a spirit of frankness and candor which did him honor, and for which he tendered his acknowledgments, had openly, and without disguise, disclosed the extent of party feeling in Congress. He has stated, in plain and explicit terms, that, if we had calmly proposed a restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, without connecting with it an attack upon the administration, we should have had the votes of two-thirds of each House of Congress, in favor of such a proposition, and the reason why we cannot now obtain two-thirds in each branch is, that such a vote would break down General Jackson's administration. The Senator is one of the few who will not be held in the traces of party: he has distinctly announced his individual exemption from these bonds by which his friends are chained: he means to obey the higher duties of his station, and give his aid to a measure which he believes calculated to promote the best interests of the people.

The Senator deserves praise for announcing a fact which his means of information has enabled him to ascertain with a certainty that must secure the most undoubted confidence in his accuracy. And what is this fact? Sir, it is one upon which the good people of this country will ponder, well; it is one which I trust and hope they will all hear, and one and all will deliberately reflect upon. We are making issues to send to the people and the polls, to be tried and decided. I desire that this evidence be used in the trial of these issues—that it be known far and wide, how matters stand here, in the very ark of our political safety, amongst those who are sent here by freemen, to represent freemen, to protect the constitutional and legal rights, to guard the interests and promote the happiness of thirteen millions of people. Yes, sir, let it be known, that on this floor and by a candid and honorable Senator, a political friend of the administration, it is distinctly announced, that, although two-thirds of each branch of Congress are deeply convinced in their judgment that the late measures of the Executive were unwise; that their influence upon the country was decidedly pernicious; that the people were injured and oppressed by them, and that they were convinced of the propriety of retracing these false steps; that if they regarded only their duty to the country and the people, they would vote for a measure which would relieve the distresses and advance the happiness of the community, but that they are restrained from the exercise of this admitted duty for the cause, that such a vote would probably destroy the popularity of General Jackson, and lessen the hopes of political elevation now indulged by those who are identified with him.

Let the people know that when they consider the end and object of this Government to be the happiness and the comfort of themselves, their wives, and their children, and the elevation of the national character at home and abroad; that, when they consider the officers who administer the Government as their servants, engaged in performing their work, for their advantage, and according to their will, they are in total error. Let them know that, according to the now admitted doctrine of this administration, and its advocates in the halls of Congress, there are other and higher demands—other and dearer interests—other and greater objects which those rulers regard: that the wants and necessities of the people cannot be regarded until the political wants of their rulers are provided for: that the elevation of Andrew Jackson, and those who expect to ride into office through his popularity, are motives stronger and more imperative, than the restoration of contentment and plenty to a whole community, who are now crying aloud for relief—for necessities—for bread: who are perishing, and famishing, and fainting under a load of oppression, and loss, and poverty, which the passion and fury of one man has put upon them.

Sir, I am one of those who yield obedience to the old-fashioned doctrine, not only that the people are those whose interest and prosperity are alone the legitimate ends and objects of our Government, but that they are the true and only source of power. If, upon appeal to them, they shall sanction the doctrine now for the first time publicly announced, that the protection of the popularity of a few individuals—the perpetuation of power in the hands of General Jackson, and those who stand or fall with him—the support of an administration when its measures are admitted to be indefensible—when the people shall deliberately give sanction to the doctrine that these are objects fit to supersede the claims of an injured and suffering people; that the interests and prosperity of the many, the whole, are to be sacrificed to the political elevation of the few—the two or three individuals who are, and expect to be, in power—then, sir, for one, I will bow in submission. The people have the right to make the Government what they please. If they are no longer desirous to be free, they have the poor privilege of becoming slaves. Let that experiment be tried, and I have no fear of the verdict which will be returned to us on this issue. They will not give power to those who abuse it by making it tributary to the personal ambition of any man, or any set of men, regardless of the country—the whole country.

Mr. WEBSTER said he should be very unwilling to advocate the continuance of the Bank of the United States as an indispensable agent, especially if it were to be regarded as the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. KING] had looked upon it. He, Mr. W., had said, and he did think, that, in the present state of the country—looking to the multitude of local banks and the great evils that were likely to result in consequence—the agency of the United States Bank is indispensable. But allow me (added Mr. W.) to say, that, in my view of the matter, it is indispensable as an instrument, not as a master; indispensable as an instrument, as is the hoe and the plough to the husbandman, or as the chisel and the plane to that body of mechanics who were in the Senate when I last had the honor of addressing it.

Our houses of legislation, our Executive magistrates, are indispensable for the good of the people; but they, too, are their instruments; they, too, are their servants. And, because it is necessary to have an Executive magistrate, a Senate, a House of Representatives, does it follow that the people are slaves to the Executive—are to crawl before the Senate and the House of Representatives? God forbid! They are the masters of all.

Mr. FORSYTH thought that the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. CHAMBERS] had misunderstood his colleague [Mr. KING] in what he had stated about his never having heard complaints made in regard to violations of law, before coming to this city. That honorable gentleman had traced the distress of the country to what had taken place in the Senate. Now, he (Mr. F.) would have the Senator from Maryland to recollect, that Mr. Duane's letter had been published but the other day. He thought he would find no inconsistency in what had been stated by his (Mr. F.'s) colleague.

Mr. CHAMBERS explained. He had distinctly understood the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] as stating that a vote to restore the deposits would have passed by two-thirds.

Mr. FORSYTH remarked that, if the gentleman had so stated, he was entirely wrong; but that was not what he said. But he (Mr. F.) would ask, was it not perfectly obvious to the honorable Senator, and every member of the Senate, that the question of the removal of the deposits had been so mixed up with other matters, as to give it an entirely different aspect, not only to themselves, but to the people of the United States? The restoration of the deposits would be a triumph in favor of that institution, and which it was now struggling for against the administration—an administration which was admitted to be the most popular that ever stood before the people. If the going down of the bank were liable to inflict an injury so serious that the country would not be able to recover from it in fifty years, it should have his (Mr. F.'s) most decided opposition, because of the means which it was taking to wring from the people a re-charter.

He rose not merely for the purpose of vindicating his colleague, but also to notice some observations that had fallen from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He would reiterate his complaint of the delay which had occurred in bringing forward some proposition, and say that the reason given by the gentleman was insufficient; and the strongest proof that could be given of the justice of what he (Mr. F.) had said. The Senator had asked, how could it be expected that any plan was to come from his side of the House, without knowing the plans of the administration? That, as soon as the committee of the House of Representatives made their report, which seemed to be in accordance with the opinions of the administration, then, and not till then, could the committee report. How, he (Mr. F.) would ask, did the honorable Senator know they were the opinions of the administration? Did he presume, because the committee had had an official correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, that, by means of the official correspondence, they knew what the plans of the administration were? And pray, had not a committee of the Senate, as well as of the House of Representatives, a right—was it not their duty, if they wished the information—to ask the Secretary of the Treasury for the plans of the Government? He (Mr. F.) thought the honorable Senator had it in his power to obtain the desired information. But he (Mr. F.) understood that no application had been made for it, and thought the delay quite unnecessary, and the reason assigned by the honorable Senator proved that it was so. He had said also, that he would be glad to get a plan from him, (Mr. F.) Now, he would to God it were in his power to produce one. His opinions on the subject had been disclosed, and, in making the disclosure, he had stated the impracticability of reconciling his opinions with those entertained by other honorable gentlemen. He (Mr. F.) would, as far as he was able, give them his aid in disposing of the matter. So far as the question was directed to him (Mr. F.) as to what was going to be done by the administration, he would merely say, that he possessed no more information than other gentlemen upon that point.

There was one remark made by the honorable Senator which struck him with some degree of surprise. He had stated, that the power of the people might operate directly so as to produce a salutary effect, independent of the ballot-box. How, he (Mr. F.) would ask, was that? By the right of instruction? In some parts of the country, the representative recognised the right of receiving instructions from his constituents, and felt himself bound to obey. But, how was it in other portions of the United States? The representative conceived himself to be the trustee and agent of those who had sent him to the legislature, and he was to judge of what is good for them. The honorable Senator would perceive that the bank and the administration do not stand on equal terms—for the friends of the bank do not admit the right of instruction, and the friends of the administration recognise it. The gentleman had asked what evidence there was that the people were against the bank—and he referred to the often-told tale of the late Presidential election. Now he (Mr. F.) would ask—were not the votes of 9,000 people in Philadelphia, some evidence of opinion on the subject? Was not the overwhelming change taking place in Pennsylvania, against the bank, some evidence of the opinion of the people? There was evidence accumulating every hour: and, if the gentleman did not make his proposition soon to the Senate, he would find it was overwhelming, and he would be obliged to admit that public opinion is against him.

He (Mr. F.) hoped that the Senator would produce his bill at once; let it be printed, in order that the Senate might proceed to legislate without further delay, instead of discussing memorials. There was no dispute as to there being distress in some portions of the country. He wished to have the question decided on the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and then Senators would be able to see what could be done—whether or not the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts could obtain a majority of both Houses. He (Mr. F.) thought it could not. He had already adverted to the peculiar situation in which the Secretary of the Treasury was placed; he could not, of course, come forward with any plan, whilst the question was pending as to the correctness of his conduct in regard to this matter. He (Mr. F.) hoped the honorable gentleman would take the report of the other House, and apply to the head of the Department, and, as soon as he should have received an official communication on the subject, it might be laid before the Senate, in order that Senators should have an opportunity of examining into the subject, and see what could be done.

Mr. WEBSTER supposed there was no necessity to apply to the Secretary of the Treasury for his plan.

Mr. FORSYTH said it was the usual course, when information was wanted, to apply to one of the heads of the Departments.

Mr. WEBSTER had never known it to be the practice to call on the Secretary of the Treasury, under like circumstances to the present. He thought that that officer was to answer to the House. The gentleman from Georgia seemed to think that public opinion would be so overwhelming in favor of the administration, and against those who held for the necessity of a bank, that very soon there would be nothing to dispute about. Now, he, Mr. W., did not intend to apply to the Secretary for his plan; but he would say that his prediction was the very reverse of that of the honorable Senator. He would say, that the process of applying to the Government for relief was but just begun, and the applications would be more numerous from more distant places, and would be pressed with much more urgency of tone and manner. And he did think that we were to expect a case would arise in which the public wish would be so clearly expressed, that relief must be given by some such measure as he had proposed.

The question was then taken, and the memorial referred, as moved, to the Committee on Finance.

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Robinson, daughter of Richard Wild, deceased, was taken up as the order of the day, and after a debate, in which Messrs. SHEPLEY, MOORE, NAUDAIN, LEIGH, BIBB, CHAMBERS, WHITE, TOMLINSON, and SPRAGUE, took part, the bill was re-committed to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, leave of absence for three weeks was granted to Mr. BELL, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire. The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 11.

BURLINGTON (VT.) MEMORIAL.

Mr. PRENTISS rose and said that a memorial had been transmitted to him from Vermont, praying for a restoration of the public deposits to the Bank of the United States, which he was requested to present to the Senate. The memorial, said Mr. P., is signed by one hundred and thirty of the principal business men of Burlington, the chief commercial and trading town in the State. With a very considerable number of the memorialists I am personally acquainted, and know them to be men of intelligence and respectability, some of them holding an eminent rank in the State for their intellectual qualities and moral worth. They are men altogether incapable of sending to this body, under their own signatures, groundless representations, or complaints originating either in fiction or a spirit of hostility to the administration; and I feel every assurance that they are neither influenced by any party prepossessions, nor have in view any party purposes. Some of them have long been known as avowed active friends of the administration; and there is no reason to believe that they are moved by any other than the purest and most patriotic motives. In communicating their complaints and opinions to Congress at this critical and alarming juncture, they perform a duty which they owe to themselves, and the community in which they dwell, and they do it, sir, in the language, and I may add, with the spirit and independence, which become freemen. They presume, and have a right to presume, that those to whose wisdom and patriotism the interests of the country are confided, will not be deaf to their complaints; that Congress will interpose in this trying exigency, and not permit the interests and prosperity of the people, or any portion of the people, to be sacrificed, when it is in its power to afford immediate and effectual relief. They trust that the inquiry here will be, not whether the popularity of a high individual, or the strength of party, is sufficient to sustain the recent public measure against which they complain, but whether the measure is right and just in itself, and consistent, in its operations, with the welfare of the country. The memorialists, sir, represent that though the pressure does not at present bear upon them with all the severity with which it is felt in some portions of the country, yet they are suffering much; that they find it difficult to carry on their ordinary pursuits; that business is comparatively at a stand; that their products are depreciated in value; that confidence is in a great measure destroyed; credit impaired; and they look forward to the future with the most gloomy and discouraging anticipations, especially to the time when it is usual to resume the more active employments of life in the spring. They represent that, unless some remedy is provided, their manufactories will be obliged to suspend their operations; that wool, which is a staple article, must necessarily fall in value; that mechanics will be thrown out of employment; that the merchant will be constrained to curtail his business, and press his customers for payment; that while the demands for payment will be increased, the means of payment will be diminished; and that general embarrassment and distress must follow, falling heavily on the laboring men and farmers, who compose the great body of the people. This memorial, sir, will add something to the accumulated and daily accumulating mass of evidence before the Senate, of the distress which is overspreading the country, producing, every where, consternation and dismay. The agricultural, the commercial, the mercantile, the manufacturing, and the mechanic interests, have all sent up their petitions here; and we have before us the complaints and representations of hundreds of thousands of men of business, testifying to the destruction of all credit and confidence, the interruption of all branches of industry, and the general derangement and prostration of business. If the embarrassment is yet principally and most severely felt in the large cities and towns, we cannot fail to see that it must soon extend into Burlington (Vt.) Memorial.

[SENATE.]

all parts of the country, and affect every class of the community. Disguise it as we may, sir, the distress is becoming general; the excitement is becoming general; and the opinion is becoming general as to the cause of the existing evils. Thousands and tens of thousands of mechanics and laboring men, who, a few months since, were pursuing, with economy and industry, their ordinary occupations, have found their progress in prosperity suddenly arrested, their employments interrupted, and their hopes and prospects blasted. If some important principle, or the good of the country, required this submission to loss and privation, the sacrifice, however costly, might be patiently endured, but the complaint is, and the real grievance is, that the suffering is altogether unnecessary and is inflicted and continued upon the people for no sufficient cause.

The general and extensive embarrassments upon the community, sir, though for a time a matter somewhat involved in mystery, are now universally admitted to be owing to the destruction of that confidence which is the fundamental basis of business. The memorialists impute this loss of confidence, and the embarrassment and distress which have followed, to the derangement of the money relations of the country, occasioned by the premature, unnecessary, and, in their opinion, arbitrary removal of the public deposits from the custody of the agent appointed by law to keep them. While they admit, what they have been taught to believe from the highest and best authority, that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully, they hold the converse of the proposition to be true, and consider this measure, though having the color and form of law, to be an abuse of power, adopted and executed in perversion of law, in disregard of the expressed opinion of the last Congress; disrespectful to the present Congress; prejudicial to the interest and character of the Government, and ruinous, in its consequences, to the people.

The memorialists, sir, also express themselves in favor of a national bank, and against the repetition of the experiment which was tried from 1811 to 1816; with what success, with what benefit to the country, the history of that period shows.

I have thus shortly adverted to the main propositions contained in the memorial, and I think I am warranted in saying that they are in conformity with, and supported by, public opinion in Vermont. In that State, sir, inhabited by a people second to none, I may be allowed to say, in virtue, in general intelligence, in devotion to the constitution, to the Union, to the great principles of civil and political liberty, the popular voice is strong and decided upon the interesting and momentous subject which has so long engaged our attention here, and which has so deeply excited, and still continues to excite and agitate the country. The people who have done me the undeserved honor to place me here, and in whose service I could wish it was in my power to exert an ability commensurate in some degree with the zeal and fidelity I feel, have repeatedly, through their legislature, and in their primary assemblies, affirmed the constitutionality, the necessity, and the great public utility of a national bank. They regard it as the fulfilment of one of the high legitimate purposes of the constitution; as the first duty of a just, enlightened, and well-ordered administration of the Government, to give protection to property, and security to the earnings of labor, by establishing and sustaining a sound and uniform medium of value and exchange. In attaining this great end, they hold it to be most fit and safe to follow the lights and instructions of experience. They deem it to be exceedingly improvident and hazardous to subject a matter of such vast interest and delicacy as the currency, to the trial of experiments; to the operation of theories, however specious and plausible in themselves, unsuited to the circumstances and condition of the country, at variance with the intelligence of the age, and already refuted and repudiated by experience.

Accustomed to look to practical results as the unerring test of character and tendencies, rather than to the delusive, bewildering speculation of politicians, the people of that State have not seen, and do not see, either in the organization or operation of a national bank, any thing alarming to their principles, or dangerous to their rights. It is true, sir, they have very recently heard the existing Bank of the United States denounced, loudly and vehemently denounced, as an odious monopoly, an oppressive, dangerous, fearful aristocracy; but their opinions of the nature or the character of such an institution are not, and I venture to say will not be changed, by giving it false names, or calling it hard ones. Though not the advocates in particular of the present bank, they are familiar with its operations, and have seen, and felt, and know, and appreciate its benefits. When they look into its charter, they perceive nothing in its construction but what belongs, more or less, to all similar institutions; nothing but the delegation of constitutional powers and immunities, defined, restrained, and regulated by law. When they look into its history, they find that it has been conducted in general, not only with intelligence, integrity, and skill, but with a success surpassing all expectation, in dispensing benefits and facilities to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests; and they believe, that without it, or a similar institution, whose operations shall be co-extensive with the Union, the business of the country cannot be transacted without great inconvenience and embarrassment. The wisdom of regulating the commerce of the twenty-four States of the Union, not by different laws, emanating from twenty-four different Governments, but by the law of one Government, the law of the Union, is obvious to the people of Vermont, as it is apparent to all; and knowing that, with four hundred local banks existing in the different States, issuing paper of a local, limited circulation and credit, the currency of the country must and will continue to be what it now is, and ever has been, essentially a paper currency, it appears to them that general considerations of convenience, expediency, and necessity, as urgently require that there should be a national bank established by the Government of the Union, to regulate the currency of the country, as that there should be a law of the Union of general operation, to regulate the commerce of the country. They believe that the only practicable and effectual way to preserve a sound and uniform currency, and give facility, convenience, and safety to commercial exchanges, is through the instrumentality and agency of a national bank; and that, in such an agency, constituted and organized by the Government for such a purpose, as well as for its own use, there are a fitness, an appropriateness, a just consistency between the means employed, the mode of operation, and the end to be attained, which recommend it to the favor of Congress and the country.

Such are the opinions, the unpretending, common-sense opinions of a people, republican in their principles, manners, and habits—a people living upon the fruits of their own industry and enterprise, tenacious of their freedom, and keen-sighted to detect the slightest encroachment upon their rights. I have only to add that in these opinions I entirely concur, and to move that the memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

The memorial having been read—

Mr. SWIFT said, as the memorial which had just been presented by my colleague contains the first language of complaint made on this floor by the people of Vermont, on the deeply interesting subject which has agitated Congress and the country for the last three months, I desire to avail myself of the opportunity of making a few remarks on the present pecuniary condition of the people of that State, and particularly of that portion of them with whom I am most particularly acquainted. Sir, the pecuniary distress which was first felt in our commercial cities, consequent upon the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, has reached that State, and pervades every part of it and all classes of its citizens, and this distress has been aggravated by the failure of the grain crops of the last season. I have received intelligence of the condition of that people, not only from newspapers printed there, but from numerous private letters, and there is not the least doubt of the existence of pecuniary distress, which is very great, if not unparalleled in that country. Indeed, sir, I should have no doubt of great distress there, from my knowledge of its existence elsewhere. The business and business connexion of that portion of the State which borders on Lake Champlain, with New York, and the cities on the Hudson river, render it certain that any great pecuniary embarrassments in those cities would be felt there. The shores and islands of Lake Champlain abound with a great variety of lumber and marble, and particularly that kind of lumber which is most essential in house-building; and, owing to the facilities of transporting those articles to market, afforded by the northern canal, connecting the waters of Lake Champlain with the Hudson river, many people have engaged in the business of procuring and sending those articles to market, which have hitherto commanded, in the cities on the Hudson river and on the Atlantic coast, a good price and a ready market; and it is believed that the greatest portion of building materials used in the cities on the Hudson and New York, are sent from Lake Champlain. In the prosecution of this business, a great number of poor men are employed. And, in order to its successful operation, those who are principals in the business require accommodations at the bank, but under the pressure of the times, the banks have been compelled to refuse accommodations, which, together with the uncertain prospect of a spring market, has prevented the usual prosecution of this business, by which many industrious poor men have been thrown out of employment, and are deprived of the necessary means of subsistence for themselves and families. I have daily intelligence of the failure of men in that country—men who, a few months since, were pursuing an apparently successful and prosperous business, which has produced great consternation and alarm for the safety of the sound and solvent. Indeed, it is to be presumed, that without speedy relief, the crisis of distress has not arrived. The usual time of making spring remittances by the merchants to their creditors, of whom they purchase their goods, will, if possible, greatly increase the distress.

[SENATE.]

Burlington (Vt.) Memorial.

Mr. President, as to the cause of this distress, there is great unanimity of opinion. The people believe the removal of the public deposits from the bank, together with the expressions and measures of hostility towards the bank by the Executive branch of the Government, has caused the distress; and they believe that the obvious and proper remedy for this distress is a restoration of the deposits, and a re-charter of the bank by Congress.

Mr. President, with my honorable colleague, I claim for the people of Vermont that they are as industrious, enterprising, intelligent, and patriotic, as the people of any other section of country in the United States, and that they would endure with as much patience, and with as little complaint, hardships and sacrifices, necessarily imposed on them by the Government of their country, as any other people. Sir, you know, from the past history of that State, that this is true; you know, too, that they are firm and steadfast in their principles, not liable to sudden excitement. They are, and ever have been, the true, firm, and efficient supporters of the great principles of the constitution of their country. And they think they are entitled not only to the sympathy of Congress, but to their prompt and efficient measures of relief. Sir, they say that the act of the Government which has produced this distress was wholly unnecessary; and that upon no ground whatever can it be justified; and that Congress can and must afford the relief which has been asked for.

Mr. President, the people of Vermont are sincerely attached to the union of the States, and have ever rejoiced in any measures of Congress which have tended to promote the prosperity of the States, though no immediate benefit resulted to them from such acts. Sir, the legislature of that State has instructed her Senators and Representatives in Congress to aid and sustain the internal improvement of the country, though scarcely a dollar of the public money has been disbursed in that State. Indeed, I know of no improvement in that State, made at the expense of the United States, unless the building of a small arsenal, and a light-house, may be called such. Yet, sir, you hear no complaint on that subject from the people; but of distress and ruin, brought on them by the improper measures of the Government, they do complain; and they will continue to complain until their complaints are heard. Sir, they will not patiently endure evils which it is in the power of the present Congress to remove. They believe Congress can remove them, but, if it will not, the people will take the business of redress into their own hands; they have the power, and they must and will be heard.

As to the memorial, I do not desire to add to what has been said by my colleague. I have not seen the names of the persons appended to it, and therefore cannot speak of them. To the sentiments expressed in the memorial I give my hearty concurrence—and hope the motion of my colleague will prevail.

Mr. CLAY said that he wished to avail himself of this, as being as fit as any other occasion, to correct a matter of fact, as to a circumstance which occurred a few days ago, on the presentation of a memorial, not from the State from which this memorial has been presented, but from a neighboring State. One of the difficulties arising out of the present unfortunate condition of the country is that of obtaining the truth. Whenever the truth came in conflict with the opinions maintained in a certain quarter, there was a great reluctance to bear it, and a strong disposition to qualify it. Some days ago, a memorial was presented from the city of Troy, which he had stated as having attached to it upwards of 1,700 signatures, comprehending all classes of that enterprising community, to whose deserved and increasing prosperity he had been himself an eye witness, and which no one could survey without feelings of gratification. He had said that this memorial embraced not only all avocations and classes, but also parties, and that there were to be found there the names of many of those who sustained the administration. An honorable member from New York, speaking, as he said, on the authority of the representative from Troy, had stated that only 100 of these signers were the friends of the existing administration. Some observations were made, at the time, as to the source of the information on which this statement was made. He did not know whether the matter was as represented, by the member of the other House, to the Senate, but he had thought that there must be some misapprehension. The statement had subsequently made its way into the papers, and had returned to Troy. He had received a letter on this subject, which, perhaps, was not intended to be read on this floor, but as he was a man of no concealment, he would read the whole of it. It was signed by nine or ten of the most respectable citizens of that place, some of them well known to him; and the gentleman who stood at the head of the list had been recently the mayor of the city, and sustained a character of unquestioned and unquestionable respectability. This letter was addressed to him, and bore date on the 6th of the present month, and was in the following terms:

"We perceive some remarks have been made in the Senate, by an honorable member, relative to this Troy memorial, bearing rather hard on this city. The memorial was circulated for signatures by a very respectable committee; it was presented to our citizens without reference to party; and of the 1,730 who signed it, it is found, on a critical examination, recently made, that at least 400 are, or have been, administration men. It was signed by our merchants, mechanics, artists, and working-men generally, and done because they deeply feel the distress, caused, in their opinion, by the violent and unjustifiable procedure of the Executive.

"From all parts of this county, containing 50,000 inhabitants, we have information, on which we rely, that a similar and equally great change in the opinions of men has taken place, and from the same cause—pecuniary distress; want of confidence, and prostration of enterprise.

"Among well-informed men, in this county, we believe it to be a general opinion, that the removal of the deposits was a violation of the public faith; that they ought to be restored; and that a national bank is essential to a sound currency and the public warfare.

"Ere this arrives, you will have heard of certain resolutions passed in a county convention, [caucus, I presume,] called by the office-holders and their creatures—made to attend through the power of party discipline—approbating the course of the President. But such cannot be the sober sense of the county. The meeting, we presume, was got up in consequence of our memorial.

"Some of the most respectable Jackson men would not attend their meeting—the names of others were used, who had no part nor lot in the proceeding; and in some instances, we believe, they have incorporated names from our memorial into their list of administration men, on the principle, no doubt, that all is fair in politics."

Mr. WRIGHT said, he would take this occasion to make a brief explanation relative to a mistake which he had discovered in the papers of Troy, founded on an erroneous report of his remarks, when he presented the Troy memorial. He had been reported as having said on that occasion, innocently no doubt, in some of the public papers, he could not say which, that the memorialists attributed the difficulties of the country to the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank. Now this he did not say, because the memorial contained no such meaning; but it was no doubt a matter of inference, because it complained of pecuniary embarrassment, and contained the single assertion, that it was in the power of Congress to relieve the distresses of the country. From that report, a charge was made, that the memorial had been altered here previous to its presentation, when, in fact, the true mistake was a matter of inference, that the memorial, because complaining of pecuniary distress, and praying for relief, ascribed the cause to the removal of the deposits. These remarks in explanation, he said, were made in justice to the memorialists themselves. He had asked for the reading of the memorial, in order that its meaning might be perfectly understood. He had one single remark to make, in justice to the gentleman who represented the district in which Troy was situated, in the other House. That gentleman needed no man's endorsement for any statement he might think proper to make; and for integrity of life, purity of purpose, honor, and veracity, he stood behind no man in the country. What that gentleman had stated might have been founded on some mistake, for which he (Mr. W.) would not now pretend to account. When he had the memorial in his possession, he did not count the number of signatures, and he did not pretend to speak otherwise than from information. The gentleman had frequently called on him for the purpose of obtaining a printed copy of the memorial, that he might give it an examination, and correct any mistake he might have fallen into. He had not yet been able to procure a copy of the memorial, and he mentioned this for the purpose of hastening the printing of the memorial.

Mr. CLAY rose to make one single remark. It was very true, as the Senator from New York had remarked, that the statement he had made with regard to the signatures of the Troy memorial, was made on the authority of the gentleman representing that district in the other House. He was not acquainted with that gentleman, and he had no doubt he was all that he had been represented to be; but he understood that the gentleman did not reside within fifteen miles of Troy, and he had therefore hazarded much in representing that not more than a hundred of the signers to the memorial were of the political party supporting the administration. Not residing in the town, but living at a distance of fifteen miles off, the gentleman could not have been so well acquainted with all its inhabitants as to hazard the remark that the signers of that memorial, belonging to the political party he had referred to, did not amount to more than one-fourth of what they really were.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

NEW JERSEY PETITIONS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN rose and said, he had been requested to present a memorial from four hundred and fifty-four of his fellow-citizens of Paterson, New Jersey. I am assured (said he) by the respectable committee who transmitted this memorial, that it is, with few exceptions, signed by all the business men of that town, and by a majority of the legal voters. The memorialists deplore the derangement of our currency, occasioned, as they believe, by the hostile attitude assumed by the administration against the Bank of the United States. To show, sir, the disastrous influence of the late rash measure of the Executive, I will make a short statistical extract from the statements of my correspondents. The number of spindles in operation, in 1832, was 43,439. Owing to the extreme pressure of the times, the proprietors of 24,580 spindles in Paterson, and 5,130 in its immediate vicinity, have been obliged to suspend their operations. The number of spindles now stopped would have required an annual supply of 2,200,000 lbs. of cotton. In view of these results, I beg leave to ask, can it be, sir, that they have been produced by a factitious panic, manufactured here? Can it be, that a mere artificial excitement has silenced the shuffle, paralyzed enterprise, and driven thousands of my fellow-citizens upon an almost hopeless search after employment? When gentlemen make these statements, I respectfully insist upon excepting my constituents from its operation. Sir, they are made of sterner material than to wait for indications here or any where, to regulate their judgments or prompt their feelings. They are not quite so pliant as to be calm or excited, to approve or condemn, as shall be the bidding of this body. Sir, they do believe in the existence of a real, deep-felt, and pervading injury, inflicted in the pride of passion and power. They believe too, sir, that the injury has chiefly arisen from the manner in which it has been committed! The hostile attitude of the Government against a fiscal agent, prosecuting a business to the amount of two hundred millions, and identified with the commerce of the whole country, could not but alarm the fears of the community. When they perceived the arm of power raised against this institution—when early notes of denunciation were sent forth from the official organ—when the agent was despatched to prepare the preliminary steps—when the threat is distinctly proclaimed to the American people, that the bank shall be put down—still more, when the triumph is actually sounded, that it is down—prostrated, at the feet of the Secretary—why, who could be so perversely insensible, as not to have certainly expected, that all this would shake the public confidence, and penetrate every breast with alarm, and bring the mind and feelings of the people almost to convulsion?

And, Mr. President, I have the consolation to know that many of those in the confidence of the Executive, think as I do, of this measure. The honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER,] of whom I may say, without disparagement, that no Senator more ably sustains and vindicates the policy of the administration, informed us, some time since, that he could not have advised to the removal of the public deposits in the time and manner of the act; and, on yesterday, his honorable colleague assured us, that in a recent journey through six of our States, he ascertained that the public very generally condemned the course of the Executive, on this subject; and the latter gentleman thought that, had we been content to call it a mistake, instead of an encroachment, there would have been a decided expression of dissatisfaction by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. Now, sir, with all this amount of adverse opinion, I am instructed by the legislature of New Jersey to sustain, by "my votes and influence, the course of the Secretary of the Treasury!" When the administration shall harmonize with itself on this point; when its best friends shall conclude to approve of the course of the Secretary, then, sir, I will think of the matter more seriously. But, until then, I choose, with the independence of a freeman, to follow the lead of my own sincere and deep conviction. And yet, so tender are the sensibilities of gentlemen, that the language of complaint has become a burden; and we were advised weeks ago to an acquiescing and submissive silence. We were told, that we had done nothing but complain. Although this charge was attended by the notice that the deposits would not be restored, that the present bank would not be re-chartered, and no other national bank chartered; yet the advice was reiterated, that it would better become us to sit down quietly, and not disturb the nerves of power. Sir, we are almost prepared for the chains, when such language can be heard without resistance. We intend to complain, loudly and long. We will sound the note of alarm in its highest key, until it drives its echoes into every valley, over every hill, and strikes upon every heart. We will ring it, too, in the ear of power—if it will not heed, it shall hear. And should the people, as they may, decide, in the issues of the poll-box, that Executive encroachment shall prevail, and push on its pretensions, the rich consolation will remain to us, that, as sentinels of liberty, we gave them faithful warning.

Mr. President, I have another duty to perform, in presenting a counter memorial from Paterson, and its vicinity, signed by more than six hundred memorialists. The committee who enclosed this memorial to me, are respectable gentlemen, and their statements are entitled to full confidence. I am not informed as to the extent of the neighborhood embraced in the scope of the memorial. These memorialists admit the public distress, but ascribe it to the hostile and vindictive conduct of the bank. I am also charged with certain resolutions from a public meeting, held at Rockaway, in the county of Morris, approving of the removal of the deposits. I move, sir, that all these documents be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN said, there was not a man who regarded the right of petition on the part of the people, and the obligation of their representatives to hear it, as more sacred than himself. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] need not have informed us that he intended to sound the notes of alarm. Mr. B. admitted that the notes of alarm were not to be sounded, but that they had been sounded, for the last three or four months, in language used to overawe the Congress of the Union.

This not being availing, the language of supplication had been resorted to, and the gentleman from Kentucky had recommended you, sir, to go to the Executive, and supplicate him to retrace his steps. The gentleman from New Jersey seemed to think that public opinion was against the administration; but, so far as that had been experienced in its proper form—so far as the legislative expressions were an index to public opinion, it was strongly in favor of the administration. And the legislature of New Jersey, too, had passed approbatory resolutions, and, so far as they were an exponent of the public will there, it was also in favor of the administration. But he had just heard language used here—Senators rising in their places and threatening revolution—which struck him with some surprise. The gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] a few days since, stated that there were two remedies for the alleged evils—one by the ballot-box, and the other the right of revolution; that his constituents had strong arms and stout hearts, for taking the means of redress in their own hands. And whom did this extraordinary language proceed from? Why, from gentlemen who were constantly ringing in our ears a reverence for the laws and the constitution. While in one breath the Executive was charged with trampling the laws and the constitution in the dust, they were in the next inviting freemen to rally under the flag of rebellion, and yet they are the exclusive guardians of the law and the constitution. If he had no other objection than this to the bank, the daily events which are passing before our eyes would make him its opponent. The bank was shaking this free Government to its centre, and its partisans and friends were threatening revolution. The power to create a bank was of the most doubtful character, and to say that the constitution granted a power which was capable of producing this state of things, was a libel on the wisdom and patriotism of its framers.

The bank was operating on the liberties of this country to a greater extent than all the delegated powers in the constitution put together, were capable of doing. He needed no other arguments to establish its unconstitutionality than this. It had been said by honorable gentlemen, that the question of constitutionality had been settled. But he did not regard it as settled. In 1810 or '11, the Congress of the United States decided against it. He admitted the decision in its favor by the Supreme Court of the United States, and while as a citizen he would yield every respect and obedience to that decision, yet as a Senator here, he would yield to no judicial decision. He would recognise its doctrines only to the extent that they were founded on reason, and no further. Suppose the legislative branches of the Government were to submit to the Supreme Court, that court would absorb all the powers of Congress. He was opposed to the existence of the bank, or the prolongation of its existence in any shape. He viewed it as a question of liberty. It had undertaken to harass the people, to overawe Congress, and should we present the spectacle of yielding to its menaces? He held, that to give it a single day of life beyond the time specified in its charter, was to compromise the constitution and the independence of the people. The people owed it to themselves to vindicate themselves from the gross libel which had been promulgated against them, that they could not get along without the bank—and to show to the world that the sources of their prosperity were in their industry, and the fertility of the soil, and the genial climate of the country. But he had heard another expression from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, equally alarming, that Congress should be kept here without rising, unless some relief should be devised. What, sir, have we arrived at such a period, that Congress should be compelled to sit longer than ever it had done before, only on account of the bank? This was not the least alarming of the expressions we had heard. Mr. B. contended that it was high time to take a decided stand against the bank. We were told that the distress was accumulating, and that we must listen to the will of the people. But gentlemen were greatly mistaken if they supposed that the people were to be driven to submit. In proportion to their distresses, the people would feel an elasticity of spirit which would enable them to surmount them. They would manifest the same feeling which they did when this Capitol was in flames, during the last war—they would only be roused to greater exertion to overcome the evil.

New Jersey Petitions.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CLAYTON said, that, after what had fallen from the member from North Carolina, it became necessary for him to offer some remarks, though nothing had been farther from his expectations than to be called upon to take any part in this accidental discussion. The honorable member who has just taken his seat was present when the observation fell from me, which is now by him made the subject of comment. It drew from him, at the moment, no reply; but now, after the lapse of more than a week from the time that observation was made, the honorable member comes again into the Senate, and, while another subject is under discussion, refers to, and rebukes my remark, while, at the same time, he proves that either, after this lapse of time, he has forgotten it, or that, at the moment it was made, he misunderstood it.

What I said, sir, was spoken in the spirit of admonition to those who govern this country, not to drive the people to despair. So far from inciting the revolution, as others have done before, who now preach the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance, my remarks were calculated to repress a spirit of insurrection, until tyranny should become intolerable. My position was, that, in this country, Government was, or should be, subject to the will of the people; that their will, however now resisted, must eventually be obeyed; and that, whether relying on the quiet exercise of the elective franchise to resist an Executive army at the polls, or eventually impelled to the exercise of the right of revolution, they would be their own deliverers from oppression. I did endeavor to warn those in power that there was nothing yet in the moral or physical condition of my countrymen, to sink them into the sullen apathy of an enslaved populace. My remark, that the people had the means of redress in their own hands against intolerable oppression, was not confined, as the gentleman supposes, to my constituents, but extended to his own, and to all American freemen; and it was intended, while, as I supposed, it was by all so understood at the time it was uttered, as a salutary warning to men in power, and all their abettors in this House, to beware, lest they goaded a generous, gallant, and intrepid people beyond the point where patience ceases to be a virtue.

Sir, I again warn the honorable member and his political associates to beware. The people of this country may tamely bear, as he hopes they will, the ruin of commerce and the prostration of all the other great interests of the trading and business part of the community, but will they tolerate the overthrow of the constitution and the laws? Will they quietly submit to Executive usurpation, after it has absorbed all the other powers of the Government, both legislative and judicial? I tell the honorable member, that while I and my friends proudly acknowledge the title he has conferred upon us, of guardians of the laws and the constitution, we do, in perfect consistency with our professions, at the same time "threaten revolution"—not, sir, to subvert the laws—not to overthrow the constitution—not to break down the institutions of our country—but such a revolution as will bring back this Government to the true principles of the constitution, and make it not the plunderer, but the protector of the people. And, educated as I have been in the belief that resistance to tyranny is an inalienable right of man, whenever the constitution and laws are trampled under foot, and the Government is reduced to a despotism, I hold that the American people are authorized to relieve themselves from it by force. If this is inciting to revolution, let the gentleman make the most of it. Sir, a recurrence to these principles may be unpleasant to those in power. It was not less so in the earlier stages of the American revolution, when the best patriots of the land poured their ineffectual admonitions into the ears of power. But it is now rather too late in the day to denounce those as rebels who take occasion to admonish tyranny to stop in its mad career over the prostrated laws and the violated constitution. At the same time, I will take occasion to say to the honorable member, that his own observations, made even at the very moment when he was delivering his lecture on passive obedience, were, in a high degree, disorganizing, and calculated to incite to rebellion; for he unequivocally denounced the decision of the Supreme Court, which had established the constitutionality of the bank charter, and roundly told us that the decisions of that exalted tribunal should have no effect with him. The honorable member must change his own course here, and make his own practice more conformable to his preaching, before he acquires the power to lecture with effect on this subject.

Mr. SWIFT, in explanation, said, that if the honorable Senator [Mr. Brown] had intended to attribute to him the expression on which he had commented, he could only say that he did not recollect having used any such expression. If the gentleman from North Carolina meant to ascribe to him the expression, by way of threat, that the people were about to rise in revolution, and rebellion, he would assure the gentleman that no such thought had been in his mind. He could assure the Senate, as well as the gentleman himself, that no such idea had ever been entertained by him. What he had said was, that the people believed that Congress had the power to give relief to the country, and that the evils which had been brought upon them by the Executive, were the consequence not merely of the removal of the deposits, but also of the hostile attitude which the Executive had taken against the institution. He had represented that the people believed that Congress had full power; and he had said, still further, that if Congress did not use that power to relieve them, they would take it into their own hands. He had never thought of rebellion or revolution. There was another way, by which the people could bring Congress to yield to their complaints. He had said that the people stand ready and prepared to resist every encroachment of power. The people of Vermont, although willing to endure, to their full share, all necessary privation for the benefit of the country, would always stand ready to resist any encroachment of power. And if the expression of this fact was to encourage or invoke rebellion, then he knew not what it was to do so. He presumed that the gentleman from North Carolina would admit that the people had a right to resist any unlawful exercise of power. In reply to this, he should only say, that his intention was to assert this right for the people, and to say that they would, in a certain contingency, take the power into their own hands.

Mr. BROWN said, that the observations of the Senator from Delaware called for a few observations from him. That gentleman had reproved him for adverting now to some remarks which had fallen from that gentleman a week since, and which he (Mr. B.) had not referred to at the time. He would not even now have noticed those observations, but for remarks of a similar tendency which had this morning fallen from other gentlemen. The gentleman from Delaware had charged him with having misunderstood his observations. Now, he thought that after what had fallen from the gentleman from Delaware, they must have perfectly understood each other. That gentleman had said, that, if the people did not operate on Congress through the polls, there was another mode, and that was by the exercise of their right of revolution. The gentleman had now said, that his assertion was, that the people would obtain redress at all events, even if it was by revolution. It appeared, therefore, that they perfectly understood each other. The gentleman from Delaware went on to talk about passive obedience and non-resistance, and the language of our fathers at the period of the revolution. All this was precisely of the same tendency, and reminded him of the old menace—"peaceably, if we can, forcibly, if we must." If ever the time should come when rebellion should lift its crest among us, the great mass of our intelligent citizens would be found scowling on all those who invited them to the standard of resistance. They would rally around the constitution, and struggle to save it from profanation and overthrow. Mr. B. said he was as much the opponent of passive obedience as any gentleman on that floor. He admitted the right of the citizen to resist encroachments of power to its fullest extent, but every individual must exercise that right at his own hazard. He had been charged by the gentleman from Delaware with using language more calculated to produce revolution than any which had been adopted by gentlemen on the other side, and his opinion concerning the Supreme Court was referred to as the proof. What he had said was, that, on this floor, acting in his legislative capacity, he should expound the constitution for himself, without yielding implicit deference to the decisions of the Supreme Court. Would the gentleman from Delaware himself, sent here to legislate on matters of public concernment, consent to throw all his legislative powers at the feet of this tribunal? What would be the consequence of such submission? No matter how unconstitutional might be the decisions of that tribunal, the Supreme Court would always be able to sustain them, and carry them into effect. As a citizen, he should always be disposed to submit to the judicial tribunals, but not here, in his legislative character. That would be more than the case justified. It was the opinion of the illustrious Jefferson, that the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government should be independent of the Judiciary. This opinion would be found recorded in the case of Madison vs. Marbury.

The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] had charged him with seeing danger in the influence of the Bank of the United States, while he could see no danger from the White House. Now, he would only reply, that he had not been able to see, with that keen and determined vision which some gentlemen seemed to possess, that there had been any such usurpation of authority by the President as was attributed to him. He entertained the opinion that the Executive possessed a full and plenary power to withdraw the deposits, and they who contended that he had no such power, contended for investing power in a more dangerous source—for putting all powers at the disposal of the bank. That idea, if carried out, went to give, not only the custody, but almost the property, of the deposits, to the bank. Therefore, it was a power much more dangerous than any which could be exercised by the Executive. The President was made responsible to the people at the end of every four years; and, if any abuse came under the review of the people, they could, at their pleasure, condemn the Executive, and discharge him from their service. The acts of the Executive were always visible, and before the eyes of the American people. If he discharged his duties unfaithfully, they could examine, and stamp the infidelity with their reprobation, as he was made responsible to them every four years. Not so was it with the institution which was before the Senate. That had been chartered for a term of twenty years, and there was no way to reach it. How different were these two sources of power in their character! The acts of the Executive were open to the investigation of the people; while the course of the bank was secret, hidden, and unknown; insinuating itself through a thousand channels, and into places which he would not name; and corrupting the public press, in a manner which the public eye could not trace. It was an influence of the most pernicious character, which was felt all over the country, although it was not every where seen whence the shock proceeded. It was in this great machine that the danger existed, which menaced the whole country; and if its existence was sanctioned by re-charter, it was vain to attempt to control its operations. The gentlemen on the other side might talk as they pleased about chartered rights, stipulations, contracts, and the like; but he could find nothing in the conduct of the President, in reference to these points, which was not justifiable. The bank was, in every view, a dangerous, powerful, and irresponsible agent, while the responsibility of the President was returned to the people at the end of every four years.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he had sought in vain to make himself intelligible to the member from North Carolina. That gentleman persists in the declaration, which has been as often refuted as it has been made on this floor, that the majority of this Senate are the mere advocates of the bank; that, on this great question, we are looking only to its interests and seeking only to protect its rights. But, the subject of our complaint is, that the constitution and the laws are violated—not merely that the rights of the bank and its stockholders have been disregarded. Will the honorable gentleman understand me when I say that the American people are justified in resisting encroachments on the constitution and the laws, by a revolution, whenever, in their judgment, the oppression arising from that encroachment has become intolerable? If he understands me, will he, dare he, deny their right? He imputes to me what I have never said, when he assails a remark of mine as bearing the interpretation that, for an invasion of the private rights of the stockholders in the bank, the resistance of the American people is ever to be expected.

Mr. C. then entered into an argument to demonstrate the injustice of some recent attacks on the bank, and particularly examined the power of the Executive; which is now contending against it. He alluded, in the course of his remarks, to the anecdote related by the gentlemen from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] a few days ago, who compared certain gentlemen here, complaining of the public distress, with a Methodist preacher exhorting his congregation: "Groan, sinners! groan!" He observed that there were certain politicians here and elsewhere who had no occasion for admonitions from the pulpit to cause them to groan. The groans of the gentleman from Georgia, and of all those in office politically associated with him, were so audible, that no exhortation could be deemed necessary to cause them bitterly to repent of that act of folly which had brought the country into such a state of excitement as gave them an assurance that their days of power were numbered.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that here we had notice given us that cries of alarm would be raised, for the purpose of addressing Congress, and adding to the groans of distress. What, Mr. F. asked, is the result? Without distinction of party, the people had assembled together, and here was the result. He should think this notice would be sufficient to convince gentlemen that they are entirely under a misapprehension as to the real state of opinion among the people on this subject. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FARRINGTON] had thought proper to make a long speech, in the course of which he intimated, that public opinion was against the administration in regard to the removal of the deposits. But he (Mr. F.) asked how it was with the honorable Senator's own State? Why, there, two cheers had been given for the administration, to one groan against it. The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] had told the Senate that, in his judgment, in a very short time, a certain class (Mr. F. supposed the Senator meant his opponents) would be seen to groan for their sins without being called upon. He congratulated the gentleman for that agreeable anticipation. Our turn, said Mr. F., may come next; but I think it will never come. Did not the honorable Senator from New Jersey perceive that his (Mr. F.'s) situation was very embarrassing? and yet the gentleman wished to widen the breach. The honorable Senator had mistaken him entirely; he did not say that he condemned the removal of the deposites: what he did say he would now repeat. He (Mr. F.) had said that, if he had been one of the constitutional advisers of the President, he should have recommended delay. As a party man, he regretted that this delay did not take place. For the country, he did not know but that the decision of the President was the best. Circumstances, that were mere speculations at the time he had last addressed the Senate, were now known to be facts; and it obviously appeared to him, that the President did not mistake the public sentiment on this subject, as had been imagined by some honorable Senators. He, Mr. F., had another cause of complaint against his honorable friend [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] who had said that he complained of the "complaints"—that complaints are unpleasant to the ear of power. [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, he did not refer to the honorable gentleman from Georgia.] Mr. F. resumed: He had certainly understood the honorable Senator as referring to him. One thing, however, was certain, and let honorable Senators recollect it, that, if this people—this suffering people—had any cause to complain of a delay in obtaining relief for their distresses, so far as the Senate was concerned, the sin lay at its door.

It was in vain for honorable gentlemen to say that they were waiting for a plan of relief from the President or the administration; for they knew the sentiments of the administration; they knew that they did not correspond with their views. Honorable Senators on the other side have the power: the friends of the administration are in a minority. Why, then, did they not act? They had said pretty distinctly, the last day or two, that the reason they did not act here, was because they were waiting to obtain, at the other end of the building, a majority corresponding with that they possess here. Now, this was all very well, if gentlemen supposed that by delay they could induce the representatives of the people in the other House to go with them. We should see with what success this experiment would be attended. He conceived it to be impossible for gentlemen to shut their eyes to the fact, that the question of the removal of the deposites involved that of the re-charter of the bank. If honorable Senators were blind now, their eyes would be opened in a very short time. He should think that enough had been doing in a neighboring city, and a neighboring State, to enlighten honorable Senators as to the fate of the question. Here, one of the largest States in the Union had spoken by its legislature, which expressed itself unanimously resolved against re-chartering this bank. And what now was the public sentiment in that State? There was a complete conversion—a thorough change of opinion, and the cry rung from one end of Pennsylvania to the other: "Down with the bank—down with the bank!" This, he should have supposed, would have been quite enough to satisfy honorable Senators that their anticipations were entirely without foundation. When honorable Senators speak of the distress there is in the country, and condole with the people for the sufferings they are undergoing, did they look to the light which was now breaking ahead? From the desire honorable Senators had manifested to prostrate the power of which they had so often spoken, he must suppose they were not sorry that the Executive experiment had been tried. Supposing the country did suffer—that a money pressure was felt through all classes of society—that there were bankruptcies and broken banks, and some widows and orphans reduced to distress—what mattered it: for was there not a glorious consolation for all this? The tyrant despot was to be hurled from his seat, and those who were his friends would be defeated! He believed honorable gentlemen were entirely mistaken as to the effect they supposed would be produced on the popular opinion, and the issue of the question which they were now taking before the people of the United States. We, however, should shortly see.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said, the honorable Senator from Georgia had charged him with having made a long speech. Now he was sorry that it had been so uninteresting to him. He (Mr. F.) had occupied in the necessary statements, speech, &c. but ten minutes by the clock. The honorable Senator had some days ago ventured to read us a lecture, for making speeches on the presentation of memorials, saying it was out of order—that the rule of the Senate was against it, and that it was consuming time unnecessarily. And, by way of practical commentary, the gentleman struck into the debate and has been talking almost ever since. If he (Mr. F.) had inflicted a long speech upon the Senate, he had only fallen into the common mistake of doing as the gentleman does, and not as he says. With regard to the complaint of the honorable Senator, that his (Mr. F.'s) remarks, relative to his course, were calculated to render his situation more embarrassing: now, he could assure the honorable Senator, that he entertained no design to aggravate that embarrassment; but the gentleman would please to recollect that his own situation might be as embarrassing. Yet he had thought proper to say, in pretty pointed terms, that he (Mr. F.) ought to look at his instructions, as he might be brought to a reckoning by his constituents.

Mr. F. said he thought he had used the terms employed by the gentleman from Georgia himself, in reference to the subject of the removal of the deposites, that "he should not have advised the measure." If he had done any injustice to the honorable Senator, in what he had stated, he regretted it. He would promise the only reparation in his power. He expected that, by the time the wheel (which had been mentioned several times) had taken a few more turns, the gentleman from Georgia would also receive instructions, and if they should happen to cross his path, he (Mr. F.) would do all he could to comfort him, and would drop a word of consolation in his ear and in his heart.

With regard to the memorials from the State of New Jersey, he did not think it becoming the occasion to make any further statements than he did make, when he was first on the floor. In consequence of the rupture between the parties he had before mentioned, who had met in the county of Morris, to address Congress on this subject, the opposers of the late act of the Government had adopted strong measures to obtain what they considered a fair expression of the public opinion. They had circulated memorials in their county, and obtained more than five hundred names—consisting of the business men of that section of the country. He (Mr. F.) thought it due to the Senate to state this fact. The memorial would very soon be in its possession, and then it would be seen how stood the public sentiment.

Mr. FORSYTH said that, from the situation in which the honorable Senator from New Jersey stands, the Lord send him a safe deliverance!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN remarked: I trust he will—such is my confidence.

Mr. SPRAGUE said, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] seemed to express some satisfaction that all the groans of distress proceeded from those opposed to the administration; but he had not proceeded five sentences before he disclosed some symptoms of distress. He said that his own situation was sufficiently embarrassing, and deprecated any remarks from the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] which might aggravate his condition. Sir, (said Mr. S.,) the remedy for his embarrassment is obvious, if he will but consent to adopt it. He (Mr. S.) did not rise, at that time, for the purpose of prolonging the debate, but simply to protest against the remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] in which that gentleman had imputed to him (Mr. S.) and to others, sentiments which they utterly repudiated. He (Mr. F.) had said that those who opposed the administration, were not sorry that the "experiment" was to be tried, because it would have the effect, in their opinion, of injuring the administration in the public estimation. Now, he undertook to say, that the gentleman was not authorized to make any such assertion with respect to himself and those who acted with him. It was an inference not warranted by the premises. He deeply lamented that the Executive had ever tried an experiment by which the happiness and prosperity of the people were so fearfully hazarded. It may be true, as the gentleman says, that we see some gleams of consolation in the distance; we may hope that this experiment is not to be productive of unmixed evil—that the future is not enveloped in utter darkness. But that they rejoiced in this experiment, he denied; it was not so. The opposition deeply lamented the causes which had produced the present state of things; and he believed sincerely they would arrest the evils so widely spread, and so loudly complained of, even if the effect should be to perpetuate power in the hands of those who now held it. He protested against these ideas, continually held out by the gentleman from Georgia; and resolving every thing into personal and party views. The gentleman has explained away his opposition to the measures of the Executive in relation to the bank, by saying that he had not opposed them, though, as a party man, he would not have given them his support. Sir, if the gentleman was not giving them his support, why was he so often found in conflict with gentlemen opposing those measures, and denying the extent of the distress existing in the country? We have heard (said Mr. S.) the magnanimous declaration of the colleague of the gentleman, [Mr. KING,] that in passing through various sections of the country, he had heard these measures of the Executive deeply deplored by all classes and conditions of persons, without exception of party; and we have heard also from the same gentleman the candid and frank expression of his opinion, that, had it not been for the strong language used in the halls of Congress, a majority of two-thirds of both Houses would be found ready to vote for the restoration of the deposits.

But the gentleman [Mr. FORSYTH] believed that the public voice would sanction the measures of the Executive. He trusted that the gentleman would in the end find himself mistaken; he heard with different organs from those as attentive to the public voice as himself: he drew his conclusions differently from others, equally as well informed of public sentiment, and as capable of forming a correct judgment from the evidences before them. He (Mr. S.) believed that manifestations of public sentiment were not to be taken from the language of politicians and office-holders; but must be judged of from the business men, whose stakes were great in the interests of the country; and from such men as those last mentioned, a voice would be heard, distinct, and clear, and unequivocal. It has been heard in memorials from thousands and tens of thousands of citizens from various portions of the Union. Sir, said Mr. S., I deeply lament, (in contradiction to the idea intended to be conveyed to us by the gentleman from Georgia,) that the Executive has thought fit to pursue the rash, ruinous, and ill-advised measures which have produced such bitter results among a once happy and prosperous people; I deeply lament that he has declared that all those who trade on a borrowed capital, ought to break; a declaration striking a death-blow at the hopes and prospects of an industrious and virtuous community. When he looked upon that portion of his fellow-citizens who carried on their business on a borrowed capital—men newly engaged in trade, and industriously striving for an honest and virtuous independence—and heard the declaration of the Executive, that they ought to break, because they dealt on borrowed capital; that they must be ruined, and driven to uselessness and despair, [because their means were but small—he could not, he said, but deeply feel, that destruction was threatened to the happiness, the business, nay, to the very existence, of a vast portion of virtuous and useful men, who lived in the section of the country he had the honor to represent. He would not permit the idea to go to his constituents, that he had rejoiced at the ill-judged measures of the Executive, notwithstanding the injurious consequences to them, through any considerations of a party nature; he would not permit his constituents to be told that he was willing for this experiment of the Executive, so ruinous to them, to be tried, under the hopes, thereby, of breaking down this administration. The gentleman had said, that all the delay in bringing forward some measure of relief was to be ascribed to the Senate; and he, Mr. S., submitted it to all who heard him, whether the Senate had the power to administer the relief required; whether the majority had not shown the strongest desire to adopt some measures to relieve the country from its distressing situation. He was sure that this would readily be admitted by all. He asked the gentleman what the Senate could do?—what measure they could bring forward, under present circumstances, that would be likely to receive the Executive sanction? He, for his part, was ready and anxious to go for any proposition at all calculated to produce any beneficial results.

Mr. FORSYTH said he had listened to the formal denials and protests of the Senator from Maine. No one, however, knew the motives of the honorable gentleman but himself. Now, when he, Mr. F., recollected the course that the honorable Senator had pursued for the last four years, and his repeated charges against the Government for violations of the constitution, a disregard of the public faith and the public honor, he must have a strangely constituted mind if he did not desire that the administration, and all its friends, should be turned out of office. Where was the injustice of supposing that gleams of consolation could enter the gentleman's mind, as to the public distress, when he saw the period fast approaching when retribution would come upon the tyrant whom he had been assailing for the last four years! He, Mr. F., would ask, was the honorable Senator blind to his own motive? was he conscious of his course here?—of the coloring which he gave to public measures on every occasion against the Executive, in all the acts that he performed? The gentleman may shut his eyes to the operations of his own mind, but there were others who saw them. By what right did the gentleman, when he recollected full well what had been his own course, undertake to call individuals to task?—not being content with attacking the party to which he was opposed. He, Mr. F., would ask if honorable Senators were not justified in pursuing the same course by that honorable Senator's example? The honorable Senator was too much disposed to impugn the motives of his opponents. Let the Senators look at his [Mr. SPRAGUE'S] own conduct for the last five years, then they would be enabled to judge of his motives. The honorable Senator had said, that he (Mr. F.) misapprehended public opinion in the State of Maine. Now, he did not think so. The people there had spoken in a language sufficiently plain, even to the clear ears of the gentleman from Maine. He, Mr. F., had been complaining of others groaning, and yet he groaned himself. The gentleman from Maine did not understand irony, it appeared. It was an ironical observation, which he, Mr. F., made to his honorable friend, [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN.] Now, as to what was said in regard to the situation in which he, Mr. F., stands, he would merely say, that he would not change places with the honorable Senator, and those who acted with him; he thought it a particularly fortunate condition—one which placed him above the considerations of party; a situation in which he had always stood, and would continue always to stand, by the help of God, as a public man.

Mr. SPRAGUE, in reply, said, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] saw fit to make the declaration, that all those who were opposed to this measure—and the gentleman was not unaware that he, Mr. S., was one of them—were not sorry that it had been adopted. He had repelled that declaration; he had declared that the gentlemen had no warrant for such an assertion; and how does the gentleman reply? By his usual tactics of eluding the real question, and presenting a new issue. The gentleman asks with a tone of triumph, if I have not, for the last five years, been opposed to the administration, and if I do not know that I have a desire to see it condemned by the public voice? Undoubtedly, sir. And was it against any such declaration that I protested? Does the gentleman mean to contend, that, because a member is opposed to the administration, he must of course rejoice at every species of misrule that may tend to bring them into discredit? Is that the gentleman's conception of the true relation between means and ends? Must I, because opposed to the administration, rejoice to see flagrant outrages upon the constitution and the laws, and ruin and devastation spread over the country? It is because of the measures of the administration, that I am opposed to it. I lament them deeply—profoundly lament them. The gentleman, in violation of the usual courtesy of debate, chooses to impugn motives; and asserts that I have no right to complain of this, because I have committed the same sin in times gone by. He deals in generals, he does not particularize. The assertion is as vague as I believe it to be unfounded. Sir, I have never knowingly assailed the motives of any member or members of the Senate in debate; I have never departed from that decorum that belongs to this place; and if the gentleman had supposed that I had, and would have pointed it out at the time, he should have received my thanks. I invite him now to the specification of a single instance. He will find no apology for his course in my example; and I owe him no obligation for a general assertion to that effect, made at this time to suit his present exigency.

The gentleman has been pleased to advert, gratuitously, to the sentiments of my constituents, in a spirit of kindness, no doubt, and he assumes the tone of infallibility—he is Sir Oracle: as to their opinions, he declares he cannot be mistaken. Although what is impossible “rarely comes to pass,” yet the gentleman may, perhaps, find himself mistaken, and his infallibility at an end. He may find, and I trust will find, that the republican people of Maine will condemn this high-handed and disastrous measure. Sir, I well know the position which I occupy in the Senate, and in relation to the State which sent me here. I know the people of Maine—I know their republicanism—their original, deep, and unwavering devotion to republican principles. I know the efforts—systematic, persevering efforts—which have been made to deceive, and mislead them. These efforts have not been without some success. The truth has not been known—the press, and other sources upon which they have relied for information, have suppressed facts and communicated fictions—and thus opinions have been formed, prejudices taken up, upon a basis of error and deception. I have acted here as I verily believe that people would have done, if they had been in my place. Sir, if they could have been here to see what I have seen, and know what I have known, I would give my body to the flames, I would give my neck to the halter, if they would not have supported and approved the general course of my public conduct in this body. They have not seen, they have not known, they have no belief or conception of the true state of public and political affairs here.

The information which I acquired here I was bound to use for the benefit of that people and the country. I owed them the devoted exercise of whatever of intellect or knowledge it had pleased Heaven to bestow. I have most conscientiously discharged that duty, even against the opinions or prejudices of a portion of that State. I have done it at the known hazard of my political life. I have never been blind to that result. I have made the sacrifice voluntarily, freely, and I have not now one feeling of regret. That it has been most disinterested, all must know, and none, I trust, can have the hardihood to deny. What interest had I to oppose this administration? If I had had any objects of office or ambition to gratify, was not the path plain, and the way broad in an opposite direction? Could I not have looked around me here, and in the other House, and seen who were the recipients of Executive favors? And when to Presidential influence was added the course of the legislature of the State, could I not have had abundant apology for subservience to Executive will? Thus situated, between the Executive and the legislature, what had I to urge me onward in my course but the deliberate convictions of my understanding, the voice of conscience, the dictates of duty? The gentleman from Georgia much mistakes, if he supposes that I have any reluctance to any but the severest scrutiny into all my political actions. I am very willing that my course and position should be contrasted with his, cheered as he is by being on the side of power, a power too liberal in dispensing favors and patronage; and when the gentleman chooses to impute motives to others, others may perhaps take the liberty to form an opinion of his own.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the observations he had made were general, while the gentleman from Maine had applied them individually. He (Mr. F.) thought he had stated the issue very truly, and did not expect to be misunderstood. He did not now intend to pursue this subject any further; but he would call to the recollection of the gentleman, that the view which he took of those who hold on to power and patronage, was confined within a very few years. He thought, if the gentleman would go back for a very few years, and cast his eyes on their respective positions, the gentleman himself would be found in support of the powers that be. What was the object of gentlemen calling out devotion to the powers that be? Was it not to excite distrust in the people towards those in power? Was it not their object that power should change hands? The gentleman mistakes the people of the United States; they alone have the power, and they will bestow it where and on whom they please. It is as easy to get office from the people, as to obtain some petty office from the Chief Magistrate. If there be any man who prefers the latter, let him bow down to those in power, and let me serve the people rather than cringe for office. My aim rises higher.

Mr. SHEPLEY said, he felt inclined to make a very few remarks, in consequence of what had fallen from his colleague; in doing so, he should endeavor to speak with that calmness and moderation, which he hoped would ever characterize him. In considering the political parties of the present day, he looked back to the pe-rior of the last war with Great Britain, and he was then, unfortunately, placed in the condition to have heard much, felt much, and experienced much, that was now daily presented to him. All the menaces, all the denunciations, and all the terrors of the present day, were then, as now, held out to those who sustained the administration. He had heard, then, that the powers of the General Government must not, should not, be supported; and that, if the ballot-box should prove insufficient, then physical force would be resorted to, to revolutionize the country. It was not a new thing for him to hear these doctrines advanced from Vermont and Delaware; it was a story coming to him from days long gone by; and it was now vain and idle to suppose it would have more effect with him than in those dark days, because he had the same judgment as then, with much more of experience. He did not intend to allude to the politics of his State, further than to express his regret that his colleague [Mr. SPRAGUE] had thought proper to predict what would be the political opinions of Maine in time to come. This, he said, was not new to him, for, if he had not heard much of it here, he had heard of it before he left home; but the prophecy had not yet been accomplished. It was more than any gentleman had a right to ask, that he should believe, notwithstanding the evidence he possessed, that a majority of the people of Maine were not in favor of the administration: though he was not authorized to say what the opinions of that people would be at a future day. He had no mode of judging of the future but from the present and the past; and, judging from these, it appeared to him there was no authority for the belief, that a different political character would be presented by his constituents than that now seen. It had been the pleasure of his colleague to speak of the prejudices of the people of Maine; but what advantage, Mr. S. asked, did he gain by such remarks? How many years had the majority in Maine been found in support of the party now in power? Had they adhered to the administration without reason? How many years had it been since they were opposed to the present dominant party? And now, since they are found in support of the administration, was it not in consequence of reason and reflection, and not from passion or prejudice? How was it, that all these charges and proclamations of violated laws, and usurpations of authority, had been heard all over the country, and the people of Maine giving their voice and countenance to none of them? They believed that their interests had been better sustained, and their prospects were more favorable, under this administration, than under any other; and though they may be, at this particular time, and probably are, suffering under a slight depression of credit and suspension of business, yet, so far from attributing these embarrassments to the administration, they will give evidences that they are a reasoning and reflecting people, by showing their knowledge and information of the true sources from whence their embarrassments proceed.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that the gentleman from Georgia had availed himself of his usual adroitness and subtlety of evasion. The assertion was that those opposed to this measure were glad that the experiment was making. It was denied. And now the gentleman says he met the issue which I presented, and which he says related to myself; and he met it by saying that I was opposed to the administration. The issue was made by the denial, and not by collateral and distinct matter of opposition to the administration. The gentleman says that he has been opposed to the administration the greater part of his political life. Be it so. I shall not contest it. It is my pride and boast that I have supported every republican administration, and oppose this because its measures are anti-republican and violate the constitution and the laws.

The Senator had remarked that the Executive was not the only fountain of office; that it might be obtained from the people. True, sir; and it is too often obtained by flattering and deceiving them. There may be sycophants who sacrifice their judgment and conscience, to obtain office from the people as well as from the Executive. I glory, sir, that I have never solicited office or power from either. My colleague [Mr. SHEPHERD] has remarked that he is not authorized to predict what will be the sentiments of our constituents. Nor am I; and in this we both seem to differ from the gentleman from Georgia, who, as to their opinions, was sure that he was infallible. My colleague had repeated the word prejudices. I have as high an opinion, as full a conviction, of the intelligence and integrity of our common constituents as he can have. But, sir, they are men. I cannot flatter that community, nor any fallible mortals, by telling them that they are infallible—that they may not, from the imperfection of our nature, be subject to prejudice and misled by error. Mr. S. said, in conclusion, that he had never voluntarily spoken of himself, or of his own position. It was a subject which he did not feel himself at liberty to obtrude upon the Senate; but, if others saw fit to advert to it, he certainly had no objection. He was willing, he was desirous, that it should be universally known and fully understood.

The motion to refer the memorials, and to print them, with the names, was then agreed to.

After disposing of some other memorials, resolutions, &c., the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and continued therein till half past five o'clock, when the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12.

MEMORIAL FROM PETERSBURG.

Mr. LEIGH said he rose to present a memorial on the subject which had so long agitated, was still agitating, and would, he feared, but too long continue to distract this great and lately flourishing country; the Senate would understand, of course, that he alluded to the subject of the depositories. It was a memorial from the merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and other citizens of the town of Petersburg, in Virginia; a town always distinguished for its steady adherence to republican principles, and which, he took upon himself to say, had given as many and signal proofs of patriotism and devotion to the interests, the honor, and the happiness of the nation, as any town in the Union. Its export trade consisted chiefly in the two staples of cotton and tobacco; and the memorialists were perfectly competent to judge of the effects of public measures on their own interests and those of the country of which their town was the home market.

The memorial, said he, is signed by the principal, most active, and intelligent merchants of the place, the most respectable artisans, and many persons of other professions. I have not thought it necessary to inquire, or to tax my own recollection to ascertain, which of the memorialists were friendly to the present Chief Magistrate, and which of them were opposed to his election to the station he now fills. Indeed, I have been surprised beyond measure to find such inquiries made and answered upon this floor; to find that the friends of the administration, upon the presentation of memorials complaining of its measures, have not scrupled to object that the memorialists were hostile to the President, with a view to detract from the weight of their evidence as to the existence and extent of the public embarrassment and distress, and of their opinions as to the causes of their grievances, and the remedies proper to relieve them; and that gentlemen in the opposition, even the most strenuous and intrepid, either moved by their deep sense of the general distress which pervades the community, and willing that relief should be administered upon any terms, or somewhat astounded, perhaps, at the new power which has lately arisen in the State, have yielded an involuntary respect to it, and in a manner admitted the principle of the objection, by controverting the fact on which it is founded. Has it come to this pass? Is it to be understood that there is a substantial practical difference, in the nature and extent of their political rights, between the friends of the President and his opponents? Is it asserted and acknowledged that the moral weight and influence of the evidence and opinions of citizens of one party is, in fact, and ought to be, inferior to those of the other? That disapprobation of the President's conduct, couched in language however respectful, founded on reasons however clear and cogent, and the representations of grievances from every quarter of the country, the cries of distress and alarm that are resounding through the land, the suggestions of the proper remedier, and earnest petitions for relief, are not worthy to be regarded as indications of public opinion unless they come from persons who are or have been the friends of the President? that the only indication of public feeling or opinion entitled to respect in the halls of Congress is to be found in those professions of content and boundless confidence that are sent us from the friends of the President? If such a distinction shall be established and acquiesced in, if it be even countenanced, then indeed has a change been already effected in the relation of the people towards each other, and in the moral feelings of the country, which cannot but end in a total change in our political institutions. In the beginning of the reign of George III, there was a party who professed themselves the King's friends; and never was there in Great Britain, since the famous cabal in the days of Charles II, a more mischievous and pestilent faction, pernicious to the nation, pernicious especially to their royal master, who never knew prosperity till he renounced the principle of favoritism. I trust in Heaven that a spirit of favoritism, far broader and more comprehensive, cannot be established in this country; and that an attempt to do it will not be endured for a moment.

These memorialists, for the most part, are merchants of character and experience in business; and other memorials (several from our great cities) have been sent to us by men of the same class. I pray the Senate to remember the course of Government in all other countries, and particularly in England, under circumstances of general commercial embarrassment, or of public distress of any kind. Committees are raised to collect information of facts; men of business, likely, from the nature of their occupations, to possess experience and knowledge of the subject, are called before them, and their opinions taken as to the causes of the mischief, their modus operandi, the precise nature and extent of the evil, and the remedies which the symptoms of the disease indicate; and thus they throw lights on the subject, by which they may see their way to relief. There is a maxim of the law of evidence, founded in obvious good sense and the soundest practical philosophy, Cuiuslibet sud arte credendum est. But, with us, the examples of other nations and other times are despised; the wisdom of the very proverbs is disregarded, rejected with scorn. Concede to the President the greatest extent of general knowledge that ever statesman possessed; concede to him the utmost sagacity and wisdom that can be ascribed to mortal man; yet, upon a question of this kind, I would take the opinion of an intelligent, experienced, practical merchant—much more what we have, the concurring opinions of a multitude of such men—as a surer guide to truth and safety than any opinion he can be capable to form, or the speculations of gentlemen on this floor.

The character of the memorial itself, which I now present, may serve to commend it to the attention of this House. Its language is temperate; the sentiments it expresses are moderate and cautious; it was prepared, circulated for subscription, and submitted to the examination of those who signed it: every circumstance indicates deliberation, a dispassionate and conciliatory spirit, and an anxious wish to avoid whatever might produce excitement. I mention this, because I think that the right of petition for redress of grievances, which all profess (and, I shall not doubt, sincerely) to respect, has been in fact disparaged in the debates of the Senate on this subject, by seizing on every circumstance of disorder, every incident evincing confusion or irregularity, in the meetings of the people in which resolutions or memorials have been prepared: witness the remarks made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FORSYTH,] on the proceedings in Morris county, New Jersey, presented yesterday. The general effect of those remarks, whatever was the design, was to show that the memorials on this subject are entitled to little or no consideration, and to throw ridicule and contumely upon the memorialists. Now, I beg leave to suggest to him, with perfect respect, and, indeed, in duty towards him, supposing, as I do, that he is sincere in his professions of respect for the right of petition, that such professions can have little effect, while they are accompanied with expressions of contempt for the petitioners. Such remarks are, in my opinion, more calculated to impair the value of the right of petition than the most explicit denial of it, for this would hardly be borne. We all know that irregularities, disorder, and confusion, do sometimes occur in the meetings of the people on occasions of this kind; and yet no man can doubt that the truth of facts, the state of public opinion, the wisdom that resides in the constituent body of the people, may, with a little care and reasonable attention to their representations, be fairly collected from their resolves, petitions, and memorials. The like disorder and confusion frequently occur in elections; passion and prejudice, error, mistake, and even the sudden effects of calumnies, cunningly devised, sometimes affect the result of them; but who, for that reason, undervalues representative government? who doubts that the interests, the rights, and the will of the constituent body, are, in the general and in the long run, fairly represented? that they can be no otherwise so fairly represented? The right of petition is a part, and an essential part, of the system of representative government. These memorials, daily pouring in from so many and such various sources, must be respected; I cannot doubt that they will ultimately command entire respect. The evidence they contain has already convinced us all that the distress which embarrasses the whole business of the country is real, general, aggravated, almost beyond endurance; and they will soon convince us, too, that the memorialists understand the causes which have produced this disastrous state of things, and justly trace the grievances to the measures of the Executive. And I hope the Senate will consider the representations they make, with due regard to their opportunities to know the facts; their competency, from their experience in business, to form a correct judgment; and the reason on which they rest their opinions, both as to the causes of the evils they are suffering under, and the proper corrective.

The memorialists of Petersburg add their testimony to the volume of evidence already laid before the Senate, describing the distress of the country in language so guarded that it is impossible to doubt their sincerity, yet so strong as to manifest their deep feeling on the subject; and they state, as their opinion, that the sudden withdrawal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States compelled the bank to curtail its business to the extent and in the manner it has done, and that promptly, too, in order to meet the exigency of its affairs; and, if these curtailments were the immediate cause of the present evils, the curtailments themselves were only the necessary effect of the unhappy measures of the President. To those measures, therefore, they trace all their grievances; and they suggest that the obvious remedy is to remove the cause which produced the mischief; that is, to restore the deposits.

Memorial from Petersburg.

That this would be a great alleviation of the evil; that it would banish much of the alarm that now induces men to suspend or contract their business, and have an immediate, sensible, and most beneficial effect in restoring public confidence, I cannot doubt. But to me it seems plain and obvious that a system of bank credit—such as exists in the United States—such as must continue to exist, unless the State Governments shall unanimously concur in the gradual abolition or modification of it, which no man can at present entertain a hope of—cannot consist with an absolute, uncontrolled power of one man in the state to destroy, or even to touch it. Such a system, in its very nature, involves the interests of such multitudes as never can concur in the sudden violent destruction of it. Their caprices, their passions, their prejudices, their errors, their self-love, counteract and neutralize one another; and they never can concur in any policy, with respect to so general and pervading an interest, which they do not esteem necessary for the common weal of all. But if one man has the power to modify, to contract, or destroy the system, his caprice, his passions, excited, perhaps, without provocation, his ideas of state necessity, his notions of policy, his projects of reform, may, at any time, and in any moment, subvert it from its foundations. The public can have no security. I remember that Frederick II, of Prussia—the Great Frederick, I mean—after stating that it had been impossible to establish a bank in a country governed by a simple absolute monarchy, boasted that he succeeded in establishing one; and his bank, fostered by his parental care, and sustained by his master genius, capable in some sort to reconcile contradictions, did linger during his reign. How long it continued after his death, I do not know; all I know is, that the experiment is said to have failed, and to have been soon abandoned. Does any man believe that a system of bank credit, such as that which exists in this country, could exist at St. Petersburg or Constantinople? Go, cultivate the sugar-cane in the northernmost districts of Maine! Public credit is the most sensitive of all sensitive plants; at the slightest touch of power, it shrinks and folds its leaves; withdraw the hand promptly, and it expands and revives; but if the slightest touch be long continued, the plant withers and perishes.

I cannot believe it possible that the people of my own State will ever consent to see any such stupendous and overwhelming power vested in the President, much more that they will unite with others to confirm him in the possession of it—that they want intelligence to discern the consequences, or virtue to avert them by all means in their power. They must lose their devotion to civil liberty, and their knowledge of its principles; they must lose all regard to the very principle of property; the pride and the love of country must be supplanted in their hearts, and extinguished by party spirit, before they consent that the President, by the independent power he claims for himself, and has, in fact, begun to exercise, shall make the experiment he proposes on the body politic. I have discovered since I came to this place—no one who would not shut his eyes and ears could have failed to discover—that a systematic effort is making, planned and directed chiefly by persons here, many of them having no connexion with Virginia, to reverse the public sentiment of that State at the approaching elections, and, as they hope and intend, to hitch her again to the car of Executive power. She is thought to have broken out of harness. I have myself no fears or doubts of the result; and, as to any views of personal ambition, I am wholly indifferent about it. I am indissolubly bound to Virginia; I must abide her determination; I must partake with her of weal or woe; and, if she consent to evil, I must bear my share of her destiny with resignation. One part of the effort to which I have alluded consists in the stale trick of boldly claiming a majority in anticipation, as the means of procuring one. A gentleman, not holding the relation to the State that I do, nowise bound by instructions from the State legislature, has thought proper to find or make an occasion to tell the members of the General Assembly, that, in their late resolutions concerning the measures of the Executive of the United States, they have not expressed the sentiments of their constituents. I do not mention it in hostility, (for I have no hostility towards any man,) but with a real sense of pain. If that gentleman had only reflected that the subject of those resolutions was under discussion for many weeks, and if he had reflected, also, on what he must have known, the sensibility of the members of that body to the will of their constituents, and the intimacy of the relation existing there between the representative and constituent body, I think he would hardly have presumed to suppose himself better acquainted than they with the sentiments of their own constituents, and to put his inferences in opposition to their evidence. And it is wonderful to me that any man professing to be a disciple of the Virginia school, professing devotion to the State rights principles which she has so long and so steadily maintained, should so far have forgotten himself as to cast such contumely on her legislature, and that, too, without provocation, occasion, or even object, unless he supposes his opinions to possess a mightier influence at home than any other person there ever apprehended. If he does not know that the dignity of Government is essential to the maintenance of its authority, he has not read the heart of man. I say, confidently, that whoever shall succeed in bringing our State legislature into general contempt, will do more to impair its just authority than any single measure of this Government possibly can. Neither are the people of Virginia of a temper to accept professions of respect in lieu of the reality.

Some there are who think that the danger to our institutions to be most dreaded in the present conjuncture of affairs, is the prostration of the powers of the Executive Department of the Union, and the assumption of all power by the Legislature. Dr. Johnson said, that those who would raise the cry of Popery in England, in his day, would have raised an alarm of fire in the midst of the general deluge; and I say that those who, in our country and our day, are holding forth the danger of the annihilation of the powers of the President, would hold the like language at Warsaw, St. Petersburg, or Constantinople. Let us recur for a moment to the history of the last six months, and see what the President has done, and what it is insisted he had a right to do.

The charter of the Bank of the United States provided that the public moneys should be deposited in it, unless the Secretary of the Treasury should at any time otherwise direct; in which case, he was required to report the fact, and the reasons of his order, to Congress, immediately, if in session, if not, at the commencement of the next session; that is, he was clothed, not with an arbitrary power, but a sound discretion over the subject; a discretion to be exercised for good cause, and under the supervisory control of Congress; for it is absurd to suppose that the Secretary was required to report the reasons of his conduct to this body, merely to gratify the curiosity of its members. To give a discretionary power to any officer, is to give a power to be exercised according to his own judgment, not the judgment of any other. This is an essential character of such a power. The President, having resolved that the public deposits should and ought to be taken from the bank, and finding one Secretary of the Treasury so obstinate and refractory that he could neither be led nor driven into what the officer regarded as an abuse of the discretionary power vested in him, dismissed him from office for that cause only, and appointed a successor, who he knew concurred in his opinions, and was ready to carry his purpose into effect.

On the one hand, it is contended that the Treasury Department is a mere Executive Department, and the Secretary responsible to the President, and bound to conform his official conduct, in all cases, with the judgment and orders of his superior; on the other, that this is not an Executive Department, but a department carefully distinguished by law from the Executive Departments, bound to follow the directions of the laws, whether conformable with the opinions of the President or not, and required to make its reports directly to Congress; and that the department was so constituted, and necessarily so constituted, for the purpose of keeping the treasure of the nation under the control of the legislature. On the one hand, it is insisted that the Secretary of the Treasury being, at all events, an officer of the Government, without any stated term of office provided by the constitution or laws, the President has, at any rate, a constitutional power to remove him at pleasure; on the other, that, even supposing the department an executive one, and the head of it a mere executive officer, yet, when a special discretion is vested in such an officer by law, by an act in which Congress and the President have concurred, the President cannot, without a violation of the law and the constitution, remove the officer merely because he refuses to exercise his discretionary power at the President's bidding, contrary to his own judgment, contrary to his sense of duty, his conscience, and his oath of office; as, for instance, the President cannot remove the commissioners of the sinking fund from that commission, for refusing, in the exercise of the functions prescribed to them by law, to follow his directions. On the one hand, it is argued that the discretionary power given to the Secretary over the deposits authorizes him to change the depository of the public moneys for any reasons of state policy whatever, approved by his judgment; and, on the other, that he was clothed with authority to take the deposits from the Bank of the United States only when that bank should become an unsafe depository, or, at the most, when the bank should fail to perform the services which it stipulated to perform for the Government. I only state these points; I do not mean to debate them; at present I only wish to call the attention of the Senate to the sequel of the transaction.

The Secretary, under the authority of the President, having directed the public moneys to be deposited no longer in the Bank of the United States, but in certain State banks of his own selection, under a formal contract made with them, or rather assented to by them, on his dictation of the terms; and there being, at the same time, large balances due from the Bank of the United States to the Treasury; and large balances due from the selected State banks, as well as other State banks, to the Bank of the United States; the Treasury, shortly after the removal of the deposits, drew transfer checks to the amount of two millions three hundred thousand dollars, at least, in favor of selected State banks, on the Bank of the United States, to be used on certain contingencies; and this was done for the avowed purpose of enabling these selected State banks to pay the balances they owed the Bank of the United States, and to carry on bank operations on the surpluses, for the accommodation of the community, and for the profit of these favored banks. Now, look at the substance of the transaction, as manifested in its actual operation. Take the Manhattan Bank of New York, for example. When it presented its check for five hundred thousand dollars, at the Bank of the United States, it owed this bank above two hundred thousand dollars, and this debt was discounted from the amount of the check. How was the balance of this check paid? I do not positively know the fact, yet I have no doubt of it; and I pray any gentleman who may be better informed to correct me if I am wrong. The Bank of the United States gave the Manhattan Bank checks on other States banks, indebted to it, for the balance of the Treasury transfer check; the other State banks got credit with the Bank of the United States for the amounts drawn on them; and the Manhattan Bank got credit to the same amounts with the other State banks. Thus the contents of this transfer check of five hundred thousand dollars, money of the people of the United States, were applied to the payment of the balances due from the State banks to the Bank of the United States; applied to the payment of the balances due from the Manhattan Bank, directly, and of deliberate purpose; and applied to the payment of the balances due from other State banks; consequently, indeed, but by an inevitable consequence, that any tyro might have foreseen. Or, if any petty surplus was actually paid in cash to the Manhattan Bank, that was lent to it by Government, as a capital to trade on for its own profit. This history of the transaction, in respect of the Manhattan Bank, is an exact history, also, of the Treasury transfer checks drawn in favor of the other selected State banks. Now, will any man point out to me the clause in the constitution or laws of the United States which authorizes Congress to lend the money of the people to any body, politic or natural, to be applied to the payment of private debts, or to be employed as a capital to trade on? And if such a power can be implied for Congress, by what manner of implication can it be claimed for the President? But the Executive has not only claimed and exercised power to lend the people's money to these State banks, for their sole benefit, but it has claimed and exercised the power of borrowing money; a power expressly and exclusively vested by the constitution in Congress. For, while the Treasury, by authority of the President, was lending two millions three hundred thousand dollars, to the favored State banks, without any stipulation for interest, the Postmaster General, without pretence of authority of law, unless the President's permission or sanction be law, was borrowing for his department some half million of dollars, (the exact amount is not yet ascertained, I believe, or ascertainable,) at six per cent. interest. Who, that justifies or palates these transactions, will ever presume to object hereafter to latitudinarian principles of construction of the constitution? Who does not now understand, who will venture to deny, that the hand that holds the sword has taken possession of the purse also, and claims to hold it as of right? Who will say that the danger at present to be apprehended is the annihilation of the powers of the Executive? Who does not see that the constitution and the vital principles of civil liberty are in danger of being subverted? If, in Great Britain, at any time since the revolution of 1688, any minister of the crown (the king can do no wrong) had dared to assume such powers over the public treasure, he would have been impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, convicted without a dissenting voice, and—not sentenced to death upon the scaffold, for happily the thirst for blood has been greatly allayed in modern times—but incapacitated forever to serve in any place of trust or honor. It is not the interests of the bank I am contending for, though I would not trample on its rights, or take away a cent of its property—it is not the security of property, chiefly, vital as the security of property is to the common weal. I say, sir, that the vital principles of civil liberty are sapped: liberty, liberty, is in jeopardy.

To show that it is in jeopardy, it is not necessary to convict the President of a wilful design to subvert it. I wholly acquit him of any corruption; I believe he has been acting under the impulse of passion—of passion unsuitable to his station. His very elevation should raise him above it. But I will not inquire into his probable motives or ultimate designs; I only examine his conduct, and its consequences.

A gentleman from Georgia [Mr. KING] said, yesterday, that he had travelled, during the last autumn, through several States, conversing, of course, with his fellow-citizens, and reading such public journals as fell into his hands; and that though he had heard many object to the conduct of the President as inexpedient and unwise, he had never seen or heard any objection to it on the ground that it involved an unconstitutional and illegal assumption of power; and he expressed his opinion, if I understood him aright, that this objection was founded on a discovery made by the gentleman from Kentucky, near me, [Mr. CLAY,] and first announced in this House. I am certainly not disposed to detract at all from the merit of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I cannot allow him the whole credit of this discovery, though I have no doubt he was one of the first that made it. It could not have cost him any pains. The gentleman from Georgia was (without any particular design, I dare say) select in the company with which he associated during his travels, and in his newspaper reading. I can only say that I conversed with no individual on the subject, who did not either object that the measure was a usurpation of power by the President, or defended him against the charge: I saw not a single newspaper—I own I read very few—that did not state the objection, either to support or to confute it. One press there was, which intimated the opinion that this measure of the President was not warranted by law—though it must, in justice to the editor, be acknowledged, that he, at the same time, ascribed the most patriotic motives to the President, and has ever since been defending his conduct with all his might—the objection to the legality of it, I suppose, being, in his mind, quite unimportant.

By the way, the gentleman from Georgia gave us a curious piece of criticism. I understood him to intimate that the speeches of the gentleman from Kentucky, near me, [Mr. CLAY,] on this subject, have been chiefly composed of shreds and scraps of Greek orations. I read most of them in my youth—I mean in an English translation; they have faded in my memory. Will the gentleman point out a single passage in any Greek oration, that can give color to this charge of plagiarism? If it had been said that the gentleman from Kentucky, in giving utterance to the strong conceptions of his soul, and the dictates of truth and reason, in that bold and glowing language, which nothing but zeal for his country and the ardor of conviction could inspire, had copied the manner of the master orator of Greece, this whole House might have convicted him, not of the design to do so, but of the fact of having done so; and, for my part, I wish we had more such plagiarists.

I find, in another remark of the gentleman from Georgia, some reason to congratulate myself, and him too, that the memorialists of Petersburg, waiving all questions as to the legality and constitutionality of the President's proceedings, take up the subject on the ground of policy alone, and impute the grievances of which they complain to the errors of the Executive. The gentleman declared his belief, that, if the subject had been put on that ground, the deposits would have been restored early in the session, by a majority of two-thirds of both Houses. I have no means of judging whether his conjecture is correct; and I shall make no remark on the peculiarity of the admission it implies as to the state of his own mind, and of the opinion it seems to disclose of the leading motive of others who have been defending and sustaining the President in his course. Would to Heaven the President could see his error in the light in which some of his warmest friends regard it, and reverse his unhappy measures. Such a change of policy, for whatever reason adopted, would be a great alleviation of the distresses that afflict his groaning country. Such an acknowledgment and counteraction of his errors would evince the highest virtue, wisdom, and magnanimity, and acquire for him more of true glory, and more of the affection and gratitude of his countrymen, than even the victory of New Orleans achieved for him. But, if he shall vaingloriously shut his eyes to the evidence of his errors, flashing like lightning through the darkness that surrounds him—if he shall obstinately persist in his present course of measures—if neither the opinions of the people, nor the voice of the Legislature, can move him—if "The Furies that relentless breast have steel'd, And curs'd with heart unknowing how to yield!"— still it behooves this House to persevere in the performance of its duty. Let him, if he will, continue to act on his sole responsibility. "Upon his responsibility!" Not for the wealth of worlds; not for all the gratifications which the most successful ambition could bestow; not for that evergreen fame which survives the patriot and the marble record of his deeds—that immortal glory for which men strove in the heroic ages—should such a responsibility rest on my soul! No, sir; not for these, or any, or all of these, should I be willing to hear the starving children of honest, useful, hard-working men, crying for bread; the sighs of anguish wrung from the hearts of their parents by the spectacle of misery in their dwellings; the groans of hopeless bankruptcy, and the curses of those contemned overtraders who, it was expected, would break, and who, it is said, "ought to break"—all ascending in one united peal to heaven, and resounding my name.

Mr. L. then moved that the memorial be read, printed, and referred.

Mr. FORSYTH said, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who last addressed the Senate, is a new comer, and his recent arrival amongst us has prevented him from knowing many things, the knowledge of which would, perhaps, have enabled him to avoid some of those mistakes into which he has fallen. The Senator has expressed some surprise, that, on presenting these memorials to the Senate, it should have been found necessary to consider whether the signers were, or were not, good Jackson men, and that any weight should have been attached to them, in consequence of the particular political party to which the memorialists belonged. If the honorable Senator had been here months ago, he would have perceived the course of these inquiries, and the course of the objections raised to memorials coming from a party opposed to the administration. Perhaps the gentleman was not aware that, for the first time in the history of the American Congress, the presentation of memorials at this session has been preceded by long and argumentary addresses. The question, as to the political opinions of the memorialists (he meant on this all-absorbing subject of the removal of the deposits) was first raised by those gentlemen who presented them, in answer to the objection that they were not certain indications of public sentiment. Those gentlemen went still further: they contended that the memorialists were not only highly respectable, but that their meetings had been gotten up without regard to party motives; and we were taunted with the declaration, that a majority of them were good Jackson men. The honorable Senator will thus see, that it was incumbent on us to inquire whether these memorials proceeded from party feeling, or from the dictates of truth and justice. The gentleman will also see that this question was raised by those he came here to aid. The question was not ours; we earnestly desired to see all these memorials referred to the Committee on Finance, that their particular merits might be examined into to ascertain how far they were influenced by the bank. So much for the character of the memorialists.

The Senator from Virginia, in the course of his remarks, charged me with a want of respect for the right of petition.

[Mr. LETCH explained. The gentleman from Georgia, he said, in reference to the resolutions from Morris county, New Jersey, remarked that he was happy to see them presented, because they showed how little value was attached to memorials and resolutions got up in the manner they were.]

Mr. FORSYTH went on. I did refer, he said, to the Morris county resolutions, and referred to them to show the little effect that ought to be produced by the proceedings of meetings raised in the manner they have been, since this deposite question was agitated. It has generally been claimed that these meetings have been attended without distinction of party. Well, in the case of these Morris county resolutions, is not this an evidence of the manner in which such meetings are generally got up? It seems a notice was given in the public papers, calling a meeting without distinction of parties; and at this meeting the resolutions that had been prepared were voted down by an overwhelming majority. The individuals who had called the meeting, not being able to get their resolutions passed, are now, as we have been informed by the Senator from New Jersey, going about the country to get signatures from those who agree with them in opinion.

This shows the management that is resorted to, on such occasions, and the little reliance that should be placed on these memorials, as evidences of public sentiment. No one more respects the right of petition than myself; but I do say, that the proceedings of these meetings are not sure indications of the sense of the people. They are meetings gotten up for the purpose of changing public opinion, not to represent it. In ordinary cases, it must be conceded, that meetings of the people generally represent the public will; and in forming our opinions, we are, in some measure, to be ruled by them; but in times of agitation and excitement, party feeling is too apt to take advantage of popular meetings, to subserve its own interested purposes.

The honorable gentleman says that banks are not consistent with despotism.

[Mr. LETCH explained. He said that the banking system, and credit system, were inconsistent with despotism.]

Mr. FORSYTH continued. I believe, that the first bank we have heard of, was the Bank of Venice; that was the model of all other banks; and I am sure, the gentleman will admit, that the Government of Venice was a despotism. To be sure, she had the name of republic; but a more iron-hearted despotism never existed, and the Bank of Venice used all its power to rivet the chains on the people.

The gentleman made one remark, which, I confess, struck me with surprise. It was, that all attempts to change the state of public opinion in Virginia, would prove utterly unavailing. Again, he said that Virginia was once chained to the car of the Executive. Will the gentleman tell me what he means by saying Virginia was chained to the car of the Executive? I think, sir, that the history of the few past years will show that Virginia was not so much devoted to this Executive, who carried out her own doctrines, as to other Chief Magistrates, but this was when we had Virginia Presidents. The honorable Senator upbraids the Executive for acts which have been done by a Virginia President. The draft in favor of the Manhattan Bank, was no more a loan than were the deposits in the State banks, which were made under a former administration; but this was done by Mr. Monroe, and then Virginia was dumb. I think that the gentleman, by referring to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, will find that no loan was made to any bank; that the deposite was made for a far different purpose, and was no more than what was done by Mr. Crawford, not only without rebuke, but with universal approbation. The present President has only done that which the example of her own beloved Chief Magistrate recommended, and, Virginia now condemns the act.

The Senator has referred to the glory which will be acquired by the President, if he should retrace his steps; and has painted, in glowing colors, the awful responsibility he will incur, if he persists in his present measures. Does he give fair play to the Chief Magistrate, when he calls on him to retrace his steps, and at the same time admits that what he has done has been under the impulse of pure and patriotic motives? No matter, if he was influenced by passion or prejudice, if he acted with pure and patriotic motives, to retrace his steps would be dishonor. To drive the President from the course which he believed to have been pointed out by the obligations of duty, the gentleman must first convince him of error. With respect to the Bank of the United States, the Senator and myself entertain nearly similar opinions. But the President differs from us both; and the question with him is, whether he shall see the people and their children, of whom the gentleman speaks, begging for their bread, or this Government chained to the car of a moneyed institution. The President honestly believes, and many of the people of the United States believe, that this institution is deadly hostile to the liberties of the country, has been interfering with elections, and therefore must go down. Does the gentleman believe that, if the destruction of this institution must result in bringing famine on widows and orphans, it must be perpetuated notwithstanding the dangers to be apprehended from it? Wind it up when you will, the effect must be the same. Unless this bank is to be perpetuated, what matters it whether it ceases its operations, at this time, or the next year? If it is to be wound up at all, surely the period selected was the most favorable time, when the country was in a state of unexampled prosperity. Every man must be convinced, that no period in the history of our country was more auspicious for the purpose than this, when the people were able to sustain the withdrawal of a large circulation.

Mr. LEIGH said: I have to return my hearty thanks to the gentleman from Georgia, for the instruction he has been pleased to give me, as to occurrences in the Senate before I came here—and concerning the Bank of Venice.

I understood the gentleman to tell me, that if I had been here, I would have known that the circumstance of the signers of these memorials being friends or opponents of the President, has been made one of importance by those who presented them; because, if it be ascertained that all the memorialists are opponents of the President, that affords a fair presumption that the memorials are mere effusions of party spirit, whereas, if some of the friends of the President are among the signers, that is regarded as evidence that they are not mere party effusions. If the gentleman will apply the same reasoning to memorials approbatory of the President's measures—as in fairness he ought and must—then the signers of such memorials too, in order to show that their memorials are not mere effusions of party spirit, and to entitle their opinions to respectful consideration, must be required to get some of the opponents of the administration to endorse their representations. The consequence will be, that no memorial, on any subject of deep and general interest, will be considered as entitled to respect, in the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia at least.

Mr. FORSYTH explained. Gentlemen had presented these memorials as evidences of public opinion; and whenever there were any Jackson men on the list, they took occasion to dwell on the fact, as showing that the statements were more worthy of credit, or to operate on the friends of the administration here. It appeared as if gentlemen were trying to make majorities by pretending that they already had them.

Mr. LEIGH. It is then admitted, that the friends of the administration, on this floor, have been in the known practice of inferring, from the circumstance of the signers of memorials being opposed to the President, that their memorials were attempts to make public opinion, instead of expressing it; and the gentleman from Georgia thinks the inference fair. Surely, he must perceive that the same objection may be urged with equal propriety against the weight of memorials presented by the friends of the President. And then, what are we to understand from the gentleman's profession for the right of petition? His practice counteracts his professions, and has a tendency to bring the right of petition into contempt, and by consequence to render it valueless. Sir, no gentleman has a right to ask his fellow-citizens, complaining of grievances and praying redress, to what political party they belong, and, inferring that their representations are party effusions or not, attempts to make or only to express public sentiment, according to the answer, turn a deaf or a willing ear to them.

I said that a system of bank credit, such as exists in the United States, cannot consist with an absolute power in any one man to subvert or even to touch it at his will and pleasure; that the proposition was demonstrable, and had been verified by experiment. It is not new; neither, until lately, have I ever heard it controverted. The gentleman from Georgia, it seems, is of another opinion; and to show me that I am mistaken, reminds me that the first bank ever established was the Bank of Venice. If that instance were of force to convince me that I am mistaken on the particular point, I should still have the same abhorrence of any such absolute power; and so, I hope, would he. But let me ask him, Does he know what that Bank of Venice was? Does he really suppose, that it was a bank constituted for accommodation, in our sense of the phrase? that it was founded on any principles at all similar to those on which our system of bank credit—I mean the whole system, State and Federal—has been erected? that it was authorized to lend more than the amount of its capital? that it issued bills, which constituted the chief currency of the country? Then, again, the government of Venice, as the gentleman well knows, was the government of an aristocracy—oppressive, often malignant, cruel, and odious—but still so constituted, that the interests, the passions, the vices of men in power, clashed, checked, and counteracted each other, so that no one man could obtain the ascendant.

With regard to the gentleman's commentary on my remark, that efforts were making here to hitch Virginia again to the car of Executive power, the Senate must have been sensible that I was speaking in language suited to the sentiments of others—language which I believed those who are making these efforts would hold, if they spoke their real sentiments—describing the condition in which they thought Virginia had been, and to which they wished and expected again to reduce her. The Senate need hardly be assured that I do not believe that they are right in their notions of her past, or in their hopes as to her future condition. If the original and habitual hostility of the people of Virginia to usurped power, shall be overcome—if their pride and love of country, their knowledge of the principles of civil liberty, and their devotion to a government of laws, shall be extinguished—if they can be brought to assent to the union of the purse and the sword in the hands of the President, and to prostrate themselves at his feet—I must submit, for I cannot separate myself from them. I humbly trust in God, that dread hour will never come! What the sentiment of Virginia is at this moment, I have not taken upon me to say. But I do say, that no man, representing a portion of her people, ought to venture to set his opinion of the sentiment of the State, in opposition to the expression of it by her legislature—the spirit of our fathers yet burns in our bosoms, and will not bear it.

The gentleman from Georgia supposes me to have acknowledged, that the President has been actuated in this affair of the deposits by pure and patriotic motives. I did indeed acquit him of corruption—I imputed his conduct to the influence of passion. I certainly had no intention to give him praise. If any gentleman considers passion as synonymous with patriotism, he speaks in a language different from that which my mother taught me. Who that has read the accounts of what has passed between the President and the various committees which have lately waited upon him, can doubt that Nicholas Biddle is the hallucination that has obfuscated his understanding. I do not know Mr. Biddle—I have been led to entertain a high opinion of his capacity, not on account of his management of the bank, (for of that I have very little knowledge, and I do not take accusation or denial for evidence,) but by some literary essays he has written, which I have had the pleasure of perusing. Supposing him the ablest and most industrious of mankind, yet as he has the management of the Bank of the United States on his hands, and certainly has not neglected his official business, whatever may be thought of his conduct in other respects, it is not to be believed that he has the time, or the physical or mental capacity, to engage much in electioneering—and, to speak plainly, I do not believe a word of that story. It is not my design to treat the President of the United States with disrespect; but I shall always use that perfect freedom of speech, which becomes a freeman, and belongs to our institutions and habits. His conduct and its effects may be thoroughly examined, without inquiring into his motives. If he shall ever be brought before me on a criminal charge, (an event which I do not regard as possible,) it will then be necessary to ascertain his motives, and I shall give my voice for his acquittal, the moment I am assured of the absence of criminal intention.

The gentleman from Georgia says, that, if the evils which now oppress the country are attributable to the removal of the deposits, the same evils would certainly occur at the expiration of the charter of the bank, so that, at most, the pressure would only be postponed for a short time, unless, indeed, the charter is to be perpetuated. Now, sir, it appears to me, that, if the bank had been permitted to hold the deposits until the expiration of its charter, not one of the most crying evils of which the country is now complaining, could have ensued. No one doubts that our money would have been safe, which few men feel any confident assurance that it is now. There could have been no hostility between the State banks and the Bank of the United States, like that in which they have been unwillingly placed by the Government, and which has cramped the operations of the former as much as those of the latter. There would have been no violation of public faith, or pretence for complaining of it; no unusual and doubtful exercise, if not palpable usurpation of power by the Executive; no shock given to public confidence; no subversion of our whole system of public credit; no panic; no agitation. Men of business would have made preparation for the event; and Congress, by extending the time allowed the bank by its charter to wind up its affairs as convenience and the public interest should require, might have enabled it to collect the debts due to it without distressing or ruining its debtors. The course of wise and just policy was obvious—most obvious.

The gentleman from Georgia has fallen into one mistake, which I beg leave to correct, though it may seem a little matter. There is no ballot-box in Virginia. We believe "that the ballot-box is exactly the thing which the ancients called Pandora's box."

Mr. KING, of Georgia, said he cared not to interfere in the controversy between his honorable colleague and the honorable Senator from Virginia, touching the respect due to memorials, or to examine the motives of those by whom they were usually got up and sent here. He would only say, that he not only acknowledged the right of the citizens of all parties to be heard in this form, but approved the practice on all subjects of importance to the interests of the country. But he must say, (what few would deny,) that when looked to as a test of public sentiment on questions purely political in their character, these memorials should be most carefully watched and diligently guarded, to prevent imposition. And, perhaps, said Mr. K., a better illustration of this truth will not be required than a reference to the very memorial now before the Senate, which, notwithstanding heaven and earth had been moved for many weeks to stir up the people to sign it, contained (as he understood and believed) the names of a mere fraction of the voters in the district from which it came. We must not too readily suppose that memorials represent the feelings of the whole district from which they come. We only hear from those who are dissatisfied with the Government. Oppositions are always better organized, and more active than those who are satisfied with the established order of things, who rarely move so long as they continue satisfied with their condition. But, said Mr. K., enough of this. I will leave the discussion on this branch of the subject, to the two honorable Senators who commenced it, and return to the subject of the memorial now before the Senate, on a question of reference. The object of this memorial, I believe, said Mr. K., is the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, and the restoration of the deposits. [Here Mr. LEXEN interrupted Mr. K., and said the memorial only prayed the restoration of the deposits.] Mr. K., said he was glad to be thus corrected. The correction would shorten what he had to say upon the memorial; and he had, in fact, a few days since, on another memorial from Massachusetts, expressed briefly his opinion upon a re-charter, and professed a friendship—rather a cool one, to be sure—for a national bank, under existing circumstances. I am glad this single question is presented, as it gives me at once a proper occasion to refer to some remarks which I made a few days since, and which seem to have been, by some gentlemen, imperfectly understood, or entirely perverted and misapplied.

Sir, said Mr. K., what I said, I said; and have no disposition to retract or modify it. But why, said Mr. K., are the remarks referred to, constantly called "admissions?" I call them statements, for which I am alone responsible. By what authority (said Mr. K.) do gentlemen so connect a party with me, as to embarrass it either by my statements or admissions? What I did state, Mr. President, and am willing to repeat, is, that I have travelled in several States in the South and Southwest, and that the measure adopted by the administration in the removal of the deposits, at the time the act was done, was very generally disapproved as inexpedient. But was I not sufficiently explicit as to the nature and reasons of this disapprobation? It was not because the people in the South generally believed that the President acted from bad motives. Not because they believed he had violated and trampled the constitution under foot. Not because, in so doing, he had usurped dangerous powers, and united the purse and sword. Not because they are in favor of the Bank of the United States. Not because they believe that the institution has not abused its functions by corrupting presses, and purchasing up politicians, and in many other ways. Not because they disagree with the President in the great end of destroying this institution, which they think dangerous to liberty. No, sir, whatever my own opinion may be, I think the great majority of the people to whom I referred are with the President on all these points. But they disapproved the act, because, whatever may have been the conduct of the bank, they knew it possessed immense powers, and was fixed on the country till the 4th March, 1836. They also, perhaps, had not full confidence in the patriotism of the combination of parties opposed to the administration, who they feared would avail themselves of this pretext, to use this powerful engine in the cause of party, and thereby inflict cruel calamity upon an unoffending community. They therefore said, Let the lion sleep, and quietly expire, for want of Congressional breath—peaceably die, for want of charter. I stated further, sir, said Mr. K., (but with the added caution that I only stated my conjectures,) that I thought these were the sentiments of a majority even of the friends of the administration when Congress assembled; and that, if the question of restoration had been viewed only as one of expediency, had not been made a party question, and forced upon the friends of the administration in a form to make it one upon which the existence of an administration which was preferred for higher reasons, was to depend; and a vote taken on the subject before these apprehended mischiefs had occurred, and by which they might have been prevented; in that case, a majority of two-thirds of both Houses might have voted a restoration of the deposits. I say so still; without professing, either before or now, to make any thing more than a conjecture of my own. It is said, all around me, that I am mistaken on this point. I think it very likely, sir, and so stated before. But what I am most anxious in this place to notice and correct, is the misconstruction of my admission, as it is called by the honorable Senator from Maryland: I did not say, or even intimate—I did not then, nor do I now, believe that there is a majority of two-thirds, or any other majority, in either House, who believe it would be expedient or beneficial to the country now to restore the deposits, unless the Bank of the United States is to be re-chartered. Nay, sir, I will go further. As it seems I have bound one party, I will now bind the other. I stated, when last up, that if I liked the project for the renewal of the charter for a short time, that I would vote for it. My favor to this, and to all paper-issuing banks, is, to be sure, a cool one; but if the gentleman gets my vote, I presume he will not care much with what feeling it is given. I am, then, sir, the gentleman must admit, at least in a modified sense, a bank man; and therefore, for a much stronger reason than any he showed, have a right to bind him, and the whole bank party. I say, then, distinctly, that there are, in my opinion, few, in or out of this House even of that party, who care a snap of the finger for a restoration of the deposits, unless the re-charter of the bank is to accompany or follow that measure. All must know, or at least believe, that restoration, without re-charter, must only add an additional shock to the currency, and prolong the distresses of the people. I cannot permit honorable gentlemen to escape from the obligations of my "admission." I certainly have better authority for making this "admission" than that which they have attempted to use against the friends of the administration.

Sir, (said Mr. K.) having endeavored to relieve the friends of the administration from the embarrassment of what is called my "admission," I will proceed to notice the remarks of the honorable Senator from Virginia, who thinks it strange I should not have heard of the constitutional objections until they were raised in this hall. I state so again, and I presume the honorable gentleman does not intend to call in question the truth of this statement. [Mr. LEXEN: Certainly not.] I did not state that the objections had not been before made, only that I had no recollection of having seen or heard them; by which alone I intended to prove, that, among plain people, the objections were not obvious, and, for that reason alone, should not be readily trusted, as, in fact, no reasoning was to be trusted but that which was natural and easy. This very power had been before exercised; was a power which seemed literally given by the bank charter, and had even been exercised without a whisper of complaint, he believed, for purposes the most obnoxious, (according to the views of the honorable Senator;) that is, for the assistance of the State banks. What discoveries may have been early made, or views expressed, by the learned circles of Richmond, Kentucky, or elsewhere, and which had escaped his observation, he knew not. He only meant to say, that a construction which required the penetration of practised politicians, or even the aid of a learned profession, whose very professional duties led to the habitual use of subtleties, should not readily be countenanced by those who have a real regard for the constitution.

Why, Mr. President, (said Mr. K.,) I can truly say, even now, that although I have listened attentively here for two months, and paid strict attention to the subject, I do not now distinctly understand any definite and well-understood ground upon which the power of the Secretary to remove the depositories is denied. There is such a confusion of ideas on the subject, so much difference of opinion, and such a mixture of objection to the power itself, and the sufficiency of the reasons for its exercise in this particular instance, that I find it impossible to understand gentlemen upon this point. This may be, and probably is, owing to my own obtuseness of intellect, but may be taken as some evidence of the danger of this novel construction of the charter. He had, however, no disposition to enter into an argument on a point so much discussed already, and, if he had, he could not be expected to refute arguments which he could not clearly understand. Suffice it to say, then, Mr. President, that the power exercised by the Secretary is plainly given in the bank charter. But it seems we are very unexpectedly surrounded by strict constructionists, who, to prove their principles, instead of reading a charter, make a charter. New friends to the constitution—yes, sir, gentlemen who for years have been mutually charging each other with a habitual contempt of the constitution, all at once claim to be the only exclusive guardians of that instrument; and, to show their new-born affection, instead of expounding the constitution, they go into elaborate arguments to prove what the constitution ought to be. The continual cry is, "The constitution! the constitution! the bleeding constitution!" There are no constitutional measures but their measures! There is no people but their people! All is tyranny that keeps their party out of power. All is oppression that forces the equal and regular operation of the laws. "Liberty! liberty!" is the cry of these exclusive patriots. An oppressed, enslaved, and degraded people are called on to rescue the constitution, and recover the liberty they have lost! and in the very next breath, we hear the complaint that the Senate alone can save the country, as the majority of the people is against them! In the name of Heaven, sir, what kind of liberty is this? It can be no other, by their own confessions, than the liberty of governing. The liberty of a few to govern the great body of the people; and not the liberty of the great body of the people to govern themselves. Those who prefer the present administration are continually taunted with the question, "And will you submit? I answer, Ay, sir; I will submit to the laws of my country, and the Government of my choice; but, sir, I will tell you what I am not disposed to submit to. I never can willingly submit to the dictates of an ambitious and disappointed faction. But, sir, we have just heard again the oft-repeated alarm, that we are living under a despotism. Paper currency, it is stated, cannot be sustained under despotic governments. And why, sir, these continual insults offered to the majority of the American people, for sustaining the Government of their choice? Sir, gentlemen may cease their lamentations, and the band of leagued tyrants on the other side of the water, to whom they afford so much joy, may hush their triumphs. The people of this country will protect their own liberties, and march on to the highest destiny of nations. Yes, sir, they may meet with impediments: the extremes of political doctrine may hang heavily on each skirt. They may be loaded down with bank paper; tripped up or jostled by bank monopolies, and meet with the various obstacles thrown in their way by party divisions: but still, sir, the great body of this nation will move on, with the gathering strength of a growing giant—not to "despotism," sir, not to tyranny, but until they shake tyranny from the earth, and crumble the despotisms of the world to atoms.

Sir, (said Mr. K.,) the people of the United States, are free—and, under God, I think, are determined to remain so.

The memorial was then referred, as moved, to the Committee on Finance.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the special order, being Mr. CLAY's resolutions, &c. on the subject of the removal of the depositories from the Bank of the United States; when—

Mr. TALLMADGE rose and said, he would attempt no apology for occupying a portion of the time of the Senate in offering his views on the subject under consideration. He did not flatter himself that he could impart any peculiar novelty to the discussion, neither did he expect so be able to command the attention of the Senate, grown weary, no doubt, by a debate so long protracted. A sense of duty, however, impelled him to proceed.

The first resolution, said Mr. T., alleges an illegal and unconstitutional exercise of power by the President of the United States. It involves matters of high import. It goes to the very structure of the Government; to the principles on which our whole political fabric is based. It involves the distribution of the powers of the Government under the constitution, and the exercise of those powers by the respective departments to which they are assigned. It becomes us, therefore, to enter upon the examination of such a subject, with all the candor and moderation which its importance demands; and not rashly undertake to unsettle or overturn principles which the wisdom of our ancestors established, and which our own experience in their practical operation has found so salutary.

The powers of the Government are divided into legislative, executive, and judicial. This was the first and fundamental proposition adopted by the convention that framed the constitution; and from this sprung the subsequent organization of the Government. This was the basis of the constitution in the distribution of its powers. It was the theory of the constitution to keep them separate and distinct. The history of other nations had shown that the union of these powers was inconsistent with free government. Other Governments have been more or less free, in proportion as these powers have been separated or united. This separation and distribution became a settled maxim with the American people, at the time of the adoption of the constitution. To this we may attribute the great freedom which we have enjoyed, beyond any other people in ancient or modern times. Being thus separated, the object has been, and should be, to confine the exercise of each to its proper sphere. It will be my purpose to show, that the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power complained of in the resolution under consideration, acted within the limit of Executive authority, as prescribed by the constitution; that any other construction would deprive him of the power belonging to the Executive department, and thereby impair that fundamental principle which alone gives security and stability to our system.

By the constitution, "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The President's power, then, depends on the limit assigned to the executive power. To ascertain that limit, it is necessary to inquire into its nature and object. The inconveniences which were experienced by the old Continental Congress, in respect to the powers of Government exercised by it, and the manner of its exercise, subsequently led to the adoption, by the States, of the articles of confederation. Many difficulties were obviated by these articles of perpetual union. Still, there were defects inherent in the very nature of the system of Government thus adopted. Experience soon pointed them out; and amongst them, was a very prominent one, namely, "the organization of the whole powers of the General Government in a single assembly, without any separate or distinct distribution of the executive, judicial, and legislative functions." The want of a National Executive was deemed one of the most fatal defects of the confederation. All the powers of Government were vested in a single body. The execution of many of its most important powers was intrusted to a committee composed of one member from each State. This committee was authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, and under certain limitations and restrictions, could exercise the same powers that Congress itself could exercise whilst in session. In the convention that framed the constitution, so apparent was this defect, that the proposition to establish a National Executive seems to have met with universal approbation. There was, however, some diversity of opinion on the question, whether the Executive should consist of a single person, or of a plurality of persons. An examination of the nature of the Executive office soon satisfied the convention that its powers could be much more advantageously and safely exercised by one than by several. They had before them the history of other nations; many which had claimed the name of republics; and, in every instance, it was found that the division of executive power had led to the most disastrous results. Examples from Roman history were presented, of the mischief which had grown out of the discussions between the consuls and military tribunes. Unity, therefore, in the Executive department of the Government, was deemed essential to secure energy and responsibility: Without energy and responsibility, the Government, it was perceived, would not answer the purpose of its creation. The want of these qualities had been severely felt during the war of the revolution, out of which the country had but recently emerged. One of the learned authors of the Federalist summed up the argument on this subject with this emphatic language: "A feeble Executive implies a feeble execution of the Government. A feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a government ill executed, whatever may be its theory, must be, in practice, a bad government."

Such energy and responsibility then, so essential to good government, are virtually destroyed whenever the unity of the Executive is interfered with or impaired. That may be done by conferring on any officer in either of the departments, a power, executive in its nature, to be exercised independent of the Chief Executive himself. Such an independence on the part of such officers, is destructive of the very principle on which the Executive department was founded. The intentions of the framers of the constitution are thereby defeated, and the benefits which were anticipated from the unity of the Executive are entirely lost.

To ascertain whether the President has exercised a power, in the case under consideration, in conformity to the intentions of the framers of the constitution, and within the limits of the Executive authority, as conferred by that instrument, it becomes necessary to inquire, what are the Executive Departments, and who are the heads of them? In general terms, it is a sufficient answer to that inquiry to say, that all the powers of the Government are executive, which are not legislative or judicial; and that all such powers as do not fall within the two latter departments, must, of course, belong to the Executive department. It has not been contended that the Treasury Department is, in its nature, either legislative or judicial; it cannot then be otherwise than Executive. But it is not necessary to rest the question on this general proposition. The express provisions of the constitution, and the practice of the Government from its first organization, will show the truth of the position. If we look to the Departments which are usually denominated Executive, they cannot, in that respect, be distinguished from each other. The Department of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, are all Executive Departments. So also is the Post Office Department. They are recognised as such by the constitution. The President "may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." Under this clause of the constitution, can he require the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury? If he can, it is by virtue of his constitutional right to call for his opinion as the head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government. That he can require his opinion, is proved by the uniform practice of the Executive from the first organization of the Government to the present time. The records of that Department abound with instances of the exercise of this power, from the days of General Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, to the time of the present incumbent, whose conduct, in connexion with that of the President, is the subject of the present discussion. Against this plain provision of the constitution, and the uniform practice under it, how can it be contended that the Treasury Department is not an Executive Department? The provision applies equally to the Treasury as to the other Departments, which are conceded on all hands to be Executive. This Executive character is conferred by the constitution, and whatever difference there may be in the respective duties, they are all equally executive, and cannot shake off the character which the constitution has stamped upon them.

Aware of the difficulty of attempting to establish a distinction between these Departments, under the constitution, gentlemen have endeavored to find it in legislative construction. If it shall turn out, on examination, that it is to be found in neither, then the allegation that the President has assumed illegal and unconstitutional powers, is without foundation. In regard to a distinction to be drawn from legislative construction, it might be sufficient to answer, even if it should be found to exist, that the legislation of Congress could not alter the character of a Department derived from, nor interfere with the power of the President conferred by, the constitution.

If the Secretary of the Treasury is recognised as the head of a Department, from whom the President has a constitutional right to require an opinion, then, any difference in the phraseology of laws organizing the several Departments, can have no effect to alter his executive character. To my mind, this proposition is so plain, that it is with great reluctance that I presume to occupy a moment of the time of the Senate, in an examination of the alleged distinction arising from legislative construction. This reluctance is only overcome by the fact, that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] with others, has urged it with so much apparent sincerity, that it becomes my duty to show the entire fallacy of the argument attempted to be drawn from that source. To a superficial observer, there would seem, at first view, to be some ground for the distinction. But a critical examination of the action of Congress, will show that its legislation, in this respect, has been in accordance with the provision of the constitution, by which the Treasury Department was created an Executive Department, equally with those whose executive character has never been denied.

The Executive power, as has been already shown, belonged to, and was exercised by, the old Congress. I will not stop to inquire into the history or origin of the Treasury Department, as it existed under the confederation, and down to the time of the adoption of the present constitution of the United States. Suffice it to say, that the power of appointment and removal of the officers who had charge of the public treasury, was claimed and exercised by the old Congress as a part of its executive authority. And although this power was, in many respects, delegated to certain officers and agents created by Congress, yet Congress always reserved to itself the right to remove from office such agents, and to control the whole system, by virtue of its executive power. The union of all the powers of government in a single body, was one of the great evils complained of under the old system, and which eventually led to the formation and adoption of our present constitution. By the constitution, these powers are distributed, and the executive power, which was exercised in such a plenary manner by the old Congress, was intrusted to a single department, and the President, the Chief Executive of the nation, was constituted the head of this department, with all the powers of appointment and removal that appertained to the old Congress, except where expressly limited by the constitution itself.

The first Congress that assembled under the new constitution in 1789, amongst its earliest proceedings, passed a resolution expressing its opinion that there ought to be established certain Executive Departments: namely, a Department of Foreign Affairs, a Department of Treasury, and a Department of War; and that the head of each Department should be removable by the President. In pursuance of this resolution, a committee reported bills for the establishment of these several Departments. The first was entitled "An act for establishing an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs." This act was afterwards, in the same year, amended, and changed to the "Department of State." The second was entitled "An act to establish an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War." The third was entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department." From the difference in phraseology in the titles of these acts, the two former being denominated Executive Departments, and the latter not, it has been gravely contended that the Treasury Department was divested of its executive character; and that, therefore, the President could not exercise his power of removal of the head of this Department, as he could with the heads of the other Departments which were termed executive. This power of removal can be exercised over none of these Departments, except on the ground of their being executive. If, then, we look to the acts themselves establishing these Departments, and not confine ourselves to their titles, we shall find that the same power in the President to remove is recognised in all of them alike. Not a power granted by law, but the recognition by law of a power granted by the constitution. It was upon the bill to establish the Department of Foreign Affairs, that the celebrated debate arose as to the power of removal—the one side contending that the power belonged to the President, by virtue of the executive powers of the Government vested in him by the constitution, and the other maintaining that the power of removal should be exercised by the President, conjointly with the Senate. I will not detain the Senate, at this time, by the recapitulation of arguments which were so ably presented on that occasion, and which have been so often referred to on this. It is sufficient for my purpose to state, that the important question was decided by that Congress in favor of the President's power to remove the heads of all these Departments, on the ground of their being executive Departments. And lest it might, in after times, be inferred that this power was conferred by law, instead of being granted by the constitution, the several bills were so amended as to recognise the power as derived from the constitution, and not as a power granted by law.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] insists, notwithstanding the power of removal is the same in all these acts, that "the act creating the Treasury Department" was unlike the acts by which the other Departments were established, and he concludes from this, that the "Treasury Department is not an Executive Department." The correctness of our conclusions sometimes depends on the accuracy of our language in laying down the premises from which our conclusions are drawn. The Executive department, which, in a general sense, includes all the executive powers of the Government, was created by the constitution, and those powers vested in the President of the United States. Congress may establish the organization of this department, but it cannot create any portion of it. Congress may divide and subdivide its powers and duties into as many Departments as to it seems proper—still, these sub-divisions lose none of their Executive character; and although their organization is thus established by law, they are nevertheless created by the constitution. It results then, that Congress, acting within the legitimate sphere of its legislative powers, may establish these Departments at pleasure, but cannot, by any act of legislation, divest them of their Executive character. It may assign duties belonging to one to another. It may assign new duties to any of the Executive Departments, which have never been assigned before. It may establish new Departments, and transfer the duties of others to those thus established; and, after all this change, their Executive character remains the same. Under this power in Congress, Mr. Madison, in 1817, recommended "an additional Department in the Executive branch of the Government. * * * The extent and variety of Executive business, also accumulating with the progress of our country and its growing population, call for an additional Department, to be charged with duties now overburdening other Departments, and with such as have not been annexed to any department." In pursuance of this recommendation, a bill was introduced into the House of Representatives to establish a Home Department. It never became a law. Suppose it had passed, and some of the most important duties of the Treasury Department had been transferred to the Home Department, would such transfer have made it any thing other than an Executive Department? Let this subject be examined in any light in which it is possible to be looked at, and it will be found impossible to make a distinction between any of these Departments, as Executive Departments. The duties of one may be more executive in their nature than those of another, still the Department itself is no less executive. The more immediate connexion of the Treasury Department with the ordinary subjects of legislation, may have divested it, more than the others, of its executive character; but the strait into which the Senator from Kentucky is driven, in regard to a name for the Treasury Department, if, as he says, it be not an Executive Department, is very conclusive evidence of the unsoundness of his position. He calls it an administrative Department. It is not material what names may be given; if gentlemen cannot show that it belongs either to the Legislative or Judicial departments of the Government, it must, of course, belong to the Executive department. For all the powers of the Government are thus distributed, and there can be no power known to the constitution, which does not belong to the one or the other. It will not be contended that the one under consideration is either legislative or judicial, and, although the Senator has denominated it administrative, still that is but another term for executive. The Senator says that the Secretary of the Treasury is required by the act of 1789 to report annually to Congress. Here, again, he labors under a misapprehension. That act has no such requirement. The Treasurer is bound to report to Congress, on the third day of its session, the state of his accounts, but the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to report only "as he may be required." The inference, then, which is attempted to be drawn from his supposed duty to report annually to Congress, by the act of 1789, in this instance, fails. In that respect, the Departments were, originally, placed on the same footing—liable to be called on by Congress to report, at any time, in relation to matters appertaining to them respectively. The Treasury Department being more immediately connected with the legislation of Congress, it was enacted in 1800, (eleven years after the act establishing the Department,) "that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest, prepare, and lay before Congress, at the commencement of every session, a report on the subject of finance, &c., for the purpose of giving information to Congress in adopting modes of raising the money requisite to meet the public expenditures." This act amended the act of 1789, and contains this single provision. This requirement was for the sole purpose of enabling Congress the better to exercise its legislative powers, and not for the purpose of detracting any thing from the executive powers of the Government. It was for the purpose of enabling the Legislative department to enact laws, which the Executive department was bound, by the constitution, to see faithfully executed. If the reports which are required to be made, annually, by the different Departments, to Congress, could alter their nature or character, then there would not be left an Executive Department under the Government. Even the President himself would be divested of his Executive functions, by reason of the power which Congress exercised to require of him certain annual reports to facilitate its legislation. From a tabular statement published by the House of Representatives, of the annual reports required to be made to Congress, it appears that the President is bound to make five, the Secretary of State six, the Secretary of the Treasury seventeen, the Secretary of War eight, the Secretary of the Navy eight, and the Postmaster General four. But, all doubt and ambiguity arising from the difference in phraseology of the titles of the several acts, is removed by the very next act passed by Congress, and which follows, on the statute book, the act establishing the Treasury Department. It is "An act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of the Government, with their assistants and clerks"—amongst whom the Secretary of the Treasury is named as an Executive officer, equally with the Secretary of State or the Secretary of War. The Navy Department was not then established. From this, it is obvious that Congress never intended to make any difference between these several Departments in the particular referred to. If further evidence were wanted, it will be found in the act of 24th April, 1800, when Congress was about to remove from Philadelphia to Washington; by which the President of the United States was "authorized and empowered to direct the various officers belonging to the several Executive Departments of the United States to be removed to the city of Washington," &c. "The Secretaries of the four Executive Departments" were authorized to prepare and furnish the rooms for the accommodation of the two Houses of Congress, &c.

Footways were to be made "under the direction of the Secretaries of the four Executive Departments," &c. So far, then, as legislative construction goes, there can be no distinction between these heads of Departments. The word "executive," in the titles of some of their acts, is at best but surplussage, and cannot add to or diminish the power and authority which the constitution confers on the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments; of whom the Secretary of the Treasury is one, and from whom the President "may require an opinion in writing," upon any subject relating to the duties of his office. Again: By the constitution, the President is authorized to "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint" certain officers, &c. "But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." In the great debate on the organization of the Department of Foreign Affairs, in 1789, it was contended that the heads of Departments were inferior officers, and whose appointments did not even require the concurrence of the Senate. But, it was held otherwise. They, of course, must have been considered the principal officers of the Executive Departments. From the preceding examination of the constitution, and the legislation of Congress, it follows, irresistibly, that the Secretary of the Treasury is the head of an Executive Department, equally with the other Secretaries, whose Departments have always been denominated Executive.

What then, are the relative powers and duties of the President and of the Secretary of the Treasury?

First—as to the President's powers.

We have already seen that the Executive power is vested in the President, as fully as the Legislative power is vested in Congress, or the Judicial power in the judiciary. He has, by virtue of that power, the control of the Executive Departments, of which the Treasury is one. They are subject to his superintending care and general supervision. Amongst other powers too, is that of appointment to office, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in certain cases; and, in certain other cases vested in him by law, he has the sole power of appointment. He also has the power to fill vacancies which may happen in the recess of the Senate.

But the most important power which he possesses, so far as the questions involved in the present discussion are concerned, is the power of removal from office. This shows the nature of the Executive authority, and how it was intended that the Executive Departments should be under his control and supervision. This power has been already alluded to. The right of the President to remove from office was settled by the Congress of 1789, soon after the adoption of the constitution. The debates on this question throw much light on the powers of the Executive. Many of those great men and pure patriots that composed the Congress of 1789, were the same that framed the constitution, whose powers they were, thus early, called on to interpret. No men understood better the intentions of those who formed, and those who adopted, that instrument, as the great charter of their rights and liberties. In the construction which they gave to this power of removal in the Executive, they were but carrying out the principles which they had adopted in the distribution of the powers of the Government. Any other construction would have mingled and united those powers which the constitution had so carefully separated. It seemed to be held by those sages, that, as the constitution had vested all executive power in the President, the legislature had no power to limit or modify his executive authority. This legislative enactment, although it could not confer power, was a practical commentary and construction of the constitution, not only in relation to the power of the President, but also as to the duty of the head of an Executive Department. The President is responsible to the people for the faithful execution of the laws; and how can he do his duty, in this respect, unless the officers in the Executive Departments are under his control, and subject to removal by him. If Congress should put any particular duty on the Secretary of the Treasury, which is in its nature executive, and he is to be entirely independent of the President in the discharge of it, it would be a usurpation of the executive power by the legislature. For the President has no power to see that duty faithfully performed, except by his power of removal. If the Secretary could thus be rendered independent in the one instance, he might in all, and the executive power would virtually be wrested from the President, in whom it is all vested by the constitution. His only remedy, then, is the power of removal. This was contemplated by the act establishing the Treasury Department.

It is true, there was a difference of opinion on the subject in the first Congress, when this important question was agitated. It is also true, that General Hamilton, one of the distinguished authors of the Federalist, previous to the ratification of the constitution by the several States, seemed to suppose that the power of removal was one to be exercised by the President conjointly with the Senate. Mr. Madison, his no less distinguished colleague in that great work, was of a different opinion—and it cannot be doubted, that the Congress of 1789, after the most mature deliberation, came to the correct conclusion, namely, that it was a power conferred on the President by the constitution, and one with which the legislative power could not interfere. Whatever diversity of sentiment there may have been at that day, the decision of that Congress was deemed conclusive on the subject, and the matter has been considered at rest, until the agitation of the present question. Such have been the views of learned commentators on the constitution, and, even though they might have differed from the Congress of 1789, were the subject now to be presented for the first time, still they have not had the rashness to even permit themselves to view it as an open question. I beg leave here to introduce an authority in support of my positions. It is that of Chancellor Kent—a man whose fame, in the department of civil jurisprudence, is not confined to his own State, or even to the Union—whose reputation is emphatically the property of the nation, and which the nation will proudly cherish. He says, "In the act for establishing the Treasury Department, the Secretary was contemplated as being removable from office by the President. The words of the act are: 'That whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office, the assistant shall act,' &c. This amounted to a legislative construction of the constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon, as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate, whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by weighty reasons, that the subordinate officers in the Executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfil it." Another legislative construction is to be found in a concurrent resolution of Congress in 1797, in relation to the distribution of the Laws of the United States: that, amongst others, one set be delivered to the Secretary of State; to the Secretary of the Treasury; to the Secretary of War, &c.; and in the case of the death, resignation, or dismissal from office of either of said officers, then the Laws to belong to the successor, &c. This was in accordance with the principle established by the Congress of 1789, and presents the case even in stronger language—dismissal, instead of removal—the very terms used in the resolution of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, which we are now considering. I hold, therefore, the power of removal in the President to be absolute and unconditional, and to be exercised in his discretion, and without cause assigned. In the language of another learned commentator on this subject, "in the exercise of his political powers, he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country and his own conscience. His decision in relation to these powers is subject to no control; and his discretion, when exercised, is conclusive."

It follows, then, that the President has a controlling influence over the acts of the Secretary of the Treasury in the discharge of his duties in the Executive department, and can carry into effect his wishes by virtue of his power of removal.

But, the Senator from Kentucky insists that "there are duties devolving upon the Secretary, over which the President has no control;" and he cites the case of Marbury and Madison as authority to establish his position. It may be remarked of that case, in the first place, that the court had no jurisdiction of the matter, and therefore it has not the weight of binding authority. In the next place, Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, totally disregarded the decision, and treated it as an attempted usurpation of the judicial over the executive branch of the Government. Even admitting the doctrine laid down by the court to be correct, still it has no application to the present case. I agree, that where a specific duty is imposed on the Secretary by law, which is absolute in its terms, and not confided to his discretion, he is bound to perform that duty not only, but it is the duty of the President to see that he faithfully executes it. The performance of the duty, however, does not interfere with the right of the President to remove him from office, in his discretion. I have shown, that that discretion can be subject to no control. If the President should remove him to prevent the performance of a specific duty imposed by law, when the legislative power had the right to impose it, and which was not intrusted to his discretion, he would be guilty of a corrupt exercise of power, for which he would be amenable to the people, through the impeaching power of their immediate representatives. The President's right of removal, even in that case, could not be questioned, although he might be held to account for its improper exercise. On the other hand, suppose a specific duty should be thus imposed on the Secretary, and he should refuse to perform it, would it not be the duty of the President to remove him and substitute some one who would obey the injunctions of the law? For example: Suppose the Secretary had announced his intention not to subscribe to the stock of the Bank of the United States, which he was authorized and directed to do by the charter, would not the President's duty require him to remove the Secretary and get some one who would perform that specific duty? View this matter in any light you will, and the power of removal is perfectly palpable. In the case under consideration, the duty was not a specific one imposed by law, but one intrusted to the discretion of the Secretary—of course, subject to the general supervision and control of the Chief Executive. In the one case, the President would be bound to see the duty performed by the Secretary, in conformity to the will of the law; in the other, the Secretary would be bound to perform the duty, in conformity to the will of the President. Permit me to illustrate these positions. Suppose it was agreed, on all hands, that the public deposits ought to be removed from the Bank of the United States, for lack of safety, which is held sufficient cause by every one, and the Secretary, in the exercise of his discretionary power, should refuse to remove them, contrary to the wishes of the President, and the general sentiment of the people, would there be any doubt of the President's power to remove him? Nay, would there be any doubt of his duty to do it? Again: Suppose the Secretary had, in the exercise of his discretion, removed the deposits against the wishes of the President, and the general wishes of the community. Would not the President be called on to remove him, and appoint a successor who should restore them to the custody of the bank? Or, if the Secretary was about to remove them, without cause, against the expressed opinion of the President and the people, would not public sentiment require that he be removed before the act should be committed? If so, then there can scarcely be a case imagined, in which the right of removal would not be equally palpable.

What, then, are the duties of the President?

He is bound, by oath, faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States; and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States. He shall also take care that the laws be faithfully executed. How can he discharge those duties, if he suffers himself to be deprived of any portion of the executive power vested in him by the constitution, or if the laws make the heads of the Executive Departments independent of him? It results, then, that, though the Secretary of the Treasury has the power, at his discretion, to remove the deposits, still he can be controlled in the exercise of that power, by the superintending executive power of the President. And it is the farther duty of the President to remove the Secretary from office, if, in his judgment, he does not entertain proper views in relation to his duties, and will not carry the views and wishes of the President into effect. In the case of the late Secretary, he was removed, or dismissed, because he did not entertain proper views on the subject of the deposits; and because he was unwilling to carry into effect the views of the President, who had the right to direct him in the discharge of a discretionary duty. The bank cannot complain of the exercise of this power—for its charter was granted subject to the constitutional power of the Executive, and with full knowledge of his rights, as they were understood and settled as early as 1789.

A duty intrusted to the discretion of the Secretary is, in other words, a duty confided, by law, to the discretion of the Executive department of the Government. Whereas a specific duty imposed, by law, on the Secretary, or even on the President himself, is to be specifically performed—in the one case by the Secretary, in the other by the President: and in both, on the responsibility of the Chief Executive to see the laws faithfully executed. If the Secretary could be independent of the President in the discharge of such duty, what becomes of the responsibility which the framers of the constitution intended to secure to every department of the Government? Such a construction would defeat one of the great objects of the constitution in the distribution of its powers. Where Congress imposes on the Secretary the performance of a specific duty, it is imperative, and the responsibility, so far as the propriety of the measure is concerned, rests on Congress—and Congress is responsible to the people for such an act of legislation. Again: where it imposes on him as the head of an Executive Department, a discretionary duty, the responsibility rests on the President, who is also responsible to the people, and can be reached by them, on the recurrence of a re-election, or through their representatives, for a corrupt exercise of the Executive powers of the Government. But, if the Secretary, in the performance of such a duty, is beyond the control and supervision of the President, and not subject to removal by him, there is responsibility no where—none on the part of Congress, for its legislation was not imperative, but discretionary. None on the part of the President, for he has no power to interfere. None on the part of the Secretary, for there is no body to whom he is responsible, or by whom he can be called to account. In the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, the President only exercised his constitutional power, and assumed a responsibility imposed on him by the constitution—a responsibility which he cannot cast from him, even by giving his assent to a law which should go to curtail his powers. Suppose the charter of the Bank of the United States had said, in so many words, "that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in the said bank and branches thereof. But the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time, in his discretion, order and direct them to be removed; and that, in the exercise of that discretion, the President of the United States shall in nowise interfere." Even this language would not have altered the case—could not have curtailed the powers of the President. Such a provision would have been perfectly nugatory. It would be an encroachment of the legislative upon the executive power. If the deposits were unsafe, and the Secretary, under this legislative discretion, should refuse to remove them; or if he was about to remove them to an unsafe place, cannot and ought not the President to remove him? And still, such an exercise of power would not be more legitimate than the one under consideration.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the President in the removal of the late Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of his successor, has not "assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws," and of course, not "dangerous to the liberties of the people."

If the President has assumed such a power, as is alleged in the first resolution submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, the resolution ought not to pass, nor receive the sanction of the Senate, because it is a virtual impeachment of the President.

The honorable Senator anticipated this objection, and at an early stage of his remarks endeavored to clear it up. But, to my apprehension, like Leather Stockings in the Pioneers, he was bewildered and lost in the clearings. He says, "The Senate has three characters, legislative, executive, and judicial. Its ordinary, and by far its most important character, is that of its being a component part of the legislative department." It is in its legislative character that it is called upon to act on this resolution. But, the resolution proposes no legislation. It is not like a resolution in which principles are settled, for the purpose of referring the subject to a committee to report a bill in conformity to those principles. It proposes no such thing. If it shall pass, it furnishes no foundation for legislative action. It is a mere abstract proposition: the mere expression of opinion. Such an expression, although useless, would be less exceptionable, and perhaps even harmless, if it did not interfere with other duties devolved on the Senate by the constitution. The Senate is bound to keep itself in a situation to discharge all its duties, whether legislative, executive, or judicial; and, although one class of these duties may be more frequent and more important than the others, are not on that account to be less faithfully discharged. In its judicial capacity, as a court for the trial of impeachments, it forms one of the most important features in the constitution of the Government.

The offence charged in the resolution, if the President has not the power he has exercised, is an impeachable offence. Those offences, in the language of the constitution, are "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." The constitution itself gives the definition of treason. The definition of the other offences specified must probably be derived from the common law. Without attempting, however, to examine the law, as applicable to such offences, it is sufficient to observe, that if the President has assumed a power, the exercise of which can subject him to the infamous epithets of tyrant, usurper, despot, which have been so freely bestowed upon him, then he has, beyond all question, subjected himself to an impeachment. In that event, the Senate can make no expression of opinion on the subject. The power of impeachment belongs, exclusively, to the House of Representatives. Such an expression, on the part of the Senate, would disqualify it as a court for the trial of impeachments. "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation." How can we swear to do impartial justice to the accused, after having expressed an opinion? By such an expression, we are virtually violating the constitution which we have already sworn to support. How can we be said to support that constitution, if we thus disqualify ourselves as members of a court created by it? Not having heard the argument of a cause is of itself sufficient, from the highest to the lowest judicial tribunals of the country, to exclude a judge from taking part in the decision of it. How then can we, not only not hear the argument, but pronounce our opinions on a question which may come before us in our judicial capacity? It is answered that these cases but seldom occur. It is true, that after a lapse of nearly half a century, very few instances are to be found, where this high court of impeachment has been called upon to act. It is creditable to the country, and to us as a people, that such occurrences are so rare. Neither have I even the remotest apprehension or belief, that this Senate will be called to act in its judicial capacity, in the case now under consideration; because I hold, that the President has not assumed the exercise of a power not granted to him by the constitution and laws. But gentlemen on the other side, who view this matter differently, cannot, according to my apprehension, pass an opinion upon these alleged usurpations of the President, and at the same time, preserve a pure and upright character to the high court of which they are members. No matter whether an impeachment be anticipated or not, it is the duty of the Senate to keep itself uncommitted and impartial in any possible contingency. "The great objects," says a learned commentator, "to be attained in the selection of a tribunal for the trial of impeachments, are, impartiality, integrity, intelligence, and independence. If either of these is wanting, the trial must be radically imperfect. To ensure impartiality, the body must be in some degree removed from the popular power and passions, from the influence of sectional prejudice, and from the more dangerous influence of mere party spirit." Let gentlemen vote for this resolution, and then let them answer me, whether they feel themselves exempt from that influence more dangerous than popular power and passions or sectional prejudice.

If, then, Mr. President, this resolution cannot properly be entertained, why is it thus urged upon the Senate? Is it for political purposes? Is it for purposes of public excitement? Is it for the purpose of producing that distress, and spreading it throughout this whole community, about which so much is heard, and of which so much is already said to be felt? I know that such is not the wish or the intention of the honorable mover, nor of those who have sustained him—I know that it proceeds from motives of the most elevated patriotism—from that mens sibi conscia recti which has always distinguished the honorable Senator from Kentucky. But, sir, when a resolution is thus introduced and urged with so much vehemence—a resolution which calls for no legislative action, and which leads to no practical result—the people of this country, who cannot judge as we can, of the motives which govern movements here, may impute it to such causes, and thereby do injustice, not only to individual members of this body, but to the body itself. Is it then only another patriotic effort on the part of the honorable Senator to rescue the constitution from the tyrannical grasp of one, whom in prophetic vision, more than fifteen years ago, he foresaw would attempt to subvert the liberties of his country? Or is it a mere continuation of that siege which he then laid to a republican administration, and which, with but partial interruption, has not been raised even to the present day? I say this in no improper sense. For the Senator has himself told us, that for fifteen years, yea, fifteen long, long years, has he been struggling to avert and prevent the present deplorable state of things. Who can withhold his sympathy in the failure of a struggle of such magnitude, and one which has continued for a period half as long again as the siege of Troy! Ay, and with stratagem too, (honorable, I grant you, in such a warfare,) equal to that of the wooden horse, by which the wily Greeks were introduced into old Priam's fated city; but which, thank God, have not yet succeeded, to use the language of the honorable Senator, in driving these Goths from the Capitol of the nation.

The second resolution introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, alleges that the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, are unsatisfactory and insufficient.

This resolution ought not to pass, because it calls for no legislation, and leads to no result. Even admitting it to be true, what follows? There is no action. No legislation is proposed. There may be sufficient reasons, even if the Secretary has not assigned them. If so, then, so far as the action of Congress is concerned, it is perfectly immaterial whether the Secretary's reasons be sufficient or not. What was the object of that provision in the charter requiring the Secretary to report his reasons to Congress? It was, without doubt, to enable Congress to act in its legislative capacity on the subject. How can Congress thus act? Either by express enactment, or by joint or concurrent resolution. Congress can act in no other capacity. The Senate can act in no other capacity. This matter does not appertain to its executive or judicial powers. The object then was, in requiring the Secretary to report his reasons, to enable Congress to legislate—first, by directing the deposits to be restored to the Bank of the United States; or second, by ordering them to some other safe places of deposit. This resolution proposes to attain neither object, and is therefore perfectly nugatory—worse than useless. But it is urged that an expression of the Senate will have its effect on the Secretary; and, in a tone of defiance, it is said, Let him dare refuse or omit to restore the deposits after such an expression? Sir, the Secretary is made of sterner stuff than to yield his opinion of duty to menace, no matter how high the source from whence it comes, or I have altogether misapprehended his character. The step he has taken was from the most mature deliberation—from a thorough conviction that the great and paramount interests of the country required it—and that the bank, from its conduct, had forfeited all claim to the longer custody of the public deposits.

All the operations of the bank, and of its partisans since, have only served to confirm his convictions. I apprehend, therefore, that no expression from this body, or even from Congress, unless it have the binding force of law, will induce him to abandon the onward course which he has commenced, towards preparing the country for the winding up of the concerns of this great moneyed monopoly. Sir, permit me to ask, whence comes this menace? By whom is this expression to be made, if made at all? Does it come from the people? No! It is understood that their immediate representatives entertain entirely different opinions. Does it come from the people as they are represented in the State legislatures? No!

[SENATE.]

Their voice is not heard in this hall. It is, then, to be made by an inexorable majority, formed of those who hold their seats here, against the declared wishes of the legislatures of their respective States, as expressed on this very subject. Could the voice of the people, as it is to be collected from their representatives in the State legislatures, be heard here, it would be in strict accordance with the views of the President and Secretary of the Treasury. Far be it from me to impute censure or blame to those honorable Senators who stand in the attitude I have mentioned. That is a matter between them and their own consciences—between them and their own constituents. If the same principles should govern them, which governed another member of this body—and which deprived it of one of its brightest ornaments—if the instructions of their legislatures should be deemed binding upon them, as those of his were held imperative on him, the expression which would be made, upon the resolution under consideration, would be very different from that which is now anticipated, and which, it is supposed, is to have such magical effect on the future action of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, before entering into an examination of the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits, I feel it my duty to trespass upon the patience of the Senate, whilst I attempt a review of the principles laid down in the report of the Committee on Finance. The manner in which this report came before the Senate, is fresh in the recollection of all. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, assigning his reasons to Congress for the removal of the deposits, together with the second resolution submitted by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, were severd from the special order, which had so long been under discussion, and late in the afternoon referred to the Committee on Finance. This committee, the next morning, recommended the adoption of the resolution which had been referred to them, and accompanied that recommendation with the report which it is my purpose to examine. It is true, the report came suddenly upon us—full grown from the head of the honorable chairman, [Mr. WEBSTER,] like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter. On that account, it may be even more deserving of our attention. As it has been ingrafted on the special order, and as no one has yet attempted a critical examination of it, I feel that it is due to the subject, as well as to the high source from whence it emanates, that it should no longer be left unnoticed or neglected. If, on such examination, it should be found that its principles are not sustained by the arguments advanced, I am free to confess, that it is not for want of ability with which they are put forth, but from the inherent difficulties of the subject itself.

If I had ever entertained any doubts as to the power of the President to remove the Secretary, or as to the power of the Secretary to remove the deposits, this report would have dispelled them all. It narrows down this whole controversy to a single point, namely, that if the Secretary's reasons are not sufficient, then the bank is entitled to a restoration of the deposits. The chairman does not pretend to controvert the power of the President, nor even the power of the Secretary, but simply contends, that if the Secretary's reasons, at the time of the removal of the deposits, were insufficient, then the bank is entitled to have them returned. It may, therefore, be assumed that, whilst the honorable Senator from Kentucky has been, from day to day, gathering up the broken fragments of the constitution, replacing its pillars on their ancient foundations, and erecting anew the edifices of constitutional liberty, we have the tacit authority of the honorable chairman for saying, that neither the President nor the Secretary has exercised a power not granted to him by the constitution and laws. The report assumes the shape of a technical, legal argument. My answer to it, so far as I am able, shall partake of the same character.

Report of the Committee on Finance.

The honorable chairman [Mr. WEBSTER] commences his report by stating that—

"The act incorporating the Bank of the United States, as is justly remarked by the Secretary, is a contract, containing stipulations on the part of the Government, and on the part of the corporation, entered into for full and adequate consideration.

"The Government became party to this contract by granting the charter, and the stockholders by accepting it. 'In consideration,' says the charter, 'of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act on the said bank, the president and directors thereof shall pay to the United States, out of the corporate funds thereof, one million and five hundred thousand dollars, in three equal payments;' and, in another section, it declares that 'during the continuance of this act, and whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place within the United States, or the Territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions, or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange; and shall do and perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several States, or any one or more of them, whenever required by law.'

"The section immediately following this provision, is in these words: 'And be it further enacted, That the deposits of the money of the United States in places in which the said bank and branches thereof may be established, shall be made in said bank or branches thereof, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct; in which case the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately lay before Congress, if in session, and if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons for such order or direction.'

"It is not to be denied or doubted that this custody of the public deposits, was one of the 'benefits' conferred on the bank by the charter, in consideration of the money paid, and the services undertaken to be performed, by the bank to the Government; and to this custody the bank has a just right, unless such causes have arisen as may have justified the Secretary in giving an order and direction for changing that custody. Any order or direction, therefore, issued under the provisions of this law, necessarily involves a consideration of the just extent of the Secretary's power, and of the rights of the bank."

Now I venture to deny that "the money paid" formed any part of the consideration for the custody of the public deposits. It is manifest that the clause of the charter which assumes the form of a contract, cannot be resorted to as a complete test of the meaning and construction of the charter in this respect, because it states the bonus to be the sole consideration on the part of the bank for the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred. It is not as if the charter had said, that in consideration of the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act on the bank, the bank shall pay, &c., and perform the services hereinafter mentioned. The whole charter must be resorted to for the true construction. If the bonus be, as stated in that section, the sole consideration on the part of the bank, then the services stipulated in the charter to be performed by the bank, namely, the giving the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, are altogether gratuitous. These are merely intended to show, that the contracting clause is not always an infallible test of the meaning of the act in respect to the considerations on either side.

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

I agree that the bonus paid by the bank, and the services to be performed by the bank for the Government, were the considerations for all the privileges and benefits conferred on the bank by the charter. Yet I insist that "the services undertaken to be performed by the bank to the Government," are a separate, distinct, and sole consideration, for the benefit of "the custody of the public depositories." If the transmission of the public funds from place to place, and the distribution of the same in payment of the public creditors, be not the sole consideration for the custody of the public depositories, then it follows, if the depositories are removed for good cause, such as lack of safety, which the chairman concedes to be good cause, that the bank would still be bound to perform the duties stipulated in the charter, at its own risk and without compensation. Under such a construction, the Secretary of the Treasury might require the Bank of the United States to transmit the public funds, now deposited in certain local State banks in the city of New York, to the city of New Orleans, without pay or reward. This would appear absurd and unreasonable. I think, therefore, it cannot be denied, that when the public depositories are withdrawn from the Bank of the United States, the bank is absolved from its obligation to transmit the public funds from place to place. If so, does it not prove that the services to be performed by the bank in the transmission of the moneys of the Government, was the sole consideration rendered for the benefit of the custody of the depositories, and that one depended on the other.

Sir, it has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN], in an incidental debate the other morning, that the bank would be bound to perform that service, notwithstanding the depositories were removed. The charter must be so construed as to carry into effect the probable intention of both parties to the contract. It can hardly be supposed, that it was the intention of either party that such services should be rendered by the bank, when the funds thus to be transmitted were not deposited with it. There is no doubt, in my mind, that if the Secretary of the Treasury should deposit any specific amount of the public moneys with the bank, that he might require the bank to transmit it. But that requirement would rest on the principle, that the bank has the custody of the public depositories to the amount required to be transmitted. The Secretary, representing one of the parties to the contract, the Government, has so construed it, and has accordingly arranged with the State banks to perform the same services which were required to be performed by the Bank of the United States, and for the same consideration, the custody of the public depositories.

From the above it follows, that the Bank of the United States, from its engagement to transmit the public funds from place to place, &c., is entitled to the custody of the public depositories, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise order and direct. Although the public depositories are to continue with the bank only at the will, and during the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the supervision of the President, yet there is a perfect reciprocity in the provisions of the law, inasmuch as the bank ceases to perform the services stipulated whenever the depositories are withdrawn. This view of the matter entirely destroys the argument of the chairman, establishing the rights of the bank, as drawn from the assertion, that "the bank has contracted for the keeping of the public moneys, and paid for it as for a privilege or benefit." Indeed, in a subsequent part of the report, the chairman seems to have abandoned his first position, and concedes that the depositories were the specific consideration for the services to be rendered by the bank. "If, in truth," says he, "the bank will not grant the facilities which it has promised, in consideration of receiving and holding the fund, then certainly it ought to be removed." But waiving this view of the subject, and conceding that the bonus, and the services to be rendered, together formed the consideration for "the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred" by the charter, still, the proposition laid down by the chairman is incorrect. It should be amended so as to read, "that the custody of the public depositories, until the Secretary of the Treasury should otherwise order and direct, was one of the 'benefits' conferred on the bank, in consideration of the money paid, and the services undertaken to be performed by the bank to the Government."

Sir, aside from the preceding view, I contend that the "exclusive privileges" were those conferred by the relinquishment of the right, on the part of Congress, to grant other banking incorporations for the period of twenty years. The "benefits" were the banking privileges which every bank enjoys, namely, to receive depositories, discount notes, and issue bills beyond the amount of its capital. These benefits, thus conferred by an act of incorporation, are at best but a monopoly; and we should avoid giving a construction to the charter which should seem to confer greater than was intended. For such "benefits," some of the old banks in the city of New York paid a much larger bonus, in proportion to capital, than the Bank of the United States. They had no exclusive privileges. Other banks were, from year to year, granted and located alongside of them, and entered into competition with them. They were not entitled to, neither did they receive, the public depositories belonging to the State. Nor had their bills and notes any preference over those of other banks in being received in payment of the public dues. Take another view: The bill, as originally reported, to incorporate the Bank of the United States, did not contain the provision in relation to the custody of, or the removal of, the public depositories from the bank. That provision is contained in the sixteenth section, which was ingrafted on the bill in the course of its passage through the House of Representatives, and became a part of the charter. Suppose this section had never been adopted, then the Secretary of the Treasury would have had the power to place the public depositories where he pleased—a power which he had always possessed, and which had always been exercised by him. The obligation of the bank to perform the services stipulated in the charter would have remained the same. But, it is evident that the Secretary could not have called on the bank to transmit any more of the public funds than he should deposit with it. This shows, conclusively, that the depositories were not any part of the consideration for the bonus. For the "exclusive privileges and benefits conferred," would have been precisely the same if the sixteenth section had never been adopted.

This conclusion follows, from an examination of the charter itself. If we look at the plan for a national bank furnished in 1816, by Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, and which was the foundation of the charter of the present Bank of the United States, we shall there find, that the bonus was for far different purposes than the custody of the public depositories. Mr. Dallas says:

"It is proposed that a bonus be paid to the Government by the subscribers to the national bank, in consideration of the emoluments to be derived from an exclusive charter, during a period of twenty years.

"Independent of the bonus here proposed to be exacted, there are undoubtedly many public advantages to be drawn from the establishment of the national bank; but these are generally of an incidental kind, and (as in the case of the depositories and distribution of the revenue) may be regarded in the light of equivalents, not for the monopoly of the charter, but for the reciprocal advantages of a fiscal connexion with the public treasury.

"The amount of the bonus should be in proportion to the value of the charter-grant, or, in other words, to the nett profits which the subscribers will probably make, in consequence of their incorporation. The average rate of the dividends of the State banks, before the suspension of payments in coin, was about eight per cent. per annum. It appears, by a report from this Department to the House of Representatives, dated the 3d of April, 1810, that the annual dividends of the late Bank of the United States averaged, throughout the duration of its charter, the rate of 8 13-36 per cent. But, under all the circumstances which will attend the establishment and operations of the proposed national bank, its enlarged capital, and the extended field of competition, it is not deemed reasonable, for the present purpose, to rate the annual dividends of the institution higher than seven per centum upon its capital of thirty-five millions of dollars.

"Allowing, therefore, two, three, and four years for the payment of the bonus, a sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars would amount to about 4 per cent. upon the capital of the bank; and would constitute a just equivalent for the benefits of its charter."

From this it will be seen, that the custody of the public depositories, and the distribution of the revenue, were regarded as equivalents. After all, this examination of the consideration on either side of this contract does not seem to advance us far in determining the powers of the Secretary over the depositories. They are to be made with the bank, until he shall otherwise order and direct. But the reasoning of the chairman seemed to require thus much of attention and respect.

The chairman contends, that the power of the Secretary to remove the depositories is limited to two contingencies—first, the lack of safety to the public funds—second, the failure of the bank to transmit those funds from place to place, when required—and that his power is not absolute and unconditional. "If," says he, "it be absolute and unconditional, so far as respects the rights of the bank, it must be absolute and unconditional in all other respects: because it is obvious, if there be any limitation, that limitation is imposed as much for the benefit of the bank as the security of the country." * * * "So that if the Secretary's power be in truth absolute and unconditional, it restrains Congress from judging whether the public good is injured by the removal, just as much as it restrains it from judging whether the rights of the bank are injured by the removal; because the limitation, if any, is equally for the security of the bank and the country." I remark, first, that the proposition as to absolute power has no necessary connexion with, or dependence on, that concerning the limitation. Suppose the charter had said, "The depositories shall be made in the bank, unless the Secretary of the Treasury, upon insolvency of the bank, or neglect or refusal to transfer the public funds from place to place, shall otherwise order and direct." In this case, there would be an express limitation of the Secretary's power, "imposed as much for the benefit of the bank as the security of the country;" for the benefit of the bank, for until the contingencies happen, the bank would be entitled to the depositories—for the benefit of the country, for when the contingencies do happen, the depositories may be removed and the money saved. But who can pretend to say, if this limitation be stricken out, so that the Secretary has an absolute and unconditional right to remove the depositories, so far as the bank is concerned, that his powers, in defiance of Congress and the country, are equally free from their control?

The chairman would have us understand, that in granting the charter, Congress looked with paternal care to the interests of the bank, and imposed all its limitations as much for the benefit of the bank as for the country. But how does it follow from this, that if Congress gave the Secretary absolute and unconditional power over the depositories, as regards the bank, that he must, of necessity, also have such absolute and unconditional power as restrains Congress "from judging whether the public good is injured by the removal?" My conclusion is, that the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the depositories is absolute and unconditional. Whenever he exercises that power, it merely puts the disposition of the public funds under the control of Congress. Without the previous action of the Secretary, Congress could not get that control. Having thus obtained it, Congress can place the funds wherever it pleases, without regard to the reasons which governed the Secretary in the removal of them. It is, evidently, a part of the contract that the Secretary shall have this power, and it is for Congress, after its exercise by him, to make such disposition of the public moneys as the interests of the country may require. To say, then, that the Secretary can exercise this power only in the event of the happening of the contingencies named, is an assumption, in my judgment, not borne out by the charter, nor by the reasoning of the chairman upon it. If lack of safety, or a failure to transfer the public funds, had been the only ground on which to remove the depositories, the sixteenth section would have so provided. The terms of the section being general, it of course left the matter to the Secretary's discretion. If the power was not intended to extend beyond those contingencies, why was it not so limited, in terms? The chairman finds it convenient to limit it to this now. Why did he not make the sixteenth section explicit on those points when the charter was granted? He is understood to be the member in the other House who offered that section. Why did he leave the power so general, when the Secretary was restricted, as he has shown, in so many other cases? Sir, the bank was always feared, and this section was, no doubt, intended to give the Secretary such power over the depositories, as to embrace contingencies which were not then anticipated, and which could not then be enumerated or foreseen, but which might arise under the mighty power of wielding so large a capital.

Again: The chairman says that the Secretary of the Treasury is required by the charter to assign his reasons to Congress for the removal of the public depositories, and, if those reasons are insufficient, then the bank is entitled to have the depositories returned. Even on this principle, if the Secretary deemed there was sufficient reason, on any ground whatever, although others might not, still he would have the right to remove them, and no one could control him. In fact, it is not denied, but conceded by the chairman, that the Secretary has the right, in the first instance, to remove the depositories, but if his reasons are insufficient, then the bank is entitled to have them returned. There may be sufficient reasons, and the Secretary may have failed to assign them. Suppose he deemed the depositories unsafe in the Bank of the United States, and the bank had also neglected or refused to transmit the public funds according to the stipulations of its charter, and he should remove the depositories, and assign as his reasons for the removal, the want of safety, and it should turn out, in point of fact, that they were perfectly safe. According to the doctrine of the chairman, they must be restored to the bank, because the reasons assigned by the Secretary were insufficient, although other sufficient reasons not assigned, such as a neglect or refusal to transmit the funds, existed at the very time. To what absurdities would such a principle lead us? Even if the reasons were insufficient, at the time, for the removal of the depositories, there may be sufficient reasons since their removal, against the restoration of them. Still, according to the position assumed by the chairman, the bank has a right to have them returned, if the reasons were insufficient at the time of their removal. Because, says he, "the whole subject is now before Congress, by way of appeal from his decision; and the question is, whether that decision ought to stand or ought to be reversed."

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposites.

[MARCH 12, 1834.]

Of course, if the case comes before Congress in the nature of an appeal, no other reasons can be inquired into, except those assigned on the record to be revised. If Congress could go into an inquiry as to other reasons than those assigned, then it conclusively shows that the requisition on the Secretary to assign reasons, has no connexion with his power to remove, or the right of the bank to have the deposits restored.

Congress can make no expression by which the deposits can be restored, unless it have the authority of law. This, I have already shown, can only be done by legislative enactment, or by joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses. In either case it must have the approval of the President. If he disapprove it, although there may be a majority of Congress in favor of the measure, still the deposits cannot be restored, because the action of Congress has not assumed a complete legislative sanction, according to the forms and requirements of the constitution. Congress, it would seem, then, may be of opinion that the reasons of the Secretary are insufficient, and still be unable to order a restoration. From this, it is manifest, that neither the removal nor the restoration can depend on the sufficiency or insufficiency of the reasons assigned by the Secretary.

The assignment of reasons, therefore, is merely to enable Congress to legislate on the subject more understandingly, provided any legislation should be deemed necessary. If the Secretary had not been required by the charter to assign reasons, then, according to the argument of the chairman, his power to remove would have been absolute and unconditional. "As he is bound to give reasons," says he, "this very circumstance shows that his authority is not absolute and unconditional." Wherein is the difference? In that case Congress could have called on him by resolution, for his reasons, and could then have acted the same as now, where his reasons were assigned in the first instance. The mere fact of the charter requiring him to give his reasons, does not thereby control his absolute and unconditional power of removal. The reasons were required that the Secretary might feel that he was acting under a responsibility which called for good reasons to justify him; and that Congress might also have the whole matter before them, without the delay of calling for his reasons.

Again: The chairman contends that the Secretary has not the power to remove the deposits for the "general interest and convenience of the people." "Every where else," says he, "he appears in the character of a limited and restricted agent;" "and the committee are of opinion that the charter of the bank no more intended to give such a wide scope to the Secretary in regard to the deposits, than other laws intended to give him the same wide scope in respect to other duties of his office." The reverse is the proper conclusion. If, upon an examination of all the other acts of Congress treating of the Secretary's powers and duties, they were particularly specified, so that, in those acts, "he appears in the character of a limited and restricted agent," it follows, that in the bank charter, Congress intended to clothe him with general and unrestrained power over the deposits—else, why was he not limited and restricted as in all other cases? If this case were on argument before the supreme judicial tribunal of the country, now sitting in another part of this Capitol, the very argument which the chairman has used to show the limited and restricted power of the Secretary, would be the strongest and most conclusive that could be urged upon that court, to establish the absolute and unconditional power of the Secretary over the deposits. In other words, that the Secretary has not the power claimed, is proved by the chairman, by showing that he has not got a greater power than that claimed.

Sir, permit me to make another quotation from the report of the honorable chairman:

"The Government is proprietor of seven millions of the stock of the bank; and yet no authority is given to the Secretary to sell this stock under any circumstances whatever, or in any other way to interfere with it.

"The bills and notes of the bank, too, are made receivable in all payments to the United States, until Congress shall otherwise order; and no power is given to the Secretary to prevent their being so received, either during the session of Congress or in its recess, however the credit of these bills and notes might become depreciated.

"How is it possible to conceive that, if Congress intended to give to the Secretary a general right to judge of the operations and proceedings of the bank, and a power, of course, to declare when it had violated its duty, and was no longer trustworthy, it should yet leave him under an absolute obligation to receive its bills and notes in all payments to the Treasury, though they might have lost all credit, and place no means in his hands to execute his high authority of superintendent, except the mere power of removal?"

With all due respect, I cannot hesitate to pronounce the above a perfect non sequitur. Look at it. Examine it. Test it in any way you please, and it can assume no other character. Because the Secretary is not vested with power to sell the stock of the Government, when the bank is using it for unjustifiable purposes, therefore he has not the power to withdraw the deposits to prevent an abuse in the use of them also by the bank! Because the Secretary is obliged to receive the bills of the bank in payment of debts due the Government, when, by the mal-administration of the bank, the bills are greatly depreciated, therefore he has not the power to remove the deposits, and place them in banks whose bills are at par and not depreciated!

Let me quote the chairman once more:

"Wherever it is clear that Congress has given the Secretary a power, it has given him the means of informing his judgment as to the propriety of exercising that power. He has power to remove the deposits; and ample means are afforded him by which he may learn, from time to time, whether those deposits are safe. For this purpose, it is expressly made the duty of the bank to furnish him, so often as he shall require, if not oftener than once a week, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the corporation, of the debts due to it, of the moneys deposited in it, of its notes in circulation, and specie on hand; and he has a right to inspect the general accounts, in the books of the bank, relating to this statement."

"This statement," says the chairman, "enables him to judge of the solvency and stability of the bank, and of the safety of the public moneys deposited in it." Is it indeed for such a purpose that this statement is required to be furnished? Or is it not rather to enable the Secretary to judge whether the bank is discounting too much or too little; whether it is expanding or contracting its circulation too much; whether such expansion or contraction is for political objects or electioneering purposes; in short, whether the general affairs of the bank are managed for the good of the country? I do not pretend to say that the Secretary can, as is intimated by the chairman in another place, supersede the board of directors, or control their action, in the management of the general affairs of the bank. But I do say, that it is his right, no less than his duty, to judge of that management, as regards the great and paramount interests of the country, and to correct it, if, in his judgment, it be wrong, so far as his power over the public deposits may enable him to do it. This power was exercised by Mr. Crawford, when Secretary of the Treasury. He watched the expansions and contractions of the bank, not only in reference to its own interests, but also in reference to the interests of the State banks, as connected with, and inseparable from, the great interests of the country. Mr. Crawford ascertained, from the statements referred to by the chairman, that some of the western branches had extended their discounts too far, in consequence of having the public depositories. He directed that the State banks should become the depositories of the public money, although it so happened, that in three of the places where the banks were situated with which he made these arrangements, branches of the Bank of the United States were also established. The power thus exercised by Mr. Crawford was never questioned or denied by the bank, but, on the contrary, was acknowledged and acquiesced in by it. I have, however, cited Mr. Crawford's practice, in this place, not for the purpose of showing the Secretary's power of removal, but, for the purpose of showing the manner in which he used the information derived from the statements of the bank, and for what purpose he used them.

But, the chairman seems to suppose that this statement was intended to enable the Secretary to judge of the solvency of the bank. Who ever thought of ascertaining the solvency of a bank, by merely knowing the debts owing and the debts due, without the means of knowing whether they be good or bad? Such a general statement as the bank is required to make to the Secretary, might serve to detect a gross mal-administration of its affairs, but it would furnish a poor criterion to judge of its solvency. That depends on the goodness of the debts due to it; and the charter gives the Secretary no power by which he can ascertain this. The power to inspect the general accounts, in the books of the bank, has never been understood to authorize an inspection to ascertain who are the particular debtors; the amount they owe; or their ability to pay. On the contrary, he is by the charter expressly denied the "right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank."

The chairman treats this matter of keeping the public depositories as a contract between the Government and the bank; and to remove the depositories "without the occurrence of just cause," is to violate the contract into which the Government has solemnly entered. He then proceeds to enumerate the just causes for which the depositories may be removed. "If, in truth, the money is believed to be unsafe; if, in truth, the bank will not grant the facilities which it has promised, in consideration of receiving and holding the fund, then, certainly, it ought to be removed. But here the power must stop, or else it is altogether unbounded." Then, though the bank may discount so much or so little as to derange the whole business of the country; expand or contract its circulation to a ruinous extent; openly undertake to interfere with the politics and control the elections of the country; its bills may become depreciated; yet the depositories must remain, because neither of the just causes has occurred, upon which the power to remove them was reserved in the contract! But, says the chairman, "for the depreciation of the bills of the bank, should that happen, and for other cases of mal-administration, Congress has provided just and appropriate remedies, to be applied by itself and others, in exclusion of the Secretary." For the depreciation of the bills, the chairman does not specify the remedy—but, by the charter, they "shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress." Congress, then, by act, may refuse to take them in payments to the United States, and would, probably, refuse to take them if depreciated. If the act had said, "unless otherwise directed by the Secretary of the Treasury," instead of Congress, then his power would have been as ample as that of Congress, with this addition, that he could refuse them in the recess of Congress. Even in that case, the Secretary's power would not have been more ample than his power to remove the depositories under the sixteenth section of the charter. But suppose there be great depreciation of the bills in the recess of Congress, when there is no power to refuse them in payments to the Government, must the Secretary continue the depositories in the bank, which he has the power to remove at any time, because Congress has the power to refuse its bills when in session?

For violations of the charter of the bank, the chairman alludes to the remedies provided in the charter itself. What are those remedies? They are contained in section twenty-three. A committee of either House of Congress may inspect the books, and examine into the proceedings of the bank, and report whether the provisions of its charter have been violated or not; and whenever any such committee shall find and report, or the President of the United States shall have reason to believe, that the charter has been violated, Congress may direct, or the President may order a scire facias to be issued, calling upon the bank to show cause why its charter should not be declared forfeited. These are the remedies provided in the charter. But does the chairman mean to be understood that these are the only remedies for a mal-administration of the bank? If they be, what would be the consequence? It might take one or more years to go through with proceedings on scire facias: for, it must be borne in mind, that all issues of fact are to be tried by a jury; and after a decision is had in the district court, the bank can, on writ of error, have the final judgment of that court examined in the Supreme Court of the United States, where it may be reversed or affirmed, according to the usages of law. If this proceeding be the only appropriate remedy, then the depositories must remain one or more years after Congress, by instituting such proceedings, has declared its opinion that the bank is not entitled any longer to hold its charter, much less the depositories, and that there is good cause of removal—after the President, too, by similar measures, and from information which justifies the belief that its charter has been violated, has declared his opinion that the bank is no longer entitled to the confidence of the Government. Can it be possible, that, when Congress has thus declared its opinion, and the President his belief, that the charter has been violated, and a scire facias has been ordered to forfeit it, the depositories must remain with the bank until the forfeiture is declared! Although the bank may have incurred a forfeiture of its charter, still the public money may be perfectly safe in its custody, and it may continue to afford all the facilities required by its charter, for the transmission of the public funds from place to place. If so, then, according to the doctrine of the chairman, the depositories cannot be removed. For, no matter what the violations of the charter may be, no matter what the mal-administration of the bank, in other respects, may be—if the depositories are safe in its custody, if it has performed the services stipulated by the contract, then, on the principles with which the chairman set out, they cannot be removed! To my mind, this view alone is conclusive against that position.

Sir, these remedies were not provided for the purpose of removing the depositories, but for annulling the charter. Had the sixteenth section said, "unless Congress shall otherwise order and direct," would not Congress have the power to remove the depositories at any time, and for any cause? Most assuredly; the same as Congress now has the power to refuse to receive the bills of the bank under the fourteenth section. Suppose the clause giving the power to the Secretary be stricken out, then the bank is entitled to the depositories absolutely, and Congress has no power to remove them, however much the public good may require it, or however bad the affairs of the bank may be administered. The only remedy would be the tedious process of scire facias; and even then, nothing short of a forfeiture of the charter would furnish redress or authorize a withdrawal of the depositories. Treating this charter as a contract, it is manifest, that the power to remove the depositories is contained only in the clause in question; and the right in Congress, so far as it can be said to have any right, to remove them, for any mal-administration of the bank, or because the public good required it, is to be found in that part of the act which provides that the depositories shall be made in the bank, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise order and direct. If that clause be stricken out, then Congress has no power over them. If Congress had been inserted instead of the Secretary, Congress would have had the power, without limitation or restriction. The Secretary being inserted in the place of Congress, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that he must have the same power that Congress would have had. In the one case, Congress could have made the removal for other causes than those specified by the chairman; in the other, the Secretary could remove them without reference to the two contingencies named by the chairman. The fact that the Secretary is required to assign reasons, makes no difference as to his power. The reasons are merely to enable Congress to do what it would have done, if the power had been reserved to itself instead of the Secretary. This requirement, in truth, furnishes an additional argument against his powers being limited to the two contingencies named. If such had been the intention of Congress, the charter, instead of requiring, in general terms, that the Secretary should lay before Congress his reasons for such order and direction, would have required him to inform Congress which of the two contingencies had happened. Requiring reasons in general terms contemplates a wide and unrestricted discretion—a discretion to be exercised, not on the happening of a specified contingency, but a discretion to be exercised when, all things considered, reason dictated it.

Again: The honorable chairman says, "the Secretary has not the power to remove the depositories when he thinks it for the general welfare of the country: for the reasons, first, because Congress has not given him the appropriate powers of remedy in the most important instances; second, because it has, in those instances, either expressly reserved those powers to itself, or expressly conferred them on the President." Is it sound to say, that, because Congress and the President may take measures upon a violation of the charter, the Secretary may not, for the same violation, remove the depositories? This argument seems to concede, that, had not the power been reserved to Congress and the President, the Secretary would have had the right to remove them, since it is used to show, that the Secretary had not the right, because it is reserved to Congress and the President. The unsoundness of the argument, however, is manifest, when we consider that there is no inconsistency in Congress, the President, and the Secretary, each and all having the power to act at the same time and on the same contingency. For a violation of the charter, Congress appoints a committee to examine and report. The President, if he has reason to believe there has been a violation, directs a scire facias, and the Secretary removes the depositories. There is no objection to these remedies being pursued by these different departments and functionaries of the Government, at the same time, and for the purpose of guarding and protecting those great interests intrusted to them respectively. Sir, aside from this consideration, permit me to say, that Congress and the President have the right to inquire into the violations of the charter without any express statutory provision or reservation in the charter itself. It is a common law right. How, then, can it with propriety be said, that for a violation of the charter, the Secretary cannot remove the depositories, because the charter itself has provided other remedies for such violations, when, at the same time, it is shown that like remedies may be pursued, as a common law right, without such reservation? Such an inquiry is incident to, and is an attribute of, sovereignty. It is the right which every sovereign power retains to itself, inherent in itself, over such incorporations, which are the mere creatures of its will, brought into existence by its authority, and subject to its inquiries for any violations of their charters. An act which works a forfeiture of the charter is an infringement of that sovereignty.

Sir, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the Secretary cannot interfere with the depositories on account of any violations of the charter, where remedies are provided in the charter itself, does it follow that he cannot interfere where no such provision is made? To make myself better understood, permit me to say, that the remedy by scire facias is only proper in that class of violations which works a forfeiture of the charter. There are many violations which do not work a forfeiture, and for which a scire facias is not the proper remedy. But a scire facias is the only remedy in the act, and of course can only reach a particular class of cases. The true doctrine on this subject, in my judgment, was laid down by the chairman of the committee which investigated the concerns of the bank in 1819, [Mr. SHERMAN, of New York,] whose authority I would not hesitate to cite, on such a question, in this or any other place. "Those acts of usurpation of power not granted, of mis-user and of non-user of those granted, which defeat the very objects of the institution, as expressed in the charter itself, would produce a forfeiture; and that all other instances of abuse of the powers granted, or of usurpation of powers, must be punished or restrained, either by the ordinary process of mandamus and quo warranto, or by other means than a dissolution of the corporation." If, then, there be violations which do not work a forfeiture, the provisions of the statute do not reach them; and if the Secretary cannot remove the depositories for such violations, then they cannot be removed at all, for the grossest mal-administration, because neither Congress nor the President has any power by the charter to reach such cases. The power of the Secretary has been deemed an appropriate remedy, to be exercised at the same time with that of Congress, or the President; or to be exercised separately, and as being sufficient of itself. This was the view taken of the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury by the Committee of Investigation in 1819, and which seems to have been acquiesced in by Congress as the true construction of those powers. The committee, although they reported several violations of the charter, did not recommend that a scire facias issue. They say:

"They have not recommended the adoption of any immediate measures to correct the many evils and mischiefs they have depicted, excepting that of the bill before mentioned, because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy, whenever the situation of the bank shall require it. And if, after the stockholders have become acquainted with the mismanagement of the institution, they shall adopt no means to prevent its continuance, or the directors themselves shall persist in a course of conduct requiring correction, the committee cannot entertain a doubt that a salutary power lodged in the Treasury Department will be exerted, as occasion may require, and with reference to the best interests of the United States."

Sir, the chairman puts the following interrogatory:

"If the Secretary cannot prevent the notes of the bank from being received at the custom-houses and the land offices, even after they should be discredited; if he have no power to touch, in any way, the seven millions of stock belonging to the Government; if the power of examination into the proceedings of the bank be given, not to him, but to either House of Congress; if he have no power, but Congress and the President, each, has power to direct a legal investigation into the conduct of the bank; how can it possibly be maintained that a general inspection and guardianship over the public welfare, so far as it is connected with the bank, is confided to him; and that his authority to remove the deposits was given, not to protect the deposits themselves, and secure their proper use, but to enable him to force upon the bank, under penalty of their removal, such a course of management as his sense of the public interest and of the convenience of the people, may require?"

My answer to this, in the first place, is, that the restraints and restrictions on the Secretary enumerated by the chairman, and his being unrestrained and unrestricted in the sixteenth section, conclusively show that, as to the removal of the deposits, it was intended his power should be absolute and unconditional. But the chairman contends that such construction makes the Secretary's "discretion so broad and unlimited, that its consequences can be no less than to subject, not only all the operations of the bank and its offices, but its powers and capacities, perhaps its very existence, to his individual will." The fallacy of this argument appears from a single consideration. Had the sixteenth section not been introduced, then, by the bill as reported, the bank would have no claim to the deposits. The Secretary's power over them would have been the same as when the old United States Bank existed. He could have deposited the public funds where he pleased; and so far as their management was concerned, he would have had, and could have exercised, a discretion as broad and unlimited as the one claimed by the chairman. Does then the fact, that the deposits are by the charter to be made in the bank, subject to removal at the discretion of the Secretary, make any difference? If he removes them, he exercises the same power and no more, in regard to their management and the effect on the bank, than if they had never been placed there.

I have thus, Mr. President, gone through with a review of the principles of the report of the honorable chairman, and my conclusion is, that the Secretary may remove the deposits for reasons which he deems sufficient; and being thus removed, Congress has the absolute and unconditional power, in its legislative capacity, to restore them to the bank, or place them elsewhere, without regard to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the Secretary's reasons for their removal, and without regard to any right, on the part of the bank, to have them returned to its custody.

Mr. President, when this discussion commenced, it was assumed that the mere removal of the deposits was the cause of the pressure in the money market. It was, however, soon discovered that such a ground was untenable; that the mere taking the sum of nine millions of dollars from one bank and placing it with others, could not, of itself, produce any such effect. Driven from that position, it was assumed that the manner of removal was the cause. This being untenable also, the ground is now taken, that the cause of the pressure is to be found in the antagonist positions of the bank and the Government. This last is the peculiar ground occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts, and is so assigned in his report, on which I have just been commenting. What is the consequence? Or, in more proper language, how is this difficulty to be obviated? There are but two ways: either the Government must yield to the bank, or the bank must yield to the Government—either the present administration of the Government must be overthrown, or the bank must be overthrown. Can the people hesitate which of the alternatives to choose? Ought we, as their representatives, to hesitate? Shall it be tolerated, in this free country, that a moneyed institution shall set itself up against the administration of the Government chosen and sustained by the people themselves. Shall it for one moment be permitted that such a monstrous power should be suffered longer to exist, and to overawe the very power that spoke it into existence? It is not its opposition to the administration that I so much regard. It is its opposition to the principles on which the administration is based. It is its bold attempt to set up and establish a power within this Government, superior to the Government itself. The issue between the bank and the Government being once fairly made up and submitted to the people, I will most cheerfully acquiesce in their decision. If they are willing to become the slaves of such a power, its chains will soon be riveted on them. In the very act of submission to its dictates, they will have become slaves already. But, sir, I have no such painful forebodings. I know too well the spirit of the American people. They have heretofore, and they will again "scorn to be slaves."

Sir, in my examination of the report of the Committee on Finance, the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits have incidentally come in question. It is my purpose now to bestow some further attention on them. But, before doing that, let us inquire, for a moment, how the Secretary came into a situation that required these reasons of him. He was the Attorney General of the United States—the law officer of the Government—the constitutional adviser of the President—a member of his cabinet. As such, when called on by the President for that purpose, he is understood to have given his written opinion in favor of a removal of the deposits, and that, too, long before they were removed. When the President ascertained that Mr. Duane would not be able to carry his wishes into effect in regard to a matter in which he deemed the great interests and future prosperity of the country involved, he tendered to Mr. Taney the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Why was he selected? For his talents and integrity, and for the opinions which he entertained on the great question of the bank. The same reasons which caused Mr. Duane to vacate the office, brought in Mr. Taney as his successor. His views were in accordance with those of the President, in relation to this important measure of his administration. It will be readily imagined that the place was one not sought by him. The office he then held was, no doubt, more congenial to his taste and professional pursuits, and preferable in a pecuniary point of view. There was no inducement, therefore, on his part, to accept the Treasury seals, except that willingness to discharge every duty which might be imposed on him, and that disposition to shun no responsibility which the crisis demanded. But the Senator from Kentucky has tauntingly and sarcastically said that the Secretary had been but three days in office before he discovered that the bank was unconstitutional, and that all who had preceded him in that Department, as well as all the Presidents who had successively filled the Executive chair, were wrong in their opinions on that subject, and that his own was the standard by which the constitution was to be tried. Sir, with a knowledge that his opinions were long before formed and known, I had a sufficiently exalted idea of his talents. And if it were true that he had come to such correct conclusions on subjects so important, in the short time mentioned, I should look upon him as one of the most extraordinary men of the age. Such extraordinary powers of mind are not claimed for him. His reasons assigned for the removal of the deposits sufficiently satisfy me that he will stand the test of comparison with any of his talented predecessors.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Kentucky has not been content to combat the reasons of the Secretary, which were the legitimate subjects of discussion, but he has seen fit to arraign him for his early political associations, and has ventured the allegation that he belonged to that party which passed the alien and sedition laws. And the latter was, with much pomp and ceremony, paraded and read before us. Sir, I know not to what party, if any, the Secretary of the Treasury was attached at that early day. I know not whether he had sufficiently emerged into man-said to have any right, to remove them, for any mal-administration of the bank, or because the public good required it, is to be found in that part of the act which provides that the depositories shall be made in the bank, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise order and direct. If that clause be stricken out, then Congress has no power over them. If Congress had been inserted instead of the Secretary, Congress would have had the power, without limitation or restriction. The Secretary being inserted in the place of Congress, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that he must have the same power that Congress would have had. In the one case, Congress could have made the removal for other causes than those specified by the chairman; in the other, the Secretary could remove them without reference to the two contingencies named by the chairman. The fact that the Secretary is required to assign reasons, makes no difference as to his power. The reasons are merely to enable Congress to do what it would have done, if the power had been reserved to itself instead of the Secretary. This requirement, in truth, furnishes an additional argument against his powers being limited to the two contingencies named. If such had been the intention of Congress, the charter, instead of requiring, in general terms, that the Secretary should lay before Congress his reasons for such order and direction, would have required him to inform Congress which of the two contingencies had happened. Requiring reasons in general terms contemplates a wide and unrestricted discretion—a discretion to be exercised, not on the happening of a specified contingency, but a discretion to be exercised when, all things considered, reason dictated it.

Again: The honorable chairman says, "the Secretary has not the power to remove the depositories when he thinks it for the general welfare of the country: for the reasons, first, because Congress has not given him the appropriate powers of remedy in the most important instances; second, because it has, in those instances, either expressly reserved those powers to itself, or expressly conferred them on the President." Is it sound to say, that, because Congress and the President may take measures upon a violation of the charter, the Secretary may not, for the same violation, remove the depositories? This argument seems to concede, that, had not the power been reserved to Congress and the President, the Secretary would have had the right to remove them, since it is used to show, that the Secretary had not the right, because it is reserved to Congress and the President. The unsoundness of the argument, however, is manifest, when we consider that there is no inconsistency in Congress, the President, and the Secretary, each and all having the power to act at the same time and on the same contingency. For a violation of the charter, Congress appoints a committee to examine and report. The President, if he has reason to believe there has been a violation, directs a scire facias, and the Secretary removes the depositories. There is no objection to these remedies being pursued by these different departments and functionaries of the Government, at the same time, and for the purpose of guarding and protecting those great interests intrusted to them respectively. Sir, aside from this consideration, permit me to say, that Congress and the President have the right to inquire into the violations of the charter without any express statutory provision or reservation in the charter itself. It is a common law right. How, then, can it with propriety be said, that for a violation of the charter, the Secretary cannot remove the depositories, because the charter itself has provided other remedies for such violations, when, at the same time, it is shown that like remedies may be pursued, as a common law right, without such reservation? Such an inquiry is incident to, and is an attribute of, sovereignty. It is the right which every sovereign power retains to itself, inherent in itself, over such incorporations, which are the mere creatures of its will, brought into existence by its authority, and subject to its inquiries for any violations of their charters. An act which works a forfeiture of the charter is an infringement of that sovereignty.

Sir, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the Secretary cannot interfere with the depositories on account of any violations of the charter, where remedies are provided in the charter itself, does it follow that he cannot interfere where no such provision is made? To make myself better understood, permit me to say, that the remedy by scire facias is only proper in that class of violations which works a forfeiture of the charter. There are many violations which do not work a forfeiture, and for which a scire facias is not the proper remedy. But a scire facias is the only remedy in the act, and of course can only reach a particular class of cases. The true doctrine on this subject, in my judgment, was laid down by the chairman of the committee which investigated the concerns of the bank in 1819, [Mr. SPRAGUE, of New York,] whose authority I would not hesitate to cite, on such a question, in this or any other place. "Those acts of usurpation of power not granted, of mis-user and of non-user of those granted, which defeat the very objects of the institution, as expressed in the charter itself, would produce a forfeiture; and that all other instances of abuse of the powers granted, or of usurpation of powers, must be punished or restrained, either by the ordinary process of mandamus and quo warranto, or by other means than a dissolution of the corporation." If, then, there be violations which do not work a forfeiture, the provisions of the statute do not reach them; and if the Secretary cannot remove the depositories for such violations, then they cannot be removed at all, for the grossest mal-administration, because neither Congress nor the President has any power by the charter to reach such cases. The power of the Secretary has been deemed an appropriate remedy, to be exercised at the same time with that of Congress, or the President; or to be exercised separately, and as being sufficient of itself. This was the view taken of the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury by the Committee of Investigation in 1819, and which seems to have been acquiesced in by Congress as the true construction of those powers. The committee, although they reported several violations of the charter, did not recommend that a scire facias issue. They say:

"They have not recommended the adoption of any immediate measures to correct the many evils and mischiefs they have depicted, excepting that of the bill before mentioned, because, by the provisions of the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to apply a prompt and adequate remedy, whenever the situation of the bank shall require it. And if, after the stockholders have become acquainted with the mismanagement of the institution, they shall adopt no means to prevent its continuance, or the directors themselves shall persist in a course of conduct requiring correction, the committee cannot entertain a doubt that a salutary power lodged in the Treasury Department will be exerted, as occasion may require, and with reference to the best interests of the United States."

Sir, the chairman puts the following interrogatory:

"If the Secretary cannot prevent the notes of the bank from being received at the custom-houses and the land offices, even after they should be discredited, if he have no power to touch, in any way, the seven millions of stock belonging to the Government; if the power of examination into the proceedings of the bank be given, not to him, but to either House of Congress; if he have no power, but Congress and the President, each, has power to direct a legal investigation into the conduct of the bank; how can it possibly be maintained that a general inspection and guardianship over the public welfare, so far as it is connected with the bank, is confided to him; and that his authority to remove the deposits was given, not to protect the deposits themselves, and secure their proper use, but to enable him to force upon the bank, under penalty of their removal, such a course of management as his sense of the public interest and of the convenience of the people, may require?"

My answer to this, in the first place, is, that the restraints and restrictions on the Secretary enumerated by the chairman, and his being unrestrained and unrestricted in the sixteenth section, conclusively show that, as to the removal of the deposits, it was intended his power should be absolute and unconditional. But the chairman contends that such construction makes the Secretary's "discretion so broad and unlimited, that its consequences can be no less than to subject, not only all the operations of the bank and its offices, but its powers and capacities, perhaps its very existence, to his individual will." The fallacy of this argument appears from a single consideration. Had the sixteenth section not been introduced, then, by the bill as reported, the bank would have no claims to the deposits. The Secretary's power over them would have been the same as when the old United States Bank existed. He could have deposited the public funds where he pleased; and so far as their management was concerned, he would have had, and could have exercised, a discretion as broad and unlimited as the one claimed by the chairman. Does then the fact, that the deposits are by the charter to be made in the bank, subject to removal at the discretion of the Secretary, make any difference? If he removes them, he exercises the same power and no more, in regard to their management and the effect on the bank, than if they had never been placed there.

I have thus, Mr. President, gone through with a review of the principles of the report of the honorable chairman, and my conclusion is, that the Secretary may remove the deposits for reasons which he deems sufficient; and being thus removed, Congress has the absolute and unconditional power, in its legislative capacity, to restore them to the bank, or place them elsewhere, without regard to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the Secretary's reasons for their removal, and without regard to any right, on the part of the bank, to have them returned to its custody.

Mr. President, when this discussion commenced, it was assumed that the mere removal of the deposits was the cause of the pressure in the money market. It was, however, soon discovered that such a ground was untenable; that the mere taking the sum of nine millions of dollars from one bank and placing it with others, could not, of itself, produce any such effect. Driven from that position, it was assumed that the manner of removal was the cause. This being untenable also, the ground is now taken, that the cause of the pressure is to be found in the antagonist positions of the bank and the Government. This last is the peculiar ground occupied by the Senator from Massachusetts, and is so assigned in his report, on which I have just been commenting. What is the consequence? Or, in more proper language, how is this difficulty to be obviated? There are but two ways: either the Government must yield to the bank, or the bank must yield to the Government—either the present administration of the Government must be overthrown, or the bank must be overthrown. Can the people hesitate which of the alternatives to choose? Ought we, as their representatives, to hesitate? Shall it be tolerated, in this free country, that a moneyed institution shall set itself up against the administration of the Government chosen and sustained by the people themselves. Shall it for one moment be permitted that such a monstrous power should be suffered longer to exist, and to overawe the very power that spoke it into existence? It is not its opposition to the administration that I so much regard. It is its opposition to the principles on which the administration is based. It is its bold attempt to set up and establish a power within this Government, superior to the Government itself. The issue between the bank and the Government being once fairly made up and submitted to the people, I will most cheerfully acquiesce in their decision. If they are willing to become the slaves of such a power, its chains will soon be riveted on them. In the very act of submission to its dictates, they will have become slaves already. But, sir, I have no such painful forebodings. I know too well the spirit of the American people. They have heretofore, and they will again "scorn to be slaves."

Sir, in my examination of the report of the Committee on Finance, the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits have incidentally come in question. It is my purpose now to bestow some further attention on them. But, before doing that, let us inquire, for a moment, how the Secretary came into a situation that required these reasons of him. He was the Attorney General of the United States—the law officer of the Government—the constitutional adviser of the President—a member of his cabinet. As such, when called on by the President for that purpose, he is understood to have given his written opinion in favor of a removal of the deposits, and that, too, long before they were removed. When the President ascertained that Mr. Duane would not be able to carry his wishes into effect in regard to a matter in which he deemed the great interests and future prosperity of the country involved, he tendered to Mr. Taney the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Why was he selected? For his talents and integrity, and for the opinions which he entertained on the great question of the bank. The same reasons which caused Mr. Duane to vacate the office, brought in Mr. Taney as his successor. His views were in accordance with those of the President, in relation to this important measure of his administration. It will be readily imagined that the place was one not sought by him. The office he then held was, no doubt, more congenial to his taste and professional pursuits, and preferable in a pecuniary point of view. There was no inducement, therefore, on his part, to accept the Treasury seals, except that willingness to discharge every duty which might be imposed on him, and that disposition to shun no responsibility which the crisis demanded. But the Senator from Kentucky has tauntingly and sarcastically said that the Secretary had been but three days in office before he discovered that the bank was unconstitutional, and that all who had preceded him in that Department, as well as all the Presidents who had successively filled the Executive chair, were wrong in their opinions on that subject, and that his own was the standard by which the constitution was to be tried. Sir, with a knowledge that his opinions were long before formed and known, I had a sufficiently exalted idea of his talents. And if it were true that he had come to such correct conclusions on subjects so important, in the short time mentioned, I should look upon him as one of the most extraordinary men of the age. Such extraordinary powers of mind are not claimed for him. His reasons assigned for the removal of the deposits sufficiently satisfy me that he will stand the test of comparison with any of his talented predecessors.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Kentucky has not been content to combat the reasons of the Secretary, which were the legitimate subjects of discussion, but he has seen fit to arraign him for his early political associations, and has ventured the allegation that he belonged to that party which passed the alien and sedition laws. And the latter was, with much pomp and ceremony, paraded and read before us. Sir, I know not to what party, if any, the Secretary of the Treasury was attached at that early day. I know not whether he had sufficiently emerged into manhood to take part in the fierce political struggles of that period. But, what was my astonishment, when I saw the Senator, surrounded by the honorable associates with whom he acts, brandishing his weapon and dealing out his blows, regardless where they fell, whether on friend or foe. I thought I saw "a laughing devil in his sneer," when he made his repeated thrusts at the federalism of 1798; and I could almost fancy I saw an honorable Senator near him [pointing to Mr. WESTEN] raise the ample folds of the mantle of that period, and feelingly exclaim,

"See, what a rent the envious Casca made!"

Sir, admitting, for the sake of argument, all that the honorable Senator has said in regard to the early political associations of the Secretary to be true, what does it prove? Why, sir, that the Senator and Secretary have merely changed positions. Time was when the honorable Senator stood like a faithful sentinel on the watch-tower of freedom, and guarded the principles of the constitution. Time is when the Secretary of the Treasury is maintaining the same principles in regard to the unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States, that the Senator himself maintained in 1811. The Secretary is maintaining the same principles in regard to the rights of the people against an overgrown moneyed aristocracy, which the Senator himself maintained at that early day. Even admitting all that the honorable Senator has said, to be true, it only proves that he and the Secretary have changed positions, and as to which has the better of the change, I leave to the Senator himself to determine.

The Secretary assumes that the charter of the Bank of the United States is a contract between the Government and the stockholders, and that the right reserved to him in the sixteenth section, to remove the deposits, is absolute and unconditional; that his order, therefore, for their removal was not a violation of the contract; that, as the head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government, subject to the supervision of the President, who is vested by the constitution with the whole Executive power, he always had the disposition of the public funds as to the place of deposit. The sixteenth section, therefore, only reserves to the Secretary the right, in that respect, which he always possessed. He contends that Congress has not the power to order a removal, but that that power, under the sixteenth section, belongs to him; that the only way by which Congress can get the control is by his previous action, which puts the whole subject at its disposal. It has been said that in this position the Secretary has assumed an authority which does not belong to him, and that Congress cannot thus be excluded and deprived of the right to interfere and remove the deposits, until after the action of the Secretary. The truth of the Secretary's proposition depends on two things: First, can Congress part with the power over the deposits? Second, has Congress parted with the power? If the charter is viewed in the light of a contract between the Government and the stockholders, will it be contended that Congress has not the right to give the absolute custody of the deposits to the bank? Suppose they had been given expressly by a provision in the present charter, for a period of five years. Could any one doubt the right of Congress thus to contract? And if for five years, why not for twenty; or until the expiration of its charter? But if it should be objected that Congress cannot thus put out of its control the custody of the public funds, I answer that the objection cannot be made by those who maintain the other side of the question under discussion. In the technical language of the law, they are estopped to deny such a right in Congress. They maintain not only the constitutionality of the bank, but the right of Congress to grant the exclusive privileges which it enjoys. If Congress can deprive itself and its successors of the power of granting another bank during the existence of the present one, it certainly can give up the right of controlling the deposits. I do not pretend to say that Congress has the power to grant such exclusive privileges—but I do say, that those who contend for that power, cannot well deny the other. Has Congress, then, parted with the power over the deposits? If the charter had said, in terms, that the power to remove should be exclusively vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, there could be little doubt of the intention of Congress to give him that power, and to divest itself of it. If such would be the effect, then it not only shows that Congress can part with the power, but that it has parted with it. For the language of the sixteenth section being general in its terms, as regards the power of the Secretary, without any reservation to Congress, is, in legal construction, the same as an exclusive grant of that power to the Secretary. The Secretary, then, being the person designated by the charter to exercise this power, Congress can designate no other person; and, of course, cannot assume the power itself, until the previous action of the Secretary. There is another conclusive fact, to show that if Congress had intended to reserve this power to itself, instead of conferring it on the Secretary, it would have been so provided in the sixteenth section. The history of the passage of that charter, proves that Congress was not inattentive to its provisions—that it was not ignorant of the powers it conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury, nor of those which it reserved to itself. In the original bill reported in the House of Representatives, in the same section which requires the bank to give the necessary facilities in transferring the public funds from place to place, and distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, it was also provided that the bank should "do and perform the several and respective duties of the commissioners of loans for the several States, or of any one or more of them, at the times, in the manner, and upon the terms, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury." In the bill as it passed, and as it now stands in the charter, this power, which seems to have been intended by the committee that reported it to be vested in the Secretary, was reserved to Congress. And, instead of saying that those duties should be performed "at the times, in the manner, and upon the terms, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury," it provides that they shall be performed by the bank "whenever required by law." Here is a power reserved to Congress which was originally intended to be given to the Secretary. This provision immediately precedes the sixteenth section, under which this discussion, as to the power of the Secretary, has arisen. Can it then be, for one moment, doubted, that if Congress had intended to reserve to itself the power to remove the deposits, instead of conferring it on the Secretary of the Treasury, that the sixteenth section would have been amended, as the preceding section had been? Instead of using the language as it stands in that section, namely, "unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall at any time otherwise order and direct," it would have said, "unless Congress shall at any time otherwise order and direct," or, "unless it shall at any time be otherwise ordered and directed by law." There was good reason why this power was thus intrusted to the Executive department of the Government. That department was deemed a safe depository of the power, and Congress supposed it might be necessary to exercise it on an emergency. The bank, too, has rights under the power thus vested, and can, therefore, hold the Government to the strict letter of the contract. It may easily be conceived, that the bank might prefer, in this respect, to be under the control of the Executive rather than the Legislative department of the Government. If the power had been reserved to Congress, the indiscretion of a single member might disturb the equanimity of the bank. The introduction of a resolution to remove the deposits might be productive of injury, when there was no ground for such a measure. The Executive, on the other hand, would never act without due consideration, and with a due sense of the responsibility under which he acted. I conclude, then, as has been heretofore stated, that the power of the Secretary, under the supervision of the Executive, is absolute and unconditional. His acts, therefore, cannot be called in question, except for a corrupt exercise of that power, which would subject him to impeachment, and which would also presuppose corruption in the Executive himself.

Sir, It has been objected by the Senator from Kentucky, that the Secretary improperly exercised this power, because he removed the deposits within sixty days of the meeting of Congress. If he deemed there was good ground for removing them, it was his duty to act without regard to the time when Congress was to assemble. It has been seen that Congress had no power over this subject. Why, then, should he act in reference to the meeting of that body? The error of the Senator arises from a misconception or a misrecollection of the provisions of the 16th section. He says the Secretary "is required to remove the deposits when they shall be in danger, and we not in session." The law says nothing about their safety; that is altogether matter of inference or argument; and instead of confining the Secretary's power to a time when Congress is not in session, it expressly recognises his right to remove them when Congress is in session. By the very terms of the charter, therefore, the power to remove is vested in the Secretary, even though Congress be in session at the time. Had the deposits remained till now in the Bank of the United States, and it should be generally conceded that they ought to be removed, still Congress, though in session, could not interfere; the Secretary alone could perform that duty. Again, the honorable Senator says the object in removing them before the meeting of Congress was, to put the matter in such a situation that, if Congress attempted to act, its action would be subjected to the Executive veto. It is a sufficient answer to this objection, that the Secretary could do the same during the session of Congress, and that therefore the power of the Executive would be the same.

The Secretary, in support of his position, cites the practice of Mr. Crawford, when at the head of the Treasury Department. I have already alluded to that practice to show that the power claimed by the present Secretary was exercised by his distinguished predecessor, Mr. Crawford, and has never been denied till the present time. I will take leave to add one further authority, which I do not recollect has been cited by other gentlemen—that is, the authority of Secretary Ingham. He asserts the power as fully and as amply as Mr. Taney has asserted or exercised it. I refer to the following extracts from his correspondence with Mr. Biddle in 1829:

"The administration is empowered to act on the bank in various ways, in the appointment or removal of five of the directors; in the withdrawing of the public deposits; in the exaction of weekly statements, and the inspection of its general accounts; and in all the modes incident to the management of the pecuniary collections and disbursements of the Government. That these opportunities of action might be perverted and abused is conceivable, but, subjected to the principle on which we early and cordially agreed, they become cause of security and benefit; and before I dismiss this branch of the subject, I take the occasion to say, if it should ever appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the bank used its pecuniary power for purposes of injustice and oppression, he would be faithless to his trust if he hesitated to lessen its capacity for such injury, by withdrawing from its vaults the public deposits. That such a power exists, is not more certain than that it may be exerted for such a purpose; and the only qualification of it, viz. that the reasons for its exercise shall be reported to Congress, necessarily implies the right and the duty to admonish against, or inquire into the acts that might lead to such a consequence."

"The incumbent of this Department has in especial charge the financial concerns of the country, and in principle, law, and practice, he is the official guardian of the public stocks, funds, and moneyed interests. He cannot hear the depository of seven millions of capital, and of almost all the current revenue, assailed from a respectable quarter, and on topics of deep and dangerous momentum, without anxiously looking forward, as well to do both the bank and its accusers justice, as to regulate his own conduct. Before he can be tempted to exercise the authority with which Congress have invested him, to withdraw the public deposits, he will do as he has done—submit directly to your board whatever imputation may be made, and respectfully, resolutely, and confidently ask, nay demand, the fullest examination; and he trusts that he may not be misconceived, when he adds, that nothing could, in his opinion, more imperatively exact this energetic movement, than a well-founded conviction of the bank's being, as was said of its predecessor, an engine of political party."

"No one can see with more unalloyed satisfaction its flourishing condition, or has borne more cheerful testimony to the character of its present management. Having labored ardently to create it, I may not be supposed the first to contaminate or decry it, but, however imposing its attitude, if once satisfied that the powers of its charter, and the resources of its wealth, are debased and perverted to practices at war with the liberties of the country, and the rights and interests of my fellow-citizens, no consideration of a personal nature will curb me in exercising the legal power with which I may be invested, to check its tendencies, and reform its abuses; and it will be my care, not less than my duty, never to surrender any of the rights vested in the Government for this purpose."

I agree, therefore, in the conclusions of the Secretary, that the power of removal was intended to be reserved exclusively to him, and that he has the right to remove the deposits, and it is his duty to remove them, whenever the public interest or convenience will be promoted by the change.

Let us now, Mr. President, examine, as briefly as possible, the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States.

The Secretary felt that he was bound to act in reference to the laws as they exist, and not to anticipate a change where there was no reasonable prospect of any change being made. He presumed, that the charter of the bank would cease at the expiration of the term limited by the charter itself. He could not participate in a renewal. His measures were to be taken, therefore, in reference to its expiration. Besides, it struck him, as it would every unprejudiced mind, that the bank had no claims on the Government for a renewal of its charter. The present stockholders have no right, in law or equity, to ask to have the monopoly, which they have enjoyed, continued to them. They have had, or will have had, at the end of its term, the enjoyment of all the privileges and benefits which were stipulated by the contract. They have no claim to any thing more. Unless there be reasons on the part of the Government, why the charter of the bank ought to be renewed, there certainly can be no reasons on the part of the stockholders why its charter should be extended. It is a valid objection to its renewal, that we are thereby giving to foreigners an advantage to which our own citizens are entitled. A large portion of the stock is held abroad. The Government is under no obligation to confer on foreign holders the benefits which would accrue from a renewal of this charter. Those benefits, whatever they may be, should belong to our own citizens. In these remarks, let me not be understood as entertaining any prejudice against the employment of foreign capital in this country. On the contrary, I would encourage its introduction, in all shapes in which it could be done consistent with the rights of our own citizens, and the safety and purity of our institutions. But I cannot consent, were I in favor of a national bank, to renew this charter, knowing that so large an amount of stock is in foreign hands. What is the consequence? Why, the very moment the charter is renewed, the stock will be worth, at least, fifty per cent. advance. The amount held by foreign and domestic stockholders is twenty-eight millions of dollars. The very act of renewal will put into their pockets fourteen millions of dollars, being a sum equal to fifty per cent. advance on the stock held by them. What principle of justice will authorize us to grant such a premium either to our own citizens, or to foreigners, who will have enjoyed this enormous monopoly for twenty years, when the charter expires? No, sir; if a national bank were to be granted, it should be a new bank. And were I to have my will in fixing the terms of its charter, it should be one of the fundamental laws of its constitution, that it should never be renewed. We have already seen enough of the evil consequences resulting from the efforts of the present bank to secure to itself a renewal of its charter. The whole country is convulsed by its efforts. Its ramifications are so extended throughout the entire Union, that it has but to strike the chords by which its operations are kept in tune, to make them vibrate in unison to the remotest extremity of this vast republic. If a new bank should be created; and its stock distributed anew to our citizens, there need be no apprehensions of foreign capital leaving us on that account. Its reinvestment, at the premium mentioned, would be far better than an investment at home. And even if there should be no national bank, there will be opportunity enough for such investments in State securities. I have made these cursory remarks to show that the Secretary was right in supposing that there would be no disposition in Congress to continue such a monopoly.

Removal of the Deposits.

Again: The Secretary considers the charter of the present bank, in many of its provisions, unconstitutional, and on that ground, could not anticipate its renewal. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] censures somewhat severely this opinion of the Secretary as an attempt to pronounce, in his official capacity, the charter of the bank unconstitutional, which he could only do in his individual character. Sir, I shall be subject to the same reproach. I do not hesitate, acting in my official capacity as a member of this Senate, to pronounce it unconstitutional. In doing this, I do not interfere with any of its corporate rights. I should be the last to question them. Having been decided to be constitutional by the supreme judicial tribunal of the country, it is so to be held for all the purposes of its corporate existence. No one proposes, by the expression of an opinion against its constitutionality, to detract from the rights and privileges secured by its charter. It is only in reference to its renewal that such an expression is made. Were we sitting as members of a court before whom this question should arise, we should be bound to yield our individual opinions to the paramount authority of the Supreme Court, and hold, for the purposes of a judicial decision, the charter constitutional. But, when called upon to act in our legislative capacity, on a renewal of the charter, we have not only the right, but it is our duty to act, in accordance with the dictates of our own consciences. The opinion expressed by the Secretary is of the same character. He speaks of the unconstitutionality of the bank in reference to a renewal of its charter, and not as interfering with any of its existing corporate rights. It is not my intention, at this time, to go into a discussion of the constitutional question; but merely to advert to the question of precedent which has been so often urged on this floor. On taking our seats here, we are sworn to support the constitution. There are different ways in which matters may be presented for our consideration, involving the constitutional question. For example, if a bill were introduced to repeal the charter of the present bank, I should be bound to vote against it, because the Supreme Court, the judicial department of the Government, has passed upon its constitutionality, and the legislative department cannot interfere. After a law is enacted, according to the forms of the constitution, and rights have become vested under it, the legislature has no further power over it. If it be unconstitutional, the Supreme Court may so declare it, without any interference with individual rights, because no such rights can become vested under an unconstitutional law. But, having declared it constitutional, the legislature has no power to repeal it. If, on the other hand, the question of a re-charter of the present bank, or the charter of a new bank, which is in principle the same, should be presented, then the legislator is bound, under the oath he has taken, to vote according to his own views of the constitution. The Supreme Court having decided a similar law to be constitutional, does not take from him the right to judge for himself, on a like question again presented for legislative action. One ground on which the Supreme Court held the charter of the present bank constitutional was, that Congress could pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect its delegated powers—that Congress was the judge of the necessity of the law, and if in its judgment it was necessary and proper, then it was, of course constitutional; and that necessity was evinced by its very enactment. Even on this principle, whenever the question recurs for a renewal of the charter, Congress is at perfect liberty again to judge and determine whether the necessity exists. But, if precedent is to govern, as having settled the constitutional question, so that we are not at liberty to exercise our own judgments, then we have this strange anomaly presented, that whilst we may vote against the bank because we deem it inexpedient, we cannot vote against it because we deem it unconstitutional—and even if we believed the bank to be expedient, and from the most incontestable evidence knew it to be unconstitutional, still we cannot vote against it on constitutional grounds, but must vote for it on the ground of expediency! If the question as to the power of Congress to charter a national bank were now for the first time to arise, I am perfectly satisfied it would be held unconstitutional by every department of the Government. And still, according to the doctrine contended for, a power never granted has been ingrafted into the constitution, by reason of legislative and judicial precedents, and the constitution has thus been amended, without resorting to the mode of amendment provided in the instrument itself. If, then, we, as legislators, are not permitted to vote against a renewal of the charter of the bank on the ground of its unconstitutionality, the only means of getting rid of a power which we deem so dangerous, is, by an amendment of the constitution in that respect, which would require the concurrence of three-fourths of the States. In other words, an amendment which could not be made but by three-fourths of the States, cannot now be got rid of except by the concurrence of that number! Sir, no man can prescribe a rule for the legislator, acting under his oath, on constitutional questions. Of what avail then, it may be asked, are the decisions of our judicial tribunals on such subjects? They serve to settle and establish the rights of existing charters. After such adjudications, no one is permitted to treat them as unconstitutional, so far as their corporate rights are concerned. Whatever opinions we, as individual members of the community, may entertain, adverse to such decisions, still we are bound to obey them. We are also bound to respect and acquiesce in them, when acting in a legislative capacity, so far as regards existing corporations on which such decisions have been pronounced, but no farther. They serve also to enlighten us on the subjects to which they relate; and like the opinions of learned men, they may serve to remove our constitutional scruples, and convince us of our preconceived errors. If they do not produce such effects, then they are of no farther weight or authority in our legislative action, and we are left to the lights of our minds, and the dictates of our own consciences. Believing, then, as I do, that Congress never had any power under the constitution to charter a national bank, and that legislative and judicial precedent does not preclude us from voting against the renewal of the charter of the present or any other bank, I do not hesitate to say, that I am opposed to this or any other bank on constitutional as well as other grounds. I believe such to be the sentiments of a large majority of the people of the State of New York. The struggle on the part of the people of that State, gentlemen may rest assured, is not from the narrow and paltry views which have been ascribed to them, of putting down this bank and setting up another in their own great metropolis. Their motives are of a more elevated character. They believe such an institution unconstitutional and dangerous to the liberties of the people—and if it must exist, they would prefer to see its location beyond the limits of their State. Even their own self-love, as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. LEXEN] described it, would not be sufficient to induce them to change it from Chestnut to Wall street. The very city of the bank has not more devoted friends to its present location than are to be found amongst its advocates in the city of New York. On this point, therefore, the honorable Senator from Virginia need have no apprehension, that the developments of the coming year will compel him to follow his own beloved State to sustain an unconstitutional act which she has always opposed, lest some act more unconstitutional may be committed. Sir, I trust the honorable Senator misapprehends the feelings of Virginia, if he supposes that any state of things can be presented, which shall induce her to abandon the broad ground of the constitution, on which are laid the deep foundations of her former greatness and future prosperity.

The next reason assigned by the Secretary is, that public opinion, as evinced by the result of the Presidential election, was adverse to the renewal of the charter of the bank. It has been vehemently denied that the question of the bank was at issue at that election. A very brief examination will show, that gentlemen who make that denial have forgotten the events that transpired during that period. If any one thing more than another formed the issue upon which the people went down to that election, it was the question of Bank or no Bank. The bank was at an early day identified with the opposition to the administration, and taken under their peculiar charge and patronage. At the National Convention held at Baltimore in 1831, at which the name of the honorable Senator from Kentucky was presented to the American people as a candidate for President, the bank was spoken of as being identified with that interest, and its existence as depending on the success of their candidate. The address of that convention put it expressly on the ground, that General Jackson's re-election would be the means of preventing a re-charter of the bank. Here, at this early day, the issue was tendered, and I shall endeavor to show that it was subsequently formed in the most explicit manner. In 1832, when the bank bill was pending, it was said by its friends out of the Senate, that it was feared by its friends in the Senate, that the President would not veto the bill after it had passed both Houses of Congress. Their anxiety was, that it should receive the Executive veto, in order that the question of bank or no bank might be carried down to the election in the most distinct and definite shape. I know that honorable Senators who voted for the bill were not, could not have been governed by such motives. They would not vote for any measure unless they desired it to receive the approval of the President and become a law. But, their friends out of this chamber, governed more by the feelings of partisans, did not hesitate to express their desire that it might receive the veto of the Executive, and their fears that he might give to it his approval. Their reasons were, that his rejection of the bill would make the bank the distinct issue before the people, and would be the means of defeating his election, and securing the election of his rival. The same causes which should produce this result, would of course ensure the election of members to Congress friendly to the bank; and thus both of the great objects of the campaign, the election of a President and the re-charter of the bank, would be accomplished. What then, sir, was the issue, and how was it formed? Let us examine the language of gentlemen on the veto message, and see how they understood the matter. After the President had returned the bill with his objections, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILKINSON] said:

"Before the Senate proceeds in this second vote, I propose to make some remarks upon those objections. And, in the first place, it is to be observed, that they are such as to extinguish all hope that the present bank, or any bank at all resembling it, or resembling any known similar institution, will ever receive his approbation. He states no terms, no qualifications, no conditions, no modifications, which can reconcile him to the essential provisions of the existing charter. He is against the bank, and against any bank constituted in a manner known either to this or any other country. One advantage, therefore, is certainly obtained by presenting him the bill. It has caused his sentiments to be made known. There is no longer any mystery, no longer a contest between hope and fear, or between those prophets who predicted a veto, and those who foretold an approval." * * * *

"It is now certain, that without a change in our public councils, this bank will not be continued, nor will any other be established, which, according to the general sense and language of mankind, can be entitled to the name."

Here is the distinct avowal, that without a change in our public councils, the present bank could not be continued, nor any other established. This opinion is given with all the precision of a learned counsellor who is stating his views on a matter to be put in issue, in order that they may be reduced to technical form by the pleader, and thus entered on the record. Sir, let us next see how this issue was framed. The honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] who is now the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, undertook to prepare the pleadings in form, and make up the record for trial. From his remarks, as reported, I present the following:

"Mr. CLAYTON rose for the purpose of adding to what had been suggested by the gentleman who had gone before him in the debate, his own views of the true issue tendered by the President to the country in the message under consideration. It was not merely the question whether the present Bank of the United States should be re-chartered, but whether any bank whatever should be established by the Government after the expiration of the act of Congress incorporating that institution." * * *

"I repeat then, sir, that from the opinions of the President, as fully developed in this paper, it is not to be expected that, during his administration, and while these sentiments remain unchanged, any bank whatever can be established by this Government; and to show it, I will content myself by referring to a few paragraphs in that part of his argument which labors to prove the present bank charter unconstitutional." * * *

"I should not have prolonged this debate at this late hour, by any remarks of mine, had I not felt the necessity of calling the attention of the Senate and the country to the true issue now tendered for acceptance. The question once understood—whether we shall have any bank to regulate our currency and relieve our distresses—I cannot doubt, I will not suffer myself to doubt, what will be the verdict of that country on the issue joined."

Thus it will be perceived, the issue was distinctly, nay, technically formed. It was Bank or no Bank. And to show that it was so understood, permit me to quote the language of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who was then a candidate before the American people for their suffrages. He, of course, could not have misapprehended the true issue. His remarks were made upon the veto message. He is laboring to prove that the agitation of the question has been produced by the President and his friends. He has quoted the messages of 1829, 1830, and 1831, calling public attention to the subject, and then says:

"After the President had directed public attention to this question, it became not only a topic of popular conversation, but was discussed in the press, and was employed as a theme in popular elections. I was myself interrogated, on more occasions than one, to make a public expression of my sentiments; and a friend of mine in Kentucky, a candidate for the State legislature, told me, near two years ago, that he was surprised, in an obscure part of the country, (the hills of Benson,) where there was but little occasion for banks, to find himself questioned on the stump as to the re-charter of the Bank of the United States. It seemed as if a sort of general order had gone out from headquarters, to the partisans of the administration every where, to agitate and make the most of the question. They have done so; and their condition now reminds me of the fable invented by Dr. Franklin, of the Eagle and the Cat, to demonstrate that Esop had not exhausted invention in the construction of his memorable Fables. The eagle, you know, Mr. President, pounced, from his lofty flight in the air, upon a cat, taking it to be a pig. Having borne off his prize, he quickly felt most painfully the paws of the cat thrust deeply into his side and body. Whilst flying, he held a parley with the supposed pig, and proposed to let go his hold, if he would let him alone. No, says puss, you brought me from yonder earth below, and I will hold fast to you until you carry me back. A condition to which the eagle readily assented."

The honorable Senator, though not as technical as those who preceded him, was, notwithstanding, quite categorical. It seems, according to his account of it, that this question was perfectly well understood, more than two years before the great Presidential contest, in which he took so distinguished a part—that even in the obscure and remote parts of the country, the people interrogated the candidates for their favor, in relation to a re-charter of the Bank of the United States. The administration, certainly, have no reason to complain of the manner in which the honorable Senator illustrated his views, by the fable which he introduced—though like the eagle, it is still annoyed by the feline disposition of the bank, still, like that noble bird, I trust it will pursue its lofty flight, regardless of such attacks, till it can have, unharmed, the enjoyment of a bright sun and a clear sky. The issue, sir, was thus formed. The parties put themselves upon the country. The bank was sustained by a combination of interests, and by a union of political leaders which has no parallel in history since the famous coalition of Lord North and Mr. Fox, in 1783. They went down to trial; the verdict was found against the bank: and now, forsooth, it is attempted to set aside the verdict, on account of some defect in the vis pruis record; the continuances are informal; the award of venire is irregular; and the Senator from Kentucky, with that classic purity and elegance of taste for which he is so distinguished, gravely tells us, that the question of the bank was no more involved in the Presidential election than that of a carbuncle or a king's evil!

Sir, it is objected, that though the re-charter of the bank might have been, still, the removal of the deposits was never submitted to the people. This question could not have been submitted, except in those States where an election was held after the removal was made. In the State of New York, the election took place about one month after. The subject was agitated and distinctly passed upon in all the primary meetings of the people; and no election has been, for years, so triumphantly carried in favor of the measures of the administration. But, sir, the question of a re-charter of the bank has now become identified with the question of the restoration of the deposits. It is vain longer to attempt to draw a distinction between them. If the bank is not to be re-chartered, it is beyond my power to conceive how any one can contend, that the deposits ought to be restored to its custody. Even the bank itself, I doubt not, would reject them, were it not for the expectation of a re-charter. Were that hope gone, its own interests, as well as the interests of the community, would cause it to reject them. Their restoration, therefore, can only be on the ground that the bank is to be re-chartered. Without that, such a measure would bring no relief. It would only serve to increase the distress. The pressure in the money-market would be greater than before; and when the bank should come to wind up its concerns, the pecuniary embarrassments of the community would be enhanced in consequence of the deposits having been replaced in its custody. Much has been said about the propriety of their removal in the first instance. I am one of those who maintain the correctness of that measure. And were I disposed to find any fault with the administration in relation to it, it would be because it was not adopted at an earlier day. But the delay, it is evident, was not the fault of the President. Had the deposits been removed some months earlier, it would have become a stale story before the meeting of Congress. The people and the mercantile community would have been reconciled to the measure; would have acquiesced in it; would have approved it, as due alike to the bank, as an act of justice for its misconduct, and to the community, as promotive of its best interests. A pressure in the money-market, to a certain extent, would have been felt, whether the deposits had been removed or not. It cannot be attributed to that cause. But for the removal of the deposits, in the city of New York, it would have been greater. It is admitted, on all hands, that the discounts of the banks in that city have increased four or five millions of dollars. This increase must have prevented much pecuniary embarrassment, which would have otherwise existed. The system of cash duties and shortened credits, would, of itself, have produced embarrassments in the mercantile community. We were informed by the very respectable and intelligent committee who were the bearers of the memorial of the merchants of that city to Congress, that the alteration of the system of duties would make a difference of at least ten millions of dollars in the amount required to be raised to meet their engagements. Their custom-house bonds, under the old system, enabled them to extend a liberal credit to almost every portion of the country. This credit must of course be curtailed, and the whole country must, more or less, feel the effects of such curtailment. The people having passed against a re-charter of the bank, I consider that as a determination also against the restoration of the deposits. The community cannot be relieved from such an institution, without experiencing more or less distress. With a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, with rising of sixty-two millions of discounts, and a circulation of more than eighteen millions, there must be some shock felt when it closes its concerns. But, that shock will be more or less severely felt, according to the disposition of the bank itself. It may create much distress in the whole community, or it may make but little. When the old Bank of the United States found that there was no hope of a renewal of its charter, it prepared to wind up its concerns; and did it in a manner so gentle and easy, that the country scarcely felt the change. Its concerns, within a few months of its close, were more extended in all respects, in proportion to capital, than the present bank, with two years of its charter unexpired, and two years beyond that in which to settle its affairs. The withdrawal of the capital of this bank, in the present state of the country, could be done with less inconvenience than the withdrawal of that of the old bank in 1811. Then the country was depressed; its commerce was affected by the restrictive measures of the Government. We were, too, on the eve of a war with one of the most powerful nations of Europe. There was a variety of causes in favor of the re-charter of that bank, which do not exist in relation to this. Still, Congress did not hesitate, at that day, to compel it to close; and the country experienced but little inconvenience from it. Now, we are in a state of unexampled prosperity; at peace with all the world; and substantial capital never more abundant. If the country was ever prepared, or ever will be prepared, to see the termination of this institution, it is now ready. If it cannot bear any evils which it may attempt to inflict now, it can never, hereafter, expect to be able to meet them. We must, therefore, now determine, whether such an overgrown moneyed monopoly shall expire, or whether it shall be fastened upon the country in perpetuity. For if it be re-chartered, it is in vain to anticipate the time, in future, when its power can be resisted. If the distress which is complained of throughout the country be the necessary consequence of the approaching termination of the charter of the bank, without any effort on the part of the bank to produce it, that, of itself, would be a sufficient argument to my mind against the existence of such an institution. If such be the mere negative effect, what must it be if it attempted to exert its power? View it in what light you may, and it exhibits an ability to exercise a power which ought never to exist in a free country. Sir, whatever distress is now experienced throughout the country, I maintain, is produced by the bank itself. It is its struggle for a prolonged existence. It is that instinctive love of life which resists, to the utmost, the sad prospect of approaching dissolution. Were the bank resigned to its fate, were it anticipating no extension of its corporate existence, it would pass down the smooth and untroubled current of public sentiment to its close, without agitation and without alarm. Let the distress, then, which is felt by the community, be attributed to the right cause. Let it be set down to the account of the bank itself. Its sudden expansion and contraction of its discounts and circulation have been for the purpose of making the country feel, and feeling, to make it yield to its demands. Its efforts to bring its power to bear at particular points and at particular times, evince also its disposition to force the country into a surrender to its terms. Sir, the American people may rest assured, that all these difficulties come from the reluctance on the part of the bank to expire with the limitation of its charter. If it could free itself of the load of conscious guilt which rests upon it, and resign itself to the fate that inevitably awaits it; if it could make up its mind to die, when it knows that its days are numbered, its dissolution would be easy to itself and happy to the community. The evils which have been, and are still experienced, will be ended, whenever the bank comes to this conclusion. When hope no longer lingers around it, then will its efforts cease; then will the commerce and credit of the country resume their accustomized channels; then will the people, recovering from the panic which the bank and its partisans have produced, resume their wonted avocations. The sooner the bank and the country can be satisfied that its charter cannot be renewed, the sooner will the obstacles to our prosperity be overcome. That it cannot be re-chartered, is, in my judgment, as morally certain as that it ever existed.

Sir, we are told that it is the shock given to public confidence which has produced all the mischief; and that that shock has come from the removal of the deposits. I take leave to dissent altogether from this opinion. There was no want of confidence until the meeting of Congress, although the deposits had been removed for two months previous. The panic, which gentlemen tell us pervades the whole community, proceeded from this Capitol—from this Senate chamber. At the very commencement of the session, honorable Senators, influenced, no doubt, by the most patriotic motives, conceived it their duty to instruct the people, as to the want of confidence, the distress, and the panic, which existed amongst them, and of which they were not yet aware! After it had been so often proclaimed from the halls of Congress, it would have been strange indeed if a portion of the people at least, having such confidence in the wisdom of this body, should not have discovered a want of confidence amongst themselves. The excitement was in this manner produced, and it has been kept up by the character of the discussions here. We have heard much of a bleeding constitution and violated laws! Even the right of revolution has been spoken of, as an ultimate ordeal to which the usurpations of constitutional power by the Executive might be subjected. Sir, if I had never entertained any doubts as to the constitutionality of this bank—if I had never doubted its expediency, such language as I have heard here, and such as I have read as being written from the seat of Government, and published with approbation by leading partisan newspapers, would be sufficient to determine me against it; and to satisfy me that an institution that can thus enlist the feelings of men, is too powerful and too dangerous to exist under our form of Government. I trust the time will soon come, when it will be beyond its power to do harm. The day is not far distant, when its impotent malice will have been expended—when its own interests will compel it to cease its warfare on our State institutions. The distress which it, in connexion with political partisans, has produced, will then terminate. Let the people maintain the ground they took against it in the Presidential contest in 1832, and all will be well. Let them hold fast their integrity in this season of their severest trials and sufferings, and they will secure to themselves, and preserve to their posterity, those dear-bought privileges which were handed down by their revolutionary fathers. Even were the distress complained of ten-fold, nay, a hundred-fold greater than it is, I have full faith in the firmness and patriotism of the people to bear it, and to resist the efforts of the bank to reduce them to submission. However great it may be, they will bear it for the sake of the great principle involved in it. The democracy of this country, for principle, endured all the hardships and privations of the embargo, non-intercourse, and late war. Our commerce was crippled by the restrictive measures of the Government; and the lives of our citizens were freely offered up in defence of the principles for which those measures were adopted, and the war declared. They will, in like manner, withstand the pressure of the bank; and though they should, in the mighty struggle, be prostrated to the earth, like Antæus, they will rise with renovated strength. The people of this country have contended for principle from the first dawning of the revolution to the present hour—from their first resistance to British oppression, down to their present resistance to a moneyed tyranny still more galling. They will continue to stand on the side of the Government, against such a fearful institution, until the expiration of its charter puts it beyond its power to do harm. Instead of brooding over the misfortunes it has brought upon us, let us rejoice that the trial of strength between it and the Government has been had at a period of the most unexampled prosperity which this country has ever known. Had we been called upon to enter this contest at any other time, under any less favorable auspices, or under an Executive of less moral courage, we might indeed have trembled for the result. As it is, rely upon it, the people will come out of this conflict with fresh hopes, and with renewed confidence in the stability and permanency of our free institutions.

Sir, it has been objected, that, if the Secretary of the Treasury had the right to remove the deposits, he had no right to select the places where they are to be kept in future; that that right belonged to the Treasurer. Sir, I have bestowed much attention upon the relative powers of the Secretary and Treasurer, as derived from the history and practice of the Government. But as these matters have been fully examined by other gentlemen, I will not take up the time of the Senate to recapitulate their arguments. I will merely observe, that the right to remove, necessarily implies the right to select the places to which the deposits are to be removed. The Treasurer has not, and never had, any authority to select the place. He is to receive and keep them in such places as the Secretary shall have selected. This is a power which the Secretary has always exercised, from the first organization of the Government, and which he must continue to exercise until Congress shall place the power in the hands of the Treasurer, or some other officer or department of the Government. If the Secretary can both remove and select the place, then he can, of necessity, contract for the safe-keeping of the deposits, and the terms on which they may be kept. But we are gravely told by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY], and other gentlemen, that the contract made by the Secretary of the Treasury with the State banks, in relation to the deposits, is absolutely void, by the statute of Congress, passed May 1st, 1820. Any one who examines this act, will at once perceive that it relates to contracts for disbursing the public money, and not for the safe-keeping of it. It is so perfectly apparent that it has no bearing on the present question, that I should not have deemed it necessary to say a single word about it, except that it has been so much insisted on by honorable Senators on the other side, as a complete prohibition to the Secretary to make any contract whatever in relation to deposits. I have taken some pains to inquire into the history of this statute, and find, on such inquiry, that I am fully justified in saying that it has no kind of application to the case for which its authority was cited. Previous to the administration of Mr. Jefferson, the appropriations for the public service were in general terms. A sum in gross was appropriated for the navy; another for the army; and another for foreign intercourse. Mr. Jefferson recommended specific appropriations for specific objects. During his administration, he endeavored to conform the disbursement of public moneys to those principles. In 1809 an act was passed declaring "that the sums appropriated by law for each branch of expenditure in the several Departments, shall be solely applied to the objects for which they are respectively appropriated, and to no other," except that the President was authorized, during the recess of Congress, on the application of the Secretary of the proper Department, to direct a portion of the money appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department to be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department. Under this act, contracts were made by the different Departments, and the money appropriated by law to a particular branch of expenditure was applied to a different branch. Jealousy was excited by the exercise of this power thus conferred on the President by the act of 1809—and in the Congress of 1816–17 a resolution was submitted in the House of Representatives instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of 1809 as authorized the President to transfer appropriations. This resolution subsequently led to the act of 1817 in a measure reorganizing the Treasury Department. By the act of 1820, which has been so often cited, the act of 1809 was modified as to the power of transferring appropriations; and was confined to particular branches in the military and naval departments. Of course, the means of consummating contracts by a change of appropriation from one particular branch of expenditure to another, was taken away. And hence it was, that it was farther enacted "that no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfilment." It was by virtue of this statute, it was alleged, that the Secretary had no authority to select the place for the deposits on removing them from the Bank of the United States. The statute, as I have shown, having no relation to the subject, it follows that the right still remains in the Secretary as it formerly existed. The right to remove and select the place, of course justifies the drafts by which the money is transferred from the one place to the other, but still in the Treasury; whilst the warrants disburse it and take it out of the Treasury. The difference between these transfer drafts and warrants, and the nature of the services to be performed by their agency, have been so fully explained by other gentlemen, that I forbear any farther remarks on the subject.

Sir, it is again urged, that even if the Secretary had the power to contract, still the contract which he made is improvident. It is not my design to go through the details of this contract. That has been sufficiently done by others. I wish to mark the different views taken of it, and the different conclusions drawn from it. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] dislikes it because it assimilates the deposit banks to the safety-fund system of New York. Sir, as much has been said, in the course of discussions which have arisen here, about this system, and as gentlemen who have undertaken to speak of it, have evinced but a very imperfect knowledge of its provisions, I propose, as briefly as possible, to give to the Senate the principal features of the system.

New York Safety-fund System.

This system was adopted in 1829. All moneyed corporations having banking powers, which should be created after the passage of the act, and all whose charters should be renewed or extended, were to be subject to the provisions of the act. The charters of almost all the old banks in that State were renewed after this period. They, together with the new bank charters which have since been granted, amount to sixty-nine, which constitute the whole number under this system. Their aggregate capital is $22,730,264. There are ten banks not subject to this law. Their aggregate capital is $5,115,000. The total capital of the New York State banks is $27,845,460. The sixty-nine banks above mentioned are required to contribute one half of one per cent. annually, till it equal three per cent. on their capital, which shall form a bank fund, commonly called the safety-fund. This fund is to be appropriated to the payment of the debts of any bank which may become insolvent, (exclusive of the capital stock,) which may remain unpaid after applying the property and effects of such bank. The fund is the property of the banks in proportion to their contributions; but the Comptroller of the State is required to invest it in the same manner as the common school fund is invested. The interest arising from such investment, after deducting the salaries of the bank commissioners, is to be paid to the banks in the ratio of their contributions. In case the fund is at any time reduced by the insolvency of a bank, then the banks are again required to contribute one-half of one per cent. annually, until the fund is reimbursed, and made to amount to the same sum it was before. For a violation of any provision of its charter, or in case of the insolvency of any bank, the Chancellor, on the application of the bank commissioners, is authorized to grant an injunction, to appoint a receiver to ascertain its indebtedness beyond its property and effects, and to certify the amount necessary to meet any balance that may remain unpaid.

For this balance, the Comptroller draws his warrant on the bank fund, and the creditors are paid from the same by the receiver, under the direction of the Chancellor. If the fund be insufficient, then the balance is to be paid when the banks make farther contribution. The creditor is entitled to lawful interest on his demand, from the time of presenting it to the receiver, and until the order of the Chancellor above mentioned. On the expiration of the charter of any bank, such corporation is entitled to receive its proportional share of the fund, after deducting its proportional part of any charges which may be against it. There are three bank commissioners, who cannot be stockholders in any bank in the State, and who are prohibited from purchasing, or being concerned, directly or indirectly, in any bank stock in the State. One of these commissioners is appointed by the Governor and Senate. The other two are chosen by the banks themselves. For this purpose the State is divided into two districts. The banks in each district appoint one of them—every five thousand dollars of stock being entitled to one vote. The commissioners hold their offices for two years, but are removable by the Governor for misconduct or neglect of duty. They visit each bank every four months, and oftener, if required by any three banks. They can examine into all the concerns of the banks, so as to ascertain their actual condition, and their ability to fulfil all their engagements. They are authorized to examine, on oath, all the officers, servants, or agents, of the banks, or any other person, in relation to the affairs and condition of said banks. The commissioners, before entering upon the duties of their offices, are required to take the constitutional oath, and are prohibited from disclosing the names of the debtors of any bank, or any information obtained by them in the course of their examination, unless required in a court of justice, or in the course of some proceeding authorized by the act creating the fund. They are required to report, annually, to the legislature, the manner in which they have discharged the duty imposed on them, together with such abstracts and statements as they may deem useful. Their salary is paid quarterly out of the bank fund. The banks are restricted in their issues to twice the amount of their capital; and in their loans and discounts to twice and a half the amount. Every officer, agent, or clerk of a bank, who shall make false statements, or false entries in the books of such bank, or who shall exhibit false papers, with intent to deceive the commissioners as to the condition of such bank, is declared guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment in the State prison. No bank can go into operation until the whole of its capital stock is actually paid in, and such payment proved on oath to the satisfaction of the bank commissioners.

When this system was first introduced to the notice of the legislature, public sentiment was much divided in relation to it. As it was examined, it became more and more a favorite with the legislature and the people. Since its adoption, and since the community has seen its practical operation, it is almost universally approved, except where political partisans make it the subject of attack, for political purposes. Some of the most experienced bankers who were opposed to its adoption, have yielded their prejudices to the effects of its beneficial operations. It has been the means of introducing a new class of stockholders into our moneyed institutions. Formerly, many of the charters granted went into the hands of speculators. The capital was not actually paid in—or, at all events, but a very small portion of it. Stock notes were substituted; and upon this nominal capital, the country was flooded with a circulation altogether disproportioned to the capital, even if it had all been paid in. The power of the commissioners to supervise the concerns of the banks begets public confidence. Their minute examinations keep every thing correct. Under such supervision and examination, men of the most substantial means seek these stocks, as the best investment for their capital. By such stockholders, prudent and discreet directors are appointed. They have no other object than to manage the institution for the best interests of the stockholders; and an institution, thus managed, is always conducted for the best interests of the community. The very knowledge or consciousness of the power of the bank commissioners to detect any improper or fraudulent practices, either by their own personal examination, or by the examination of the officers of the bank on oath, is of itself a preventive to frauds of any description. The silent operation of this power is of the most salutary character. No set of directors would undertake the commission of a fraud, when they knew there was the possibility, nay, the probability, of detection; and when the evidences of the fraud might be drawn from themselves under the severest penalties. By this means, public confidence is maintained, and public safety secured. There is no possibility of loss to the bill holders or depositors of the banks. Formerly, by the insolvency of a bank, the severest losses fell on that portion of the community least able to bear them. Under the present system they are perfectly secure from any such calamity. There is no connexion between the banks. Each has a common interest in the fund, in proportion to its contributions. Beyond this, all their operations are as distinct as formerly. There is the same competition between them—a healthy competition—which keeps their issues and operations within proper limits, without a desire to injure each other. They watch over one another from the best motives. It has been objected, as one of the greatest dangers of the system, that there was a lack of vigilance in sending home and returning each others' notes for redemption. Sir, the reverse of this is the fact. No banks ever kept up a more active system of exchange of paper. It is the boast of the Bank of the United States that in a single year it sent home for redemption more than twenty millions of local bank notes. By the last report of the bank commissioners, it appears that the notes of the country banks are sent home for redemption every fifteen days, and that "the banks in Albany alone have probably thus compelled the redemption of nearly twenty-five millions of paper issued by the institutions in the western part of the State during the last year." What banks present more activity and vigilance in their redemptions than these?

The fund already accumulated is nearly $300,000, and the revenue arising from it is about $13,000. The next year will increase the fund to upwards of $400,000, and the revenue to $18,000. The increase will be in this ratio till the capital of the fund rises to about $700,000. To this must be added the contributions from new capital to be created—capital which must keep pace with the growing population and increasing business of the State. In due time this fund may be anticipated to amount to one million of dollars. It is invested, like the common school fund, in the safest manner. One great desideratum, in regard to our banking institutions, has been to secure the community against loss from their operations. What more effectual security can be provided, than the one which this system affords?

SENATE.]

Removal of the Deposits.

[MARCH 12, 1834.]

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WHEELER,] with seeming frankness, concedes the soundness and solvency of the New York banks, but kindly calls the attention of her representatives on this floor, to what he deems a more important consideration, namely, the ratio of their specie to their circulation. Sir, I have examined this suggestion in the same spirit of kindness with which it was made; and I will now ask the indulgence of the Senate, whilst I give the result of my examination. I have instituted a comparison between the banks of New York and those of Massachusetts. I have taken the Senator's own State for the purpose of illustration, because its banks have ever been considered equal, at least, to those of any other State in the Union. The prudence with which they have been managed is proverbial; their ability to meet all their engagements is unquestioned, and, in regard to specie, as a basis of circulation—which the honorable Senator very justly remarked was the only true basis—it has always been their pride and their boast, that they have, in all times, been able to redeem their bills in specie; that, during the late war, when other banks suspended specie payment, these banks continued, without difficulty and without embarrassment, to meet all demands upon them. It is with such banks that I propose to compare the banks of New York. It will be recollected that the country banks of the State of New York keep funds in the city of Albany, and in the city of New York, for the redemption of their bills; or on which they can draw, at any time, in favor of those who want to make remittances to either of those places. The bills of the country banks of Massachusetts are also received by the banks in Boston, and sent home for redemption. In this comparison, then, we must take the aggregate amount of specie, and the aggregate amount of circulation.

Banks of Massachusetts, October 1st, 1833.

Aggregate circulation	$7,889,110
Deduct notes of other banks	1,796,361
Actual circulation	$6,092,749
Specie	$922,309
Ratio of specie to circulation, as one dollar to six dollars and sixty cents.

Banks of New York, January 1st, 1834.

Aggregate circulation	$15,402,705
Deduct notes of other banks	5,623,522
Actual circulation	$9,779,183
Specie	$2,196,927
Ratio of specie to circulation, as one dollar to four dollars and forty-five cents.

Whether the banks of either Massachusetts or New York, have a sufficient specie basis, is a question to be decided by political economists. All I mean to say is, that when the proper ratio shall be determined, New York will be found to approximate nearer to it than Massachusetts, whose banks, like her able representative in this Senate, have always held the most elevated rank. There are no banks in the Union more sound and solvent than the safety-fund banks of New York. Why then are they the objects of animadversion here, whilst those of other States pass unnoticed? I know of no reason, unless it be the one ironically assigned by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORTNEY,] namely, that it is the system of New York! Sometimes honorable gentlemen affect to assume that the system is political. Sir, I am enabled to say, from personal knowledge and observation, that such an allegation is altogether gratuitous and without foundation, and can only be made from misinformation, or a total misapprehension of the subject. At least three-fourths, and I think I should be perfectly safe in saying nine-tenths, of the banking capital of the State, is held by those who are known to be the opponents of the present administration. If it be used for political purposes, it is certainly under the control and direction of the friends of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who would not be likely to use it to the disadvantage of their own party. But, sir, it is used for no such purpose. It is employed for legitimate banking purposes—for the purposes of gain. Public sentiment would put down any attempt to bring the power and influence of the banks to bear on the political concerns of the country. Although such a large majority of the stock is in the hands of the opposition, still it is due to them to say, that I have known of no efforts, on their part, to use the power which they thus possess for any other than legitimate banking business.

This system, then, combines all the advantages of others, without their disadvantages. It also unites many benefits which no other system possesses. The banks are, by this means, rendered perfectly safe, and the community, by necessary consequence, is safe also. When this system shall cease to be the object of political attack, at home and abroad, it will be regarded as one of the greatest improvements of the age in the business of banking. It has cured the greatest evil which the country has heretofore felt—the liability to loss by those least able to sustain it. Every day's experience renders its importance more and more apparent. It has already extended its salutary influence over the whole people, and it will confer enduring fame on him who first had the honor to recommend it to the legislature of his native State. The attacks upon it will cease, when the great money aristocracy, which is now attempting to rule the country, shall expire, and when the political aspirants of the present day shall find more favorable and more fit objects for their solicitude and care. I can forget and forgive the assaults which are made on it from abroad—from those out of the State—for such, there may be offered many palliations: Misinformation or misapprehension in regard to the system—a kind of parental affection on the part of some for the Bank of the United States which was created by them—an overweening desire for the public good!—a patriotic ardor in defence of the bleeding constitution and violated laws of the country! All these motives may influence their action. But what shall I say of attacks upon our own institutions from our own citizens? Attacks, too, for the purpose of aiding the cause of that great moneyed power which has made itself so fearfully felt from one extremity of the Union to the other? Look at the infamous paragraphs of editors at home, and of letter-writers from this city, by which the public mind has been attempted to be excited and alarmed. See the assaults which have been made, from day to day, on our local institutions, with a view to break them down, and to spread ruin and disaster throughout our widely-extended territory. Look at the incendiary attempts to impair the confidence of the people in our local banks; to excite a panic, and cause a run upon them to compel them to stop specie payments. Read the advice from such sources in the many thousand shapes in which it has been presented: "Let the cautious man house his little stock, secure from the pelting of the pitiless storm that approaches." "Let him who has a five dollar bill to lay aside, exchange it for specie, while that may yet be had." Sir, I am ashamed and mortified and humiliated to announce on this floor, that we have amongst us citizens so reckless of their own honor, and so regardless of the interests and character of the State. But, sir, I have too much confidence in the people of New York to believe, that all the efforts of foreign or domestic foes can drive them from their attachments to their own institutions, or compel them to sacrifice their interests to those of a moneyed tyrant that is endeavoring to destroy them. I trust that all such efforts will prove unavailing. The onward course of New York may excite the envy and opposition of political rivalry. This we have reason to expect, and we can encounter and even endure oppression from such a source. Her fair, liberal, and honorable competition, in her business and commercial operations, cannot excite the jealousy of her sister States. She seeks not to impose her systems, whatever they may be, and however much they may be prized by her own citizens, upon any other portion of the Union. Her example is before the world. If, in her system of internal improvements, her common school fund, her literature fund, her canal fund, and her bank fund, there be any thing worthy of imitation, let those avail themselves of it who think it not degrading to derive benefits from the experience of others. These are the monuments of her pride and her glory. She only asks to be left to the enjoyment of them. They no longer have the character of experiments. Time has already tested their usefulness. Her internal communications, extending from the ocean to the lakes, have spread the activity of commerce to every portion of the State. Her common schools have diffused the blessings of education to every hamlet within her borders. Her literature fund has extended its benign influence to the higher seminaries of learning, and her banking system has secured the community against the hazard of an irresponsible paper circulation, and forms the Corinthian capital which crowns the mighty column of her fame. Why then is New York singled out as the object of political vengeance? Why are her institutions which have no connexion with the political affairs of the country, assailed with so much virulence? Has she ever been wanting in her duty to herself or the Union? For the sake of the Union, she originally surrendered her imposts, which now form about two-thirds of the whole revenues of the Government. Yes, sir, those very revenues which are the subject of the present discussion, about which gentlemen are so very sensitive, and from the deposit of which in her local banks, they are fearful she may derive an incidental benefit! No, sir, she has never been backward in her duty—she has sustained the Government in peace and in war. In the darkest period of the late contest with Great Britain she furnished men to repel an invading foe; and when that contest was over, she again contributed her full portion of the means to liquidate the debt of the nation incurred in that memorable struggle. The enterprise of her citizens has been seen in every sea; the valor of her sons has been felt in every battle-field—nay, more: it was by some of these much abused banks that the national arm was upheld in the hour of her greatest peril. They furnished the means by which the American troops were enabled to cross her western frontier, and charge the enemy on a foreign soil, with an impetuosity like that of the mighty torrent whose banks were the scene of the conflict. They, too, furnished the means by which Perry scoured the lake, and Macdonough won the prize. She is still willing to make any further sacrifice for the benefit of the Union. But she cannot quietly yield up her most cherished systems, to gratify political ambition, or appease political rivalry. She hopes to be able to sustain herself against all attacks from without, and all assaults from within. But, if the time shall ever come when she, with her glorious institutions, must fall, God grant she may not fall by the hands of her own offspring. Let not her last moments be embittered by reflecting upon the assassin stabs of her own children—children whom she has nursed and nurtured into manhood—who owe to her all of character, or of honor, or of prosperity, which they enjoy. If she must fall, let there be no necessity to apply to her, when stricken down, the pathetic lines of England's noble bard, on another occasion—

"So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,

Viewed his own feather on the fatal dart,
And winged the shaft that quivered in his heart.
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel
He nursed the pinion which impelled the steel;
While the same plume that had warmed his nest,
Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding breast."

Mr. President, the principal feature of the safety-fund system is the security which it gives to the creditors of the banks. In objecting to this system, as applicable to the contract made by the Secretary of the Treasury with the local banks, the Senator from Kentucky rejects that which is most desired by every one, namely, security! Still, he tells us the security is insufficient; and he says, "the banks are required, by the Secretary, to give security only when the deposits shall exceed half the amount of the capital of the bank." Here, again, the Senator is mistaken. For the contract shows, on its very face, that the Secretary may require security, whenever he may deem it necessary, although the deposits may not equal one-half of the amount of the capital. Again, he objects that the Secretary has not "ample powers to examine into all its affairs." On the other hand, it was stated in the resolutions originally introduced into the Virginia legislature, that "the critical examination to which the bank has agreed to submit its books and transactions, &c. is degrading to the State, and hurtful to its citizens, and its several banks;" and that the security required, gave too much power and control over the State banks. With one, the security is insufficient; with another, it is not only sufficient, but it gives too much power. With one, there is not ample power to examine into all the affairs of the banks; with another, the power is not only ample for that purpose, but the examination is too critical! Do these different constructions of this contract depend on latitude? or is there some magic in it, by which it is made to assume different shapes, at different times, and at different places? It reminds me, sir, of an account, in a late number of "Willis's first impressions of Europe," of an exhibition of geometrical figures formed by the vibration of musical sounds. The exhibition was by an aged German, in the chemical department of the Polytechnic School of Vienna. I regret that I cannot give it in the language of the author. I will endeavor to give the substance from memory. The exhibitor took a pane of glass, placed it horizontally, and covered it with black sand. He then took a fiddle-bow and drew it across the glass at a peculiar angle, and the sand, as if by magic, assumed the form of a circle. He then asked the spectators to name a figure which they wished to see made—they named a square. Again, by another draw of the bow, the sand assumed the shape of a square. By a similar experiment a triangle was formed. These experiments were continued and repeated, till the spectators became perfectly satisfied that he had reduced it to an art—an art which, a century ago, would have been the forfeit of his life for magic! Thus, sir, it is with this contract. Let the great fiddle-bow of the opposition be applied to it, and it is made to assume any shape or form which best suits the purposes of the exhibitor, or which best tends to excite the admiration and gratify the curiosity of those who may have assembled to witness the performance. And if the honorable Senator who has been the first and principal exhibitor on this occasion, shall escape the penalties inflicted for magic in olden times, he may attribute his good fortune to the intelligence of the age in which we live, and to the enlightened audience before whom his performances were had.

Mr. President, I have trespassed already so long upon the patience of the Senate, that I hasten to a close, by merely glancing at some of the remaining reasons assigned by the Secretary for the removal of the deposits. The conduct of the bank in relation to the payment of the three per cent. stock of the Government, its claim for damages on the French bill, and its treatment of the Government directors, have been very fully commented on by others; and I, therefore, forbear to enlarge upon them, any farther than to observe, that I deem either of them a sufficient reason for the action of the Secretary. I will also add, that, in regard to the three per cents. wherein the bank, if not guilty of a palpable violation of its charter, was chargeable with the grossest dereliction of duty, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance has not, in the course of his elaborate report, even deigned to notice the subject! Had the chairman seen fit to bestow on this, only a small portion of the time and attention which he devoted to the other reasons of the Secretary, I apprehend that, without further inquiry, he would have found, in that transaction alone, a sufficient cause for forthwith removing the deposits from the custody of the bank.

Sir, it was my intention to have gone into a full examination in relation to the rights and duties of the Government directors; but time will not permit. Suffice it to say, that the manner in which the important business of the bank is intrusted to the exchange committee—and that committee appointed by the president of the bank—and the Government directors excluded from any participation in its transactions, evinces a hardihood, a boldness, a recklessness on the part of the bank, rarely equalled, and never surpassed, in the history of a moneyed corporation. The very object of those directors, as it is to be gathered from the original project of Mr. Dallas, and from the whole tenor of the debate on the passage of the bill, has, by the practice of the bank, been defeated. And to cap the climax, these very directors, for the performance of those duties for which their offices were created, and they appointed, have received the marked condemnation of this Senate. It remains to be seen, whether the sentiments of the people can be brought to favor the re-charter of an institution which has so grossly attempted to defeat one of the very ends of its incorporation.

Again: The Secretary assigns as another reason for his action, that the bank has interfered in the politics of the country, and used its means to obtain political power and for electioneering purposes. A few facts will demonstrate these two positions. From December, 1830, to December, 1831, the bank extended its loans over twenty millions of dollars. From the latter date to the 1st of May, 1832, (only four months,) it extended its loans about seven and a half millions of dollars; making an extension of over twenty-eight millions of dollars in the short space of sixteen months; equal to sixty-six per cent. on its former loans. These are not the vibrations of particular seasons, as some have supposed. This is the comparison of a year. Why this sudden expansion? What was there in the business wants of the community that required it? What but political considerations could have influenced the bank thus to extend its accommodations, when it was evident that its consequent curtailments must produce distress throughout the whole country? It was to operate on the approaching election for President. It was to draw the people within its grasp, and, by the influence of the immense means which it wielded, to create a public sentiment in favor of its re-charter. Of the same character, and for similar purposes, was the authority given to the President of the bank to use its funds in causing "to be prepared and circulated, such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information in regard to the nature and operations of the bank." Under this resolution, the President has unlimited power to expend whatever sum he sees fit, in the publication and circulation of such matter as will best tend to accomplish the great object of a re-charter. No vouchers are required of him for these expenditures. He is bound to make no account. Even the directors, and especially the Government directors, are kept entirely ignorant of the nature and extent of the disbursement of this secret service money. What will the people say, as to the management of an institution which puts the control of its whole funds into the hands of one man, and for which he is in no way accountable? That enormous sums were expended to influence and control the Presidential election, is evident from the statement made by the bank itself. I have shown that the re-charter of the bank was the issue at that election; and we shall see, from this statement, the manner in which the issue was sustained by the funds which the bank intrusted to the charge of its President. According to its own account, it expended for reports, speeches, and miscellaneous publications,

1831	-	-	-	-	-	21,708
1832	-	-	-	-	-	26,579
1833	-	-	-	-	-	2,607

After examining this statement, let any one tell me that these sums were not expended to influence the Presidential election. Look at the comparatively small cost of the preparatory measures in 1830—see the progress of expenditure in 1831, when the honorable Senator from Kentucky was fairly in the field. Behold the increase in 1832, when the contest was decided—and the diminished amount in 1833, when the battle had been lost, and before the operations of a new campaign had commenced. What will be the expense of 1834, will probably depend upon the length and excellence of the speeches and reports which its advocates shall make during the present session of Congress, and upon the prospect of controlling the next Congressional elections.

But, it is said the bank may do all this in self-defence. Sir, I utterly deny its right to make such a defence. If it be an institution in which the community is so deeply interested, it should be defended by the public press, as it defends all other measures of great public interest. The fact of paying editors for services in such a cause, presupposes that they are mercenary. It has a tendency to corrupt them, however pure they may be, before the contaminating touch of such a power. It thereby injures the public morals. But, it is said the President of United States has no concern with the morals of the people or the press. Sir, in my judgment, if in the discharge of a public duty, he can protect the morals of the people, and preserve the purity of the press, he is bound to do it. To say otherwise, is to say he is not bound to make an exertion to preserve the liberties of the country. For when the public morals are debased, and the public press corrupted, we may bid farewell to our liberty, and to our constitution! I make no charge against the generality of the press. I am not in the habit of underrating its influence or detracting from its importance. There is no press in the world so independent and free as the American press. I speak of it generally—and whilst I claim for that portion of it which sustains the measures of the administration, purity of motive and honesty of purpose, I would wish to be extremely cautious of impugning the motives of those on the other side, however much I may condemn their intemperate and mistaken zeal. There are, however, instances where editors have fallen under the potent spell of the bank, and where the charm can only be dissolved but by the expiration of its charter. It is to prevent the demoralizing influence of such a practice, that the power given to the President of the bank to expend money at will, and without limit, should be condemned in the most pointed manner. The bank has no right thus to defend itself. If false charges be made against it, let the directors, in their official character, declare them untrue. But, I utterly deny the right of the bank to expend money, by publishing speeches, or reports, or treatises on currency, no matter how able or meritorious they may be. The bank is and should be merely passive. It is the creature of the Government. It is entitled to all the privileges granted by its charter, and those privileges it is justified in defending, whenever assailed, in any legal shape in which the question may be presented. But it has no right to expend its money to enlighten the public mind in relation to a re-charter. That is a matter with which the bank cannot interfere. The speeches and essays which it has published, are not to protect it in any of its chartered rights, but to show that the country cannot get on without such an institution. That is a matter for the country, and not the bank, to judge of. If the directors or stockholders have a mind to expend their individual means to inform the public mind, or even to create public sentiment, they have a right so to do. But the bank, in its corporate capacity, has no such right. Look at the absurdity of a contrary opinion. The Government owns one-fifth of the stock of the bank. Those whom the people have chosen to administer the Government, consider the bank dangerous to our free institutions, and to the liberty of the country, and that it ought to expire by its own limitation—and yet the bank is employing the funds of the Government to put down the administration of the Government, in order thereby to secure a re-charter, which that administration think it unconstitutional and inexpedient to grant. If in this the administration be wrong, the people will correct them. The objection is to the affirmative interference of the bank in a question in which it, so far as relates to all its existing privileges, has no interest. The people of this country are represented by those whom they have chosen to administer the government—and shall it be tolerated that their own money shall be employed to put down those whom they have selected to conduct their affairs; and that, too, by an irresponsible moneyed corporation? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] has said that the bank may defend itself by all decent publications? In this respect, the bank is like the schoolboy, who, when asked, in reference to his lessons, how far he had advanced, replied he had got clear beyond Decency. I need only refer to a pamphlet, which is said to have issued from the marble palace, entitled "Important facts for the people." Much of it is too vile and indecent to be read here; and I therefore merely select a single paragraph, to show that the bank had become a political partisan, and distinctly understood the issue which was formed for her, and which was to be tried at the then approaching Presidential election.

"The solemn truth is as clear to the eye of every intelligent man as the sun at noon day, that the existence of this Union depends on the defeat of Andrew Jackson, and on the election of Henry Clay as President. No future event can be more certain, than the breaking to pieces of this Union, if the pernicious doctrines of General Jackson, and the evil counsellors by whom he is surrounded, are to prevail for another Presidential term." What stronger evidence is wanting to support the charge of the Secretary, that the bank was striving to obtain political power and using its means for electioneering purposes? It became a partisan of the candidate in opposition to General Jackson, at the very moment he was formally announced to the people, and continued to expend its means, together with the money of the people in its hands, by thousands of dollars, till the termination of the contest which again conferred upon our venerable Chief Magistrate the highest honors within the gift of a free and grateful people. Had it been otherwise—had the influence of money been too powerful for the patriotism of the people, well might the Senator from Kentucky now exclaim, We are in the midst of a revolution! If the doctrines advanced on the other side prevail, we are indeed in the midst of a revolution! A revolution not brought about by civil discord or internal commotion—not by the usurpations of a domestic armed force, or the aggressions of a foreign foe—but by the gradual undermining and sapping of the very foundations of our free institutions, by means of the secret, silent, unheard, unseen influence of gold, in the corruption of the public morals and the public press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 13.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WEBSTER said, he rose to present a memorial, very numerous signed by citizens of Brooklyn, in New York, and to present, also, the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of that place, in which sundry resolutions had been passed, respecting the all-absorbing question which now agitates the country. With some of those citizens he had the honor to be acquainted, and he knew them to be distinguished for knowledge, patriotism, and high character. Both the memorial and the resolutions are framed in the most judicious manner, and are well entitled to the respectful consideration of the Senate. One of the resolutions respected the question of the constitutional power of Congress to incorporate a bank, and stated the question in so few words, and placed it in what appeared to him so just a light, that he would read that resolution, in his place:

"Resolved, That though a public meeting is not an appropriate place for the discussion of constitutional questions, we still deem it proper to express the opinion, that upon questions of that kind, not less than upon those relating to private rights, an adherence to decisions deliberately made, and subsequently acted on as the law of the case, is the rule of safety, and the only rule that can give stability either to law or government. When, therefore, we know that a great proportion of the actual framers and original expounders of the constitution, found no objections either in the letter or spirit of that instrument, against the incorporation of a national bank; when the highest judicial tribunal in the country has solemnly passed upon it, and declared it to be constitutional; when in two instances, and at distant periods, such acts have been passed by Congress, and received the sanction of successive Presidents; and when we have already lived under them, and submitted to their operation, almost forty years—we consider it too late to disregard all evidences of constitutional right, and to prostrate the public interests, upon a mere difference of opinion, however strongly formed, on the original question."

The memorial, said Mr. W., is numerous signed, by substantial, intelligent, and well-known citizens, who see and feel the pressure of the times, and who have felt it their duty to join with others in giving to Congress proofs of their deep and settled conviction that the state of the country is such as to demand, imperiously, effectual and prompt relief.

The memorial and resolutions were then, on the motion of Mr. W., read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MAINE MEMORIALS.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he had been intrusted with two memorials, which he would now present to the Senate: one of them from citizens of Eastport, and the other from those of Lubec, in the State of Maine, on the all absorbing subject which was now before the Senate and the country. That from the citizens of Eastport represented that they were largely engaged in foreign and domestic trade, which for seven years past had been prosperous beyond example; but suddenly they found their prospects and their property destroyed. Many memorialists in Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, with whom they were accustomed to trade, had failed, and this, as well as other causes, essentially affected their own prosperity. All these evils they ascribed to the Executive, and they asked relief from Congress; and they especially and solemnly appealed to their wisdom and patriotism, and hoped that no party consideration would outweigh their duty to their country and their constituents. The other memorial, from Lubec, contained the names of many well known to Mr. S. They were merchants and other men of respectability. Their statement was a little stronger than that from Eastport. They said that their sufferings would not be borne; that their business was prostrated, credit at an end, and there was no prospect of a termination of these evils; they had experienced a sudden and terrible change from a state of high prosperity. They asked the restoration of the deposits, and they expressed the belief that the re-charter of the United States Bank would benefit the country; that a national currency could be made uniform only by a national institution. They said that the assertion made in high places, that the distress was owing to a wilful act of the bank, was an insult to their understandings, and a mockery to their sufferings.

Mr. S. asked that the memorials might be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance; and it was so ordered.

VIRGINIA MEMORIAL.

Mr. TYLER presented a series of resolutions adopted by the people of Accomack county, disapproving in strong terms of the course of the President in relation to the public deposits. He at the same time presented a memorial numerously signed by the citizens of Fredericksburg and Falmouth, rebrobing, in strong but respectful language, the late Executive proceedings. As to the first, he would remark, that the county of Accomack was one of the largest counties in the State, and equal to any other for intelligence and patriotism—that he recognised in the names of some of those who appeared to have had the most active agency in the meeting, gentlemen with whom he had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance, and for whose high qualities, both intellectual and moral, it was not necessary for him to avouch. As to the resolutions, they spoke for themselves, and called for no commentary.

The memorialists from Fredericksburg and Falmouth constitute as intelligent and as respectable a body of men as can any where be found—they represent that great distress had flowed from the Executive proceedings; and indulge in anticipations of still greater to come. They remonstrate against those proceedings as unwise, illegal, and unjust, and as involving assumptions of authority not warranted by the constitution or laws, and urge upon Congress a return of the public moneys to the depository provided by law, the Bank of the United States. And why, said Mr. T., should the deposits not be restored? Many weeks ago the Senate had been told, that the restoration of the deposits and the re-charter of the bank meant one and the same thing; and that the only question before the country was "bank or no bank." Yesterday, however, this delusion was dissipated by the declaration of gentlemen, that the restoration was a harmless thing, importing, of consequence, no additional power to the bank, and that its advocates would not give a snap of the finger for the deposits, unless connected with a re-charter. This was to deal frankly with the country; to present the true question at issue, and not that which had artfully been raised, for what purpose it was not necessary for him to say. To him it had been obvious that the withdrawal of the deposits by the Secretary was not necessary to put down the bank, and of consequence the withholding them cannot be necessary for that purpose. The bank was dead under the veto of 1832, and could not be revived but by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses. The President had it under his feet, as he had stated on another occasion. The President continues in office until 1837, while the bank expires in 1836. The President outlives it by a whole year, and this seizure of the deposits has nothing to sanction it on the score of mere motives; while it was forbidden by the highest consideration. No man here has undertaken to justify the act of removal. Does the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FOSBERT], the great champion of the administration on this floor, justify the President? Excuses enough are urged for his conduct, but that Senator has not ventured to justify it.

Mr. T. said he had never once stopped to inquire whether the bank wanted a restoration of the moneys or not. He could well imagine strong reasons to exist why it should not want them restored. Every day they were withheld, the number of its friends were increased, and with it a question of deep interest to itself was presented, whether it was better to forego the benefits resulting from the custody of the revenue for two years, or to take the chance which the public distress would afford it, of having, after that period, a renewal of its charter. When he looked to that question being opposed to the renewal of the charter, he desired a restoration of the deposits in order to avoid it. He could not be deaf to the storm which was sweeping over the face of the country, and threatening to overturn its prosperity—nor was he blind to all the light of experience, which taught him that, in order to avert the threatened danger, men would be but too apt to seek refuge and security after the best manner that they could. What is necessary to appease this storm—to give tranquillity to the public mind? Take the advice of the memorialists and restore the deposits—change the attitude of the Government and bank towards each other. They stand in the attitude of belligerents, and the country is the only sufferer. The President wages an offensive, the bank a defensive war: it is compelled to resort to measures of defence in order to preserve its credit: curtailment on its part becomes necessary, in order to enable it to meet the hostile assaults which are continually threatened. This forces the State banks to curtail, and every department of industry is thereby paralyzed. The towns first feel the distress, but the country must necessarily suffer next. Where there are no buyers, there can be no sellers—or, if the buyers be diminished in number, prices of produce inevitably decline, and, in the train, follow lands, every thing, depreciated in price. Let this state of things be changed, and every thing will wear a new face. The necessity for heavy bank curtailments ceases; the bank would fall into its long sleep without a struggle. Instead of a sudden contraction of its discounts, the process would be slow and gradual, and in order to render it as little hurtful as possible, Congress would doubtless be willing to grant it as long a time to wind up its concerns as it would desire. This was the course pursued towards the old bank by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, and he believed that the whole of its affairs had not been settled even to the present day. The whole policy of the President in removing the deposits had been most unfortunate—and every consideration seemed to him to require their restoration. We were told yesterday, that the President could not retrace his steps with honor. What language is this to be held by a public agent? Honor, due regard to the solemn obligations and duties of office, require of every public man to repair the mischiefs which his own unwise policy may have inflicted on the country. By what sort of advisers must the President be surrounded, when we are told that he would be dishonored by giving audience to the constituent body, and yielding to their wishes? His duty required this of him. The country must suffer because the President must not be inconsistent. Honor would not permit him to retract an ill-advised act, no matter what came out of it. Mr. T. would scout such an idea of honor and consistency.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOSBERT] was pleased to charge the State from which he came with approving, under a Virginia President, with what she censured under a President coming from another quarter; and in order to sustain this grave and weighty charge, the Senator referred to certain proceedings adopted by Mr. Crawford in the years 1817 and 1819. To Mr. T.'s conception, there existed no analogy between the cases. Upon the occasions alluded to, the currency was threatened with the greatest disorder. At the first period, the bank had scarcely got into operation; and at the last, it had been so mismanaged as to be threatened with bankruptcy. The bank itself assented to the proceedings. The public mind was not attracted to them, and, escaping notice, they may thereby have escaped censure. But was a Secretary in those cases, as in this, evicted from office? Did the President take the responsibility of declaring the contract between the Government and bank pro tanto at an end, possessing himself thereby of an entire control over the purse? No, sir, no. The patriotic citizen who then presided over the affairs of the country, understood better what was due to the country. But Mr. T. desired to refresh the recollection of the Senator, touching other events of that period, in order to vindicate his State from the charge of slumbering over infractions of the law and the constitution, because one of her citizens chanced to fill the Presidential chair. Does the Senator recollect the occupation of Amelia Island by the military force of the United States, under Mr. Monroe's administration? It was done without the sanction of Congress, in the absence of law; but it was done from the most correct of motives, to expel from that, their place of resort, those who have been called hostes humani generis, the pirates who swarmed in those seas and destroyed our commerce—and yet, in that case, many of those who represented Virginia in the two Houses, did not fail to disapprove of the act, as in some measure unwarranted by law. Nor did we, for I was one of them, forget that we had a constitution and laws, when the then commander of our armies made formal war against a neutral nation, reduced its forts, and captured its territory. We then believed that Mr. Monroe sustained the commanding general in his course. His Secretary of State published the ablest defence which was probably ever written under similar circumstances; and, but for recent disclosures, I should have died in the belief that Mr. Monroe fully approved the course pursued by the present President, then the general of our armies, in the Seminole war. Where was Virginia then? She stood by the side of Georgia, whose sons first moved in the matter. Proudly and full gallantly did Georgia lead off that debate, and firmly, however feebly, was she sustained by many of those who represented Virginia. True, we were overruled by the majority in the House of Representatives, and I must be permitted to express the belief, that the efforts of one man did more to produce that result, than any other. That gentleman is now before me, a member of this body. He delivered a speech upon that occasion, which at the time was regarded as bespeaking talents of no ordinary grade. I need not say to the Senate, that I mean the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. POINDEXTER,] who sits near me. His relations to that eminent individual, whom he then so ably defended, have been materially changed of late. Why this has been I undertake not to say—the honorable Senator is fully competent, of himself, to give an exposition of the matter. Nor were these the only measures which my State opposed during the administration alluded to. When Mr. Monroe came out with his doctrine of the unlimited right in Congress to appropriate the moneys of the Government to any object it might please, that doctrine was universally reprobated by Virginia, as pernicious, and in the highest degree dangerous. The gentleman is aware that, for the last fifteen years, it has been the course of policy adopted by some, to arraign the principles and policy of Virginia—a State that, he would take upon him to say, had given as many evidences of devotion to the Union as any other in the Union. He deeply regretted that the Senator, a native-born citizen of that State, from whom she should rather expect defence than accusation, should have brought this charge against her. No, sir, the day never was, unless it has now come, no matter who presided over this Government, when, for such proceedings as those which have recently transpired, she would not have censured and condemned.

Mr. BROWN said he would repeat what he had said before, that there was not an individual who had more respect for the right of petition than himself. But, as to the observation that there was distress in Virginia, he would refer to the great staple of that State, which they had long cultivated, tobacco. He had the prices current of that article at Richmond, for the present month, and it was quoted in the Richmond Enquirer of the 8th instant, at from eight to eleven dollars, which was decidedly the best average price which it had borne for the last five years. It was the prevalent opinion in his part of the country, and in the parts of Virginia adjacent, that planters were richly compensated for the cultivation of tobacco, at the price of $6. Bank stock in Virginia was also on good demand; that of two of the banks was at eight and a half per cent. above par. This was the melancholy picture of distress described by the Senator from Virginia. The gentleman had said, why not permit the bank to expire in peace and tranquillity? Had any one endeavored to obstruct it? Not at all. It still curtailed, and the deposits were taken from it. Would gentlemen say they were the property of the bank? What right had the bank to retain them? Let gentlemen look at the charter; was not the power of removal unqualified, resting wholly on discretion? The Government threw no embarrassment in the way of the bank, but left it to operate as it chose; and if it chose to distress the country, the administration is not responsible, but the bank, which has done all the injury to orphans and widows, and others. But the Senator had asked, should honor prevent the President from retracing his steps, and had ridiculed the idea. The mere empty name of honor had little to do with the Chief Magistrate in the discharge of his duty; he was actuated not only by honor, but by a higher duty to the constitution and liberties of the people. But, Mr. B. would protest against any gentleman taking the honor of the President into his custody. The President was himself responsible. The gentleman had said that his State had been repeatedly the object of attack. Mr. B. thought no State had conferred greater honor on the Federal Government; orators had sounded her praise, and he was sure the honorable Senator had not let her pass without a quantum sufficit.

Mr. TYLER said, if the smiles of the Senator from North Carolina could dissipate the distress which threatens the country, it would be well; but this could not be, however complacent the Senator might feel. He appeared to consider that there was no cause of complaint, and read from the newspaper the price of stocks. Mr. T. would submit it to the Senate, whether the testimony of 244 signers, as honorable as the Senator himself, to the memorial from Fredericksburg and Falmouth, was of more weight than a newspaper paragraph.

Mr. LEIGH requested that the honorable Senator from North Carolina would send him over the paper from which he had quoted the prices of tobacco and stocks. After examining the items, he said: With regard to the price of tobacco, he had the evidence of the Richmond memorial, signed by every considerable tobacco merchant of that town, representing that tobacco had become depreciated in the market from 15 to 25 per cent. The question was not, then, what was the present price of tobacco in Richmond, but what was the price compared with that which it probably might have obtained under other circumstances. All knew that the price of tobacco, as well as of every other mercantile commodity, depended solely upon the supply and demand; and if, by any extraordinary circumstance, it should so happen that the quantity of tobacco became diminished, the price would be consequently raised, or, if any extraordinary demand for tobacco came from the foreign market, that would cause another rise in the price. Now, it so happened, that the last quotations from the prices current of Liverpool and London (for there were none from France) which he had seen immediately before he had left his State, gave evidence of a greater demand than had been known for many years, and the prices proportionably high; and yet the prices of tobacco in Richmond have been less than have been known for some three or four years past. It was extremely difficult, such was the nature of the trade, to ascertain the causes of the depreciation in this commodity. Tobacco was a commodity of very various qualities, differing in value from 3 dollars per cwt. to 20 and sometimes to as high as 22 or 30 dollars. He held in his hand a piece of tobacco, of the growth and manufacture of the State of Virginia, to which State he confessed he owed the most patriotic devotion, which was worth, manufactured, 22 dollars per cwt.; and, at the same time, there was tobacco manufactured in the city of Richmond, which was worth only 3 dollars per cwt.; and God help those who had the same devotion to the article that he had, and who were reduced to the necessity of masticating such an article. It was, therefore, one of the most difficult matters in the world to ascertain the cause of any fluctuation in the price of that article: but go to the city of Richmond, and the dealers there would tell, with almost mathematical certainty, and make it clear to the meanest understanding. That very memorial was founded upon the estimate which was laid before the Senate, before he had the honor of a seat on that floor. Now he did not undertake to say that the price of tobacco was less now than it was formerly, because it would ascertain nothing; but he would undertake to say, upon positive and certain information, derived from the most intelligent and honorable men engaged in the trade of tobacco, that the depreciation was at least fifteen per cent. according to the quality of the article on sale, varying from 15 to 25 per cent.; and that they had represented to that House, although, perhaps, they were persons not entitled to the confidence to which other persons were deemed to be entitled. Most of these persons meddled not at all with politics; they attended to their ordinary business and pursuits. As to the price of stocks, hints had been given that they had not suffered. The stocks of two of the banks of Virginia had risen from what they had been some two or three years before. They had risen above par to as much as 112 or 113; but, since the removal of the deposits, they had fallen again to 108, at which they now stood. This fact he obtained from his own personal knowledge; for he had had occasion, as an agent for others, to purchase stock early in the month of September. He very well remembered that he then paid 112, and they remained at that until the opinion became general throughout Virginia, that the deposits would not be restored. The stock of the two banks of Virginia stood nearly at par; but, at the very moment the opinion became fixed, that the deposits would not be restored, those who had money to invest, however small the sum, looked to the banks of Virginia as the best investment they could make. It was perfectly well known to every man in the whole country, that it was the removal of the deposits which had shaken all public confidence. That cause had been going on from that hour to the present. All felt a difficulty in investing their money so as to yield six per cent., and the banks of Virginia stood without a rival. With regard to tobacco, the state of things was this: The crop of 1832 was sold previous to October, 1833, and the crop of 1833 would be sold between this time and October next. The custom was, that the crop of each year was taken into the market in the fall of the succeeding year. By the time the crop of 1832 came into the market, the deposits had been removed, and the exchange on England had fallen below legal par. The city of Richmond had to draw for £200,000, equal to $1,000,000 of our money. This could not be obtained. And he would ask whether the withdrawal of such a capital would not make a difference in the market?

He had nothing to say in defence of the State of Virginia, at the present time, further than to say that he rejoiced at the prosperity of all her citizens. They were content with the good which they enjoyed, and did not envy others. He meant nothing but respect to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BROWN asked whether the gentleman had said respect or disrespect.

Mr. LEIGII replied that the word which he had uttered was respect. He had no other feelings towards the honorable gentleman than respect; and if any thing had fallen from him which the Senator looked upon as personal, he assured him he meant no such thing.

Mr. BROWN said, whether his statements were palatable to the honorable gentleman from Virginia or not, he did not know or care. His opinions were his own, founded independently, founded as independently as those of the honorable Senator from Virginia, and he claimed the same right to express them here or elsewhere, as that gentleman. He had generally endeavored to observe decorum, and would do so, but he would also endeavor to defend himself.

In relation to the tobacco trade, on which the honorable gentleman from Virginia had spoken with great judgment, he happened to have a letter from a respectable individual, stating that a sale of tobacco had recently taken place at $7½ per cwt. It was the usual opinion of the country that if an average of $6 were obtained, the growers were well remunerated. He would take occasion to say, that if the honorable gentleman's constituents were as his, and sold their tobacco at $6, he would venture to say that they would never complain, but declare themselves to be in a prosperous condition.

The memorial was then read.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that the memorial which had just been read came strongly recommended to him, by the circumstances of its containing great force in its expressions, whilst it was couched in respectful language. It came from Virginia, and a portion of those who signed it lived in the spot where he had first seen the light. There was nothing in it calculated to excite any feelings in the minds of either side of the House. No doubt the signers of the memorial had expressed their own conviction. They asked for the restoration of the deposits. In this particular he differed in opinion from the memorialists. An honorable gentleman had said that he perceived a change in the language which was used upon the floor. So far as that assertion concerned himself, he denied the charge. He still held the same language.

An honorable Senator across the way had told the Senate that the deposits were of no consequence to the bank; and yet it was said that the only way to relieve the distress of the country, and to satisfy the people, was to let them understand that the bank was to be continued. If the deposits were to be restored to-morrow, without the hope that the bank would be re-chartered, things would remain as they are. The bank could do no more for the relief of the country than it did now. It must wind up its accounts, and it could not do so without continuing the pressure. His honorable friend from Virginia, and others, seemed to be bound to their former prejudices and predilections, and look to the restoration of the deposits and the re-charter of the bank as the same question. No one could look at the questions but as identical. The relief which was sought for could only be given by a re-charter. An honorable Senator had taken upon himself to deny what he (Mr. F.) had stated as a fact, that acts of a similar nature had been performed by natives of Virginia, and that no disapprobating notice was taken of the action; and that the present President, not being a native of Virginia, was, consequently, condemned by the natives of Virginia. He asked, were not the deposits removed by Mr. Gallatin? Virginia did not complain. And he would ask if the voice of complaint was heard against the use which was made of power by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Crawford? Were they arraigned for the exercise of it? And what was the reason which was now ascribed for the removal of the deposits? To sustain tottering banks. Who had come forward and accused the President of making an improper use of the public funds? No man. The charge that was made against him was not that he had misused the public money, but removed it from the bank without giving his reasons to Congress. The report of the committee acquitted him of making any misuse of the money; and it never entered into their imagination that the act which was now designated a usurpation of power, was an act violating the letter of the law.

An honorable Senator had said that he was surprised to hear an accusation against Virginia by one of her native sons. He (Mr. F.) made none. He had referred to a fact to establish his opinion with respect to the course which she had adopted and would pursue. He repeated, if she would pursue the course which was pointed out for her, she would incur the repudiation of her own native sons.

The honorable Senator inquired "whether it would be thought dishonorable for the President to retrace his steps—whether it would be dishonorable to retract, after having committed an error?" No! it would not be dishonorable, either on the part of a high officer or a private man. Those who knew nothing of their own standing in the community might think it so; but an honest and courageous man would only prove his character by retracing his steps when convinced he had acted improperly. What, though, would be the character of him who should retract without believing that the course he was pursuing was an erroneous one? Could any one doubt the opinion of the President? Did any one doubt that the President still thought the steps he had taken were necessary for the salvation of the people's liberties? No one could doubt upon this subject. And this being the case, the President's opinions still remaining unchanged, would he not damn himself to everlasting infamy if he were now to retract? The Senator from Virginia had said much about the conduct of the native sons of his own State. He (Mr. F.) had not been guilty of the conduct which had been ascribed to him. He would conclude by moving that the memorial be printed, and hoped that this vexed question would be put at rest.

Mr. WEBSTER rose only to notice two or three remarks in which he felt himself to be concerned. He was not aware that any such remark had fallen from him as that the removal of the deposits was a matter of little importance. He had often said that it was a question, in his opinion, of so much interest, that if the bank had but one day more to live, this question of the withdrawal of the people's money was one upon which Congress was bound to pass its solemn judgment. At the same time he had said that, for a restoration of the former sound state of the currency and a renewal of prosperity, other measures besides a restoration of the deposits would be found necessary. He did not mean to make any remarks with respect to precedents, or upon the former interference of Mr. Crawford with the public funds. It was said on one hand that most of the measures of Mr. Crawford were adopted, not under the power granted by the 16th section of the bank charter, but under the resolutions of the 30th April, by which it was made his duty to take measures for the restoration of the currency. It was said, on the other hand, that he acted under the authority of the 16th section.

He (Mr. W.) did not mean to say any thing upon this matter—not even upon the inconclusiveness of the parallel between drawing small sums from the bank and removing the whole of the deposits at "one fell swoop;" but as the Senator from Georgia had alluded to the proceedings of the other House, he would ask the Senator's perusal of a report which emanated from a committee of that House relative to this subject. He (Mr. W.) was a member of that committee; he had not read the report lately, but could say, that if the Senator from Georgia had perused it, he would have found that the committee clearly expressed their opinion, that a withdrawal of the public money from its proper place of deposit, for the purpose of aiding other banks, was a use not authorized by law. The only case in which a different opinion had been expressed, was of a different nature, and wholly unconnected with the present question, viz. the right of the Secretary to sustain banks.

Mr. EWING was surprised to hear the Senator from Georgia refer to the acts of Mr. Gallatin, as an excuse for the present Secretary of the Treasury, and as a reason for condemning the politicians of Virginia. The cases were not at all parallel. When did Mr. Gallatin withdraw the public money? Not till seven days after the bank charter had expired. The charter of the old bank expired in February, 1811, and a few days before Mr. Gallatin wrote letters for the purpose of forming contracts with other banks for the reception of the public money. Did Mr. Gallatin withdraw the money till the charter had expired? Directions were given that the deposits should cease to be made, but they were not withdrawn till some time after the charter had terminated. There was no parallel in the cases, and the charge of inconsistency against the politicians of Virginia fell to the ground. But it was said that Mr. Crawford removed the money and placed it in the State banks; that Mr. Crawford was Secretary in the time of Mr. Monroe, and Mr. Monroe had never been charged with usurpation of power in directing Mr. Crawford to remove the deposits contrary to law. There was no similarity between that case and the present. Did Mr. Monroe direct Mr. Crawford to remove the deposits, and when that gentleman refused, did Mr. Monroe dismiss him from the office and appoint to that office a more pliant individual? No! Mr. Monroe had never done this.

Mr. PRESTON said he objected to the authority of precedents, to vindicate the usurpation of power, or justify the violation of law. Men in power are always able to find in history, even of the best times, something that may seem to countenance the worst acts, and even in our own short history, some precedent, real or apparent, can be found for almost every exercise of power which the most unrestrained ambition may desire—power that has been boldly usurped; power that necessity may appear to have conferred; power that has been used beneficially, and therefore without remark or censure; power which, from the peculiarity of the occasion of its exercise, has not attracted the attention of the legislature or the public. By a judicious selection of such cases, or a forced application of others, some show of palliation, certainly no substantial vindication, can be afforded for an illegal act; for after all, the administration could only say to those who defend it on such grounds:

"Go on, obliging creatures, let me see
All that disgraced my betters met in me!"

But, what are the precedents relied upon, to vindicate the President in the seizure of the public money? That having the sanction of Mr. Gallatin's name, has been disposed of by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. EWING,] but the authority of Mr. Crawford is more confidently quoted. How little weight the precedent of his transfer of a portion of the deposits from the United States Bank to the State banks is entitled to, will at once appear from the fact that, so little had he considered the legal qualities of the transaction, that he actually forgot to report to Congress the reasons of his removal of the deposits; and afterwards, when an inquiry was instituted by Congress, he expressly acknowledged that he had inadvertently omitted to make the report required by the 16th section of the bank charter. Thus, the precedent established by Mr. Crawford's authority, not only covers the removal of the deposits, but would have equally justified the present Secretary in forgetting to report the fact to Congress. The notorious truth is, said Mr. P., that during Mr. Crawford's most difficult administration of the finances, between the years 1818 and 1819, he had continually present, and pressing upon his mind, the leading purpose for which the bank was established—the regulation of the currency of the country. It was in a state of utter and most disastrous confusion. The country was inundated by a flood of depreciated and fluctuating State bank paper; and these institutions, of whose notes a large portion of the property of the country and the revenue of the Government consisted, were tottering, struggling, and falling, in every direction. The Government, the people, and the United States Bank, were all deeply interested in restoring them, and preserving the currency from its derangement. Mr. Crawford's act was intended to meet the emergency—all parties admitted that it was politic, no party complained of its violated rights. The United States Bank—the State banks—the people—all acquiesced, and thus the question of power was not fairly raised, or distinctly brought to the consideration of the Secretary. No antagonist interests were involved. The bank and the Secretary concurred; and if the precedent is worth any thing, it proves that the bank and the Secretary may combine to lend the public money to whomsoever they please. The acquiescence of the bank could not confer a power on the Secretary, but it might and did prevent an examination into the question whether such a power actually existed, and permitted the conduct of the Secretary to pass by default. What the bank and the Secretary at that time concurred in doing, is now done against the will of the bank and in derogation of its interests. What then was done, in a deranged state of the currency, to restore or sustain it, is now done in a sound state of the currency, with an obvious tendency to disturb its wholesome condition. What was then done to secure the safety of the public funds, by sustaining those institutions upon whose solvency the currency of the United States Bank itself in a great measure depended, is now done without pretence of reference to the safety either of the public funds, the United States Bank, or the State banks; but, on the contrary, all are involved in one common danger, and from the danger thus superinduced by the Executive, new and extraordinary powers are claimed to meet and provide against it. Mr. Crawford changed the deposits because the State banks were in danger. The President makes the danger, and changes the deposits to meet it.

The Senator from Georgia, [Mr. FORSTER,] said Mr. P., has asserted that the restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, is a matter of but little importance towards relieving the distresses of the country. Mr. P. said he could by no means concur in this opinion. He would readily admit that, as the mere abstraction, in the ordinary course of business, of the Government money from the United States Bank, would have been insufficient to cause this general distress, so the mere fact of the supply of so much money to the bank would not relieve that distress. But neither question is presented in this naked form. What is the evil complained of, and whence comes the distress which all parties now acknowledge? Unfortunately for the country, we exist in the midst of a system of credit pushed to a most dangerous extent. Credit is proverbially sensitive; but that which exists in our country is morbidly so, from its diseased extension. The slightest agitation of the system produces calamities of overwhelming magnitude. The whole vast system is based upon and lives by public confidence—confidence in the good faith of Government—confidence in the supremacy of the laws—confidence in the integrity of the Government departments and agents. This confidence has been shaken, and the whole vast and disproportioned edifice is rocking in all its parts. Re-establish confidence; bring back the laws; rebuke the rash act of the President; show the people that there is a power which will stand between the oppressor and his victim, and all will again be still and quiet. Confidence, which is banished from men's minds, will return, and a period of calm will come, of which Congress may avail itself to look into and repair the defects of the system. Mr. P. stated, that he believed from the bottom of his soul, that if the two-thirds of both Houses which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. KING] supposed to have been originally in favor of the restoration of the deposits, had effected that measure, that the prostration of credit, the pressure upon the money market, the fall of property, the universal anxiety and distress, would long ago have passed off, and in their stead we should have had that unrivalled prosperity which existed through the country when the President ventured upon those ill-fated measures. He would go farther, and declare it to be his deepest conviction, that if the President would now permit Congress to adopt this measure, or if Congress, yielding party to patriotism, would vindicate the laws and redeem the public faith, there would be an immediate return of prosperity; public confidence would be re-invigorated, the public mind would repose with renewed security upon the strength of the laws; it would be seen that there was a conservative and protective power between the great interests of society and the will or the passions of one man. Some gentlemen suppose that the suffering is produced by the bank for nefarious purposes! Take away its pretext, give it no pretence to lay the ruin which it causes at the door of the President, and if the restoration of these deposits is so small a matter, either for good or evil, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. FORSTER] supposes—why not grant this small matter to the prayers and entreaties of this suffering people? That they are a suffering people, all parties now admit. We may differ as to the cause or as to the extent, but we all concur in the existence of distress. Why not then yield this small matter, even to the ignorance of the people, for all who tell us of their distress, crave this small matter for their relief? Give it to them, and tell them, if you please, to go to the bank. If, after you have granted them the relief they pray from you, the distress still continues, and is ascertained to be either an accident or incident to the bank, it will be called to a fearful reckoning.

The Senator from Georgia, in reply to the remark of an honorable Senator, took occasion to say, that, however proper it would be for the President to retrace his steps, if he had acted erroneously, yet, as long as he believed himself right, it would be dishonorable to retract. Whether the President believes himself right, Mr. P. said he would not undertake to decide, but he knew the opinions of the Senator from Georgia upon this measure. He was against it. No gentleman on this floor had declared that he would have advised or assisted in the execution of such a measure. From the remarks of some, it may be inferred that, if they had been called upon, they would have advised the President to the course which he has adopted; but neither of the gentlemen from Georgia leave room for inference. They declare their disapprobation of the measure, while one of them strenuously resists all measures to counteract it, and defends the course of the President, although he would not have advised it. Still, however, notwithstanding the Senator's relation towards the administration, and the just weight which he is entitled to have with it, there is a possibility that the President may continue to think himself right. Admit that he does: Would it be dishonorable for him to retract, urged as he is by the prayers, the remonstrances, the sufferings of the people? Mr. Jefferson gave up a favorite policy, the restrictive system, in compliance with the discontents of the people, and of but a portion of the people of a particular section. Mr. Jefferson yielded, although he was sustained by his cabinet, by both branches of the legislature, and by a triumphant party amongst the people. His were the measures of the Government and the people. Whose measure is this? Not the measure of the administration. Where are the counsellors that have advised the President? Where are they to be found? It is not for me, said Mr. P., to look into the recesses of the white house, but the question recurs, Who constitutes the administration that adopted this measure? The Secretary of the Treasury revolted from the perpetration of the act, and the President was compelled to search for another agent. Did the other great cabinet officers advise or sustain him? Mr. P. said he would be glad to see the documents furnished by those officers on that occasion, which have been spoken of by Mr. Duane. It was not an administration measure, but a measure of the President's own—a personal measure, adopted and executed without the consent of his constitutional advisers, and against the opinion of the very gentlemen who defend him here. Nor is the President sustained, as Mr. Jefferson was, by the co-operation of Congress. This measure was adopted in contempt of a decision of the House of Representatives, and with the avowed intention of superseding Congress by Executive action. Nor is the President sustained by any known political party in the country. Bank men upon this floor defend the measure, and anti-bank men oppose it. Indeed, said Mr. P., it would be difficult to ascertain, in regard to this or any other measure of the President, on what set of principles known in our political history, his policy is founded. In the better days of this republic, we were divided into parties, acting upon broad principles of public policy, each struggling for the maintenance of its own peculiar opinions—but on what principles, on what system of policy, on what set of opinions, does this administration pretend to act, or demand the support of its adherents? What, sir, have been the leading, the characteristic measures of this administration? The first is, the great measure of the last session: when the President, in a peculiar juncture of affairs, instituted a course of measures which could find their justification only in the entire subversion of those rights of the States for which the republican party had always contended. In a formal and elaborate document, issued with great deliberation, and sanctioned by the great seal of this Government, he directly, and in terms, controverted all the doctrines of the republican party, as to the origin and nature of our institutions—declared our form of Government to be national and not federative—that it was not a union of States, but a consolidation—and claimed the right of enforcing submission upon a State by the bayonets of his standing army. Where did he find his supporters, then? Who, then, was the administration party? On whom did the President rely to vindicate, enforce, and carry out his principles? Sir, he found a natural alliance in the ranks of the old federal party, the most distinguished member of which, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WENDELL], who was born, and nurtured, and has lived in that party, found himself strangely and unexpectedly the leading member in support of the administration of General Jackson. Then, the President reposed upon Massachusetts and her doctrines. To be sure he was not without the support, on that occasion, or any other, of some Southern gentlemen, but the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] was not one of them. He deserves and has my gratitude, said Mr. P., for the manly and republican stand which he took against the President on that occasion—an occasion which showed that, upon all the great, leading, fundamental principles of our Government, General Jackson concurred entirely with the old federal party, proclaimed to the world as his, their doctrines, procured them to be inscribed upon your statute book, and was willing to record them in the blood of his fellow-citizens.

And now, sir, said Mr. P., as to the leading measure of the present session. Is there any broad principle by which gentlemen pretend to regulate their support of the President? Who are his most zealous supporters in this measure? Bank men. Who his most talented and trusted vindicators? Bank men. To whom is the President indebted for that ever-ready and ever-brilliant attack and defence with which this measure is defended here? A bank man. While, on the other hand, the measure is denounced by gentlemen here, and by States, known to be anti-bank. Sir, said Mr. P., the President's cabinet was opposed to the measure, and he retains that cabinet. His friends on this floor are opposed to the measure, and continue to be his friends. What is the bond of party union, that produces these strange results? Sir, said Mr. P., it is a Jackson party—with no consequence, continuity, or conformity of principle—nothing but Jackson—the man, the individual.

Gentlemen, said Mr. P., may retort upon him, that, if the President's party is of this pie-bald character, the opposition, too, is ring-streaked and speckled. It is in the nature of opposition to be multifarious. Considering the course of the President, it is only wonderful, that all parties, of whatever character, are not in the opposition. He has successively adopted and attacked all parties, and in the very measure under discussion, has excited the alarm and indignation of the South, by the violation of law—while he has prostrated the prosperity of the North, and spread desolation through it. Those, said Mr. P., who defend the President, take infinite pains to exaggerate the power and influence of the bank, which they represent as most dangerous to our institutions; although they assert, at the same moment, that all hopes or expectation of its re-charter were cut off by the veto of the President. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. KING] states expressly, that the bank had received its death-wound by the veto, and represents it as a lion languishing in his lair, about to expire, from the fatal blow inflicted by the Executive. The Senator, said Mr. P., has expressed the sentiment which pervaded the whole South, and as far as he knew, the whole country. Every body supposed that the monster was drawing near the close of its existence—that he had lain down to die. The fiat for his dissolution had gone forth, and he seemed quietly and sullenly composing his limbs in death. At that moment the hunter, keen for sport or impatient for revenge, hurls his dart and rushes upon the dying beast, winding his horn, calling up his huntsmen, and unkenning his pack; the ebbing energies of the lion are aroused to a new effort of flight, and if in the chase, our corn-fields are trampled upon and our flocks scattered, shall we blame the beast, or his pursuers, who would not permit him to die? It may be sport to the mighty hunter, but it is desolation to the country through which the chase sweeps. But, said Mr. P., the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BROWN] supposes that the vigor with which the bank maintains its contest is a proof that it is endowed with a strength dangerous to our institutions; he thinks that its power to maintain this long and doubtful contest with so powerful a President, indicates a capacity for evil which threatens the very existence of our institutions. Mr. P. thought this a fallacious method of estimating the power of the bank. It was not the bank power that was sustaining this contest; it was the yet remaining vigor of the law, it was the yet not extinguished spirit of our institutions. As well might the gentleman suppose that the power which expelled the kings, resided in the dead body of the Roman matron. As well might he denounce the dangerous power of an English gentleman because the nation rallied around John Hampden against the king and his minions. It is not the power of the bank, it is the violation of law, that makes the struggle.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] thinks that the opposition rejoice in the occasion for making war upon the administration. Mr. P. said, he did not wish to conceal his opinion that this administration was characterized by misrule, was ruining the country, and ought to be put down. He did not rejoice in the act, the consequences of which are so deplorable, but if one of those consequences should be to open the eyes of the people and rouse their indignation against the author of their calamities, that consequence would be a good one. It could not be charged upon him that he regarded with complacency the commission of crime, because he rejoiced at the prospect of apprehending the felon. But as earnestly as he deprecated the conduct and principles of this administration, as earnestly as he desired to see it checked and controlled by some rule of reason or obligation of law, he would not have purchased its defeat at the great sacrifices to which the country has been subjected by this misrule of the President. That a degree of party spirit is necessarily infused into most of our actions here, no one can deny; but (Mr. P. said) he could not concur with the gentleman from Georgia that this was merely a party matter; a question between the ins and the outs. Those may well think so, who at once disapprove the measure and vindicate it. If it be a party contest, it is a lamentable condition of our country, when its currency and monetary system are made mere appendages of party strife; and those who have brought them into this situation have assumed a deep and dangerous responsibility. Let me tell you, Mr. President, (said Mr. P.,) that if the people of this country are assured that the seizure of the public money, or the defence of it on this floor, is a mere matter of party arrangement, the days of your power are numbered.

Mr. FORSYTH said: The gentleman from South Carolina, in allusion to what he had said yesterday, when he made an allusion to the gentlemen on his side rejoicing in the effects of the action of the President being felt by the country. There was a circumstance in history of a very illustrious man, General Marion, who, seeing every body acquiesce in what was stipulated by Great Britain, retired in disgust. Strong measures were immediately resorted to by the British officers, and news was carried to Marion of the excesses committed by the British soldiery, and he thanked God that they were suffering. He did not rejoice that the people suffered, but he rejoiced because he saw that, by their sufferings, resistance would be aroused. He produced this instance, because he thought that they would rejoice that the people suffered, on account of the result which those sufferings might produce.

Yes, sir, and their rejoicing would be justifiable: the people of the United States would rejoice with them, if this were a question of usurpation of power. When gentlemen, sir, can make the people believe that power has been usurped, their end will be accomplished; power will change hands; for whose benefit among the "ring-streaked and speckled" I am unable to say. But the honorable Senator, sir, protests against the quoting of precedents to justify a violation of the law. He does right, sir. But he avers that there has been a violation of the law, whilst I maintain that such has not been the case. This precedent is to my mind conclusive. The honorable Senator says that Mr. Crawford forgot his duty—that this act was of so little importance that it passed unnoticed by the people. The question of the power to remove, sir, was not then a disputed point; it was never mooted. And why? Because there was no doubt of the existence of this power. What did Mr. Gallatin? He changed the place of deposit without being accused of having violated the law: he did so without question or reproach. And in the case of Mr. Crawford, he (Mr. F.) would ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether a doubt had ever entered the minds of that committee of the other House which had been alluded to, as to the power of the Secretary to remove the public money? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts had spoken of some remark of that committee as deprecatory of the practice of sustaining banks with the depositors; if the report of the committee did make a remark of this kind, he (Mr. F.) had no recollection of it. The Senator from South Carolina had said that the conduct of Mr. Crawford might be taken as a precedent, because that gentleman's proceedings had been directed exclusively to a restoration of the currency. The honorable Senator was mistaken. Mr. Crawford made use of his power to sustain the banks, from the year 1817 till the close of the period of his service. He made use of his power on many occasions to support the banks. He deposited thirteen millions of dollars for this purpose with the Bank of Georgia. The Senator from South Carolina had also said there was no violation of the law, because there had been no violation of the chartered rights of the old bank; that that bank, having consented to the act of Mr. Crawford, Mr. Crawford's act was legal. Was the honorable Senator aware of the principle he admitted when he spoke thus? Was the power of the Secretary to depend upon the consent of the bank to its exercise? Could that consent give the Secretary a power not contained in the constitution, or take from him a power granted by the constitution? The consent of the bank! It had no right to give consent. The very fact of its being brought into counsel, proved its dangerous tendency. It was a mere agent, the mere depository of the public money, and had no power either to increase or diminish that of the Secretary.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina had said much about the condition of parties, on both sides of the question. Well, according to one of the honorable Senator's arguments, this appeared to him (Mr. F.) to be what the honorable Senator wanted. He had commenced with regretting that they were not divided upon some great party principles. It was impossible not to see that every question must eventually become a party question; that it would be assailed in the spirit of party, and defended in a similar manner. And what harm was there in this? Party spirit did not make them less industrious in the examination of the various subjects that might come before them. It had one effect: it made the people more suspicious, and more scrupulous in receiving the arguments of both parties. The people understood the case well; and when Senators admitted the influence of party feeling, the people would examine accordingly. But who had made this a party question? The restoration of the deposits per se was of no consequence. Why was it made a party question? The honorable Senator from South Carolina had told them that the fragments of parties had seized upon this matter, to convince the people that power was in the wrong hands. And would the honorable Senator tell him (Mr. F.) that a restoration would still the storm? Yes, it would do so; but it would be because those who had no power now, would feel their hopes revive, would believe that power was within their grasp. But how would it be with the money market? The bank would eventually be obliged to wind up its concerns; it must go on, as now, curtailing, and the country must, in the end, bear a curtailment. The manner in which this curtailment would be effected, depended, however, on the bank. If it was carried on upon patriotic principles, every indulgence would be afforded; but if the struggle went on against the Government, and for the perpetuity of the charter, then there was no part of the United States which could be reached by this power, which would not be made to feel its influence. It could not, however, do much more. It dared not go farther, lest it should endanger its own stockholders. It had already gone far enough to shake the prosperity of its debtors; but if it went any farther, it would shake its own credit, and involve itself in a state of things from which the hand of the Government alone could extricate it.

The Senator from South Carolina had fixed upon two important measures, by which the administration was to be tried by the people. As far as regarded the fate of the bank, the people had already decided. The hostility of the President to the bank was well known. The question was put to the people, and decided by them in favor of the President. A new question was now made, as to the President's motives. Upon this subject, he (Mr. F.) would have thought no one could have doubted. Well, the question was before the people, and the efforts of gentlemen to throw light upon the subject were doubtless proper. One thing was certain, however, and that was, that the Jackson party had another name, viz. the party of the people of the United States. Why, what would have been the condition of the man in the white house, if he had not been supported by the people? Gentlemen talked of the influence of the patronage of the Executive upon Congress. In Congress! The President was powerless there. Had his re-election by the people given him power on the floor of the Senate? How stood it with the representatives of the sovereigns? The representatives of the sovereigns—of the sovereign people—regulated the administration as they pleased. But there was a power behind the Senate which would alter this—a response would be heard that would change this state of things.

Mr. EWING said he did not contend, that although the Secretary had acted improperly in the present case, he was destitute of all power. He did not say that the Secretary had no right to collect the revenue and place it in a particular bank. On the contrary, he believed the Secretary had this power. What was the power exercised by Mr. Gallatin? Nothing more than this: that when the charter of the old bank had terminated, he placed the money elsewhere. That was all Mr. Gallatin had done; and in doing this, he had done no more than his duty. But did it follow, because Mr. Gallatin had acted thus, that the present Secretary was to change the place of deposit without the slightest reason, and without authority? or was the President to be permitted to reach through the Secretary and remove the money? The precedent was inapplicable.

The motion to refer and print the memorial was then carried.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, the Senate then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 14.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the proceedings of a meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Brooklyn, New York, on the subject of the Bank of the United States, and the removal of the public deposits therefrom; and, also a memorial on the same subject from the same town; which he asked to be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

Mr. W. had nothing to say in reference to these proceedings and memorial, further than that he had no doubt but the memorialists were equally as respectable as those of the same town, whose memorial was presented yesterday. They expressed, however, different views. These memorialists highly approve of the course pursued by the administration in removing the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and express the opinion that a national bank is unconstitutional. Mr. W. then moved that the proceedings and memorial be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was carried.

VERMONT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. PRENTISS rose and said, that he had received the resolutions of a convention holden in the county of Windsor, in Vermont, which he asked leave to lay before the Senate. The resolutions, said Mr. P., relate to the subject which has attracted so much attention, and occasioned so much discussion here, and which seems to be exciting general and intense interest throughout the country. The resolutions express decided disapprobation of the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. They declare the removal to have been ordered and effected without sufficient cause, in violation of the contract between the Government and the bank, and that the measure has produced unparalleled pecuniary embarrassment, which can be removed only by a prompt restoration of the deposits. The resolutions also assert the importance and necessity of a sound currency, and that such a currency can be secured and preserved to the country only through the medium of a national bank. The convention was composed of delegates from the several towns in the county, representing all classes and ranks of men in the various professions, occupations, and employments in life. Though the names of the delegates are not given, so as to enable me to speak of them as they might deserve, the names of the gentlemen who acted as officers of the convention are attached to the proceedings, and to their intelligence and personal worth I can bear willing testimony. With the gentleman who presided as chairman I have been long and intimately acquainted. Though formerly member of the other House of Congress, he has for many years taken no active part in politics, but has chosen rather to devote himself to the pursuit of honorable professions, in which he has attained to a deservedly high eminence. From his character, and that of the other officers, as well as from the temperate and respectful tone of the resolutions, we have sufficient assurance of the respectability and patriotic purposes of the convention. I take the occasion to say, sir, that the county in which the resolutions were adopted, is one of the largest and most respectable in the State, in territory, population, business, and wealth. The population consists principally of industrious, enterprising, and intelligent farmers, who, in addition to their other interests, are generally, and some of them largely, engaged in the growing of wool, an article which has usually commanded a good price, and been a source of much profit to them. The country, however, is not behind any other in the State in the variety and extent of its other business. The advantages and facilities afforded by the numerous streams running through it, have invited and induced the investment of much capital in manufactures; and, from its extensive agricultural, mercantile, manufacturing, and mechanic interests, it must suffer great losses and sacrifices, unless some remedy is provided against the existing embarrassments upon business.

Mr. P. then moved that the resolutions be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was adopted.

PHILADELPHIA MEMORIAL.

Mr. McKEAN presented the proceedings of a large meeting held in the city and county of Philadelphia, on the fourth of the present month. In presenting these proceedings—

SENATE.]

Philadelphia Memorial.—Public Distress.—York County (Pa.) Memorial. [MARCH 17, 1834.]

Mr. M'K. said, that, since he entered the Capitol this morning, he had received the proceedings of a very large meeting of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, which took place in Independence Square, on the 4th of March instant, to take into consideration the existing topics of the day. These proceedings sustained in decided terms the action of the Executive Government, in reference to the removal of the public deposits, and attribute the present panic and distress mainly to a false monetary system; and if we will abide the pressure with manly resistance, and a determination to learn wisdom from experience, and reform the evils which have caused it, much good may proceed from some evil. These proceedings also approve of General Jackson's veto of the land bill, and speak in terms of unqualified approbation of the recent message of the Governor of Pennsylvania in reference to the finances of that commonwealth. They are opposed to re-chartering the Bank of the United States, and they also approve of a national convention for the nomination of national officers, as the only practicable mode of uniting the strength and ensuring the triumph of democracy in the Union. Mr. M'K. said he would embrace the present opportunity to bear testimony to the high character and respectability of this meeting, and if, as has been held here, it adds to its importance to be without distinction of political parties, this is especially entitled to weight; for, among the most prominent actors, he recognised some [Messrs. Ingersoll and Rush] who were dismissed from office by the present administration, and who had been conspicuous in the opposition, but yielded their support in this time of need. He also wished to say, that he concurred generally in the sentiments expressed by this meeting, on those matters proper for the consideration of the Senate, and fit for legislation. At the same time, he did not yield his assent to that portion which was more political in its nature. To use a popular and oft-repeated phrase, he would say, that in reference to a national convention, he differed from his respectable constituents to lo coelo.

Mr. M'K. moved that the proceedings be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. M'K. then said, he had also other documents to present. He had received, and had been especially requested to lay before the Senate, the proceedings of three separate township meetings, held at different periods, in Perry county, Pennsylvania: one in Rye township, one in Wheatfield, and one in Buffalo. These proceedings were of a different character from those he had just presented from Philadelphia: they all express decided disapprobation of the recent acts of the Federal Executive in removing the public deposits, and ask for their restoration, and are in favor of the United States Bank. They, too, sir, have gone somewhat into politics. I regret this; but they are not without some illustrious examples which have been exhibited on this floor. They condemn the interference of a legislative caucus, and are opposed to the project of a national convention to nominate a President and Vice President—they go further, and designate the individual of their choice, [Hon. John McLean, of Ohio.] Here, sir, I meet with another difficulty: whilst I cannot subscribe to all the opinions expressed at those meetings, on those subjects proper for legislative action, I concur in opinion with them in reference to a national convention.

Mr. M'K. then moved that the resolutions be read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed; which motion was agreed to.

The Senate next proceeded to the special order of the day, being the report of the Committee on Finance, and Mr. CLAY's resolutions on the

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITES.

Mr. TALLMADGE then rose, and concluded his speech, sustaining the reasons of the Secretary, as given entire in preceding pages. The Senate then adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, MARCH 17.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted certain resolutions adopted by the people of Shenandoah county, Virginia; which, being read—

Mr. TYLER rose and said, that he had risen to move that the resolutions be printed, and referred to the Committee on Finance. He also felt himself called upon to say that the representatives of Virginia on this floor were ready and willing at all times to bring to the knowledge of this body the sentiments and feelings of any portion of their constituents, whether such sentiments and feelings were approbatory or otherwise of their political course. He would further add, that he would, with all becoming promptitude, have discharged that duty upon the present occasion, had he been requested to do so. The resolutions did not come upon him unadvisedly, although he must say that to the Presiding Officer of this body he was under no indebtedness for information in relation to them. He had obtained that information from another quarter. Towards the people of Shenandoah he was incapable of any other feeling than that of the highest respect. Their past history entitled them to all consideration. Before the Revolution they were Whigs—during the Revolution they were Whigs—in the contest which brought Mr. Jefferson into power they were Whigs—and they have continued in the same faith, so far as I am advised, to the present day. One fact in their history proves, in some degree, the attachment of the foregone generation of men to the principles which gave rise to the Revolution. Their county bore the name of the last royal Governor of Virginia, Dunmore, who had rendered himself particularly obnoxious, by having seized upon the materials prepared by the House of Burgesses for the defence of the colony, and disposed of them according to his own will and pleasure. They were not willing that the name of one who had acted the part of Lord Dunmore, should be that of their county, and procured its change to that which it now bears, after the noble river which washes its fertile soil. To differ with such a people is certainly painful to me, particularly on the great question which now agitates the country. He concurred with them in much that they had expressed. Like them, he was opposed to the Bank of the United States on high constitutional grounds, and should vote against the renewal of the charter for a day as well as for any other time. But when the question was, whether he should ratify high executive assumptions of power, thereby bloating with power the Presidential office, he could have, as an American citizen, but one answer. And he felt assured that, did the citizens of the republican county of Shenandoah regard the question in the same light with himself, or possess the advantages of the situation which he occupied, and which enabled him to see the whole ground, there would not be that difference of opinion between them which now, unhappily for himself, existed. With such pleasure as became him, he moved the printing and reference of the resolutions.

The motion was agreed to.

YORK COUNTY (PA.) MEMORIAL.

The CHAIR communicated a paper containing the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of citizens of York county, Pennsylvania, friends of the administration, in favor of the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, and against the re-charter of that institution; and, it having been read—

MARCH 17, 1834.]

York County (Pa.) Memorial.

[SENATE.]

Mr. WILKINS moved that it be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

Mr. WEBSTER said: The authors of these proceedings set out with an excellent maxim. Truth, they say, sir, is mighty, and will prevail. Their own case shall verify their own doctrine.

I have been requested to pay some attention to these resolutions, when they should come before the Senate, by those who think that the resolutions misrepresent the sentiments, not only of the people of the county and borough of York, but of the very meeting at which they purport to have been passed, and who are unwilling that a great and respectable county should suffer the imputation of putting forth such puerilities.

In the first place, sir, said Mr. W., here is a protest, signed by more than fifty gentlemen, who were present at the meeting, and some of whom, I believe, are very well known to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McKean,] to be persons of the highest respectability. The honorable gentleman, no doubt, knows Mr. McIlvaine, late a Senator of Pennsylvania, Mr. Lowmaster, Colonel Connelley, and other gentlemen whose names are on this protest.

And now, sir, this protest declares—

1. That these resolutions, instead of being passed unanimously, were rejected by the meeting by a vote of at least three to one.

2. That the assertions contained in these resolutions are unfounded, and without a single fact to sustain them.

3. That the resolutions do not express the sentiments of the people of the county of York, any more than they express the sentiments of the citizens assembled at the meeting.

I will ask, sir, that the protest be read, and that it be printed and referred with the resolutions.

I have a letter on the same subject, sir, an extract from which I desire may be read and printed. It is from a responsible source.

If these resolutions are a specimen of what may be expected to be laid before the Senate, as proofs of popular opinion, in favor of the removing of the deposits, it will well become the Senate to examine all such proofs with some care.

I have another letter, which I will not ask to have read or printed; but which concludes with a remark which I will quote to the Senate. It is, that there are administration men enough who have changed, to revolutionize the State, if they will stay changed.

I agree, sir, that truth is mighty, and will prevail; and I rejoice, sir, that, on this occasion, the triumph of truth has been so easily achieved. If all other misrepresentations could be as readily corrected, the prosperity of the country would be soon restored.

Mr. McKean called for the reading of the names attached to the resolutions; and they were read accordingly.*

* Messrs. GALES & SEATON: As the notices taken by the papers of this morning of the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday, in reference to the matter expunged by my colleague (Mr. WILKINS) from the proceedings of a public meeting recently held at York, Pennsylvania, which was supposed to reflect unjustly upon the character of a member of the Senate (Mr. WEBSTER) are calculated to lead to misconceptions as to myself, and, considering my relation to that matter a peculiar one, I have to ask that you will publish in the next Intelligencer the following, as the substance of a few remarks made by me during the desultory debate on that question.

On being referred to by Mr. WEBSTER, as to the character of the gentlemen who had signed the protest, I stated that I knew but few of them, and but few of those who were concerned in the meeting. So far as I had the pleasure of an acquaintance with the gentlemen on both sides, they were respectable; that in this case, however, I had not been honored with the confidence of either party; no one had written a syllable

Mr. POINDEXTER rose, and objected to the motion of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania. He regretted, at any time, to be compelled, from a sense of duty, to urge objections against the reception and reference of petitions and memorials, or any other papers, which might be addressed by a portion of the American people to the Senate. But, said he, however painful the performance of such a duty may be, I feel bound to state, that, in my judgment, the proceedings of the meeting of a part of the citizens of York, presented to the Senate this morning by the Chair, contain expressions so very indecent and offensive throughout, that they are not entitled to the consideration which the constitution secures to petitions for redress of grievances, or the expression of opinion on public matters, couched in language respectful to the body to which they may be presented. Sir, it is difficult to say whether these proceedings of the people of York are more remarkable for the ignorance or insolence which they display; they are certainly not deficient in either of these characteristics. There is scarcely a sentence, either in the preamble or resolutions, having even the semblance of truth; and yet they have had the unblushing effrontery to transmit their calumnies to the Vice President, whose peculiar duty it is to preserve the decorum of debate and the dignity of this body, through which high and responsible channel they have been thrown before the Senate, and read at the table of the Secretary. Sir, I was utterly astounded at the bare reading of this paper; but I confess my astonishment was still greater, when, on a careful examination of the paper, I discovered that a material part of the preamble had been defaced ble to me on the subject; that we ought not to be surprised at the evidence of angry party feeling from without, as we were not wholly exempt from it here.

On a subsequent occasion, during the debate, I observed, that the Senators from Pennsylvania had frequently been alluded to, and it was not because I feared to share with my colleague here, at home, or elsewhere, the responsibility of having expunged the offensive matter, for I believed he had done right, and I would have done it without consulting any one, if it had been sent to me, but I was not willing that it should go to the public, that I had assumed a direction or control over a matter which I before stated had not been committed to my charge. And I now would state distinctly the only participation I had in the matter, viz. when my colleague that morning called me to the Secretary's desk, and suggested the propriety of expunging the words referred to, I, in a single word, only signified my assent, or that I had no objections to interpose, and left him, and did not even see him draw the pen over or around the words; he did not state to me that he was acting in conformity with the wishes of the Vice President, or with the knowledge of the Senator from Massachusetts, and if he had so stated, my conduct would have been the same. I had no intimation that it had been the subject of prior consultation with any other human being, until it had been stated in debate on the floor of the Senate, that I had myself, in one or two instances (not obliterated or expunged, but) drawn my pen around words personally disrespectful to the President of the Senate, and especially in the case just alluded to by the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. KING) and those passages, though it appeared they had been printed, had not been read by the Secretary. However strong my objections were to the present Presiding Officer of the Senate in other respects, and I had not been backward in expressing them, I did not intend, on that floor, to be the vehicle of scurrility against that gentleman, or any member of the Senate.

I differed from honorable Senators who held that these proceedings and memorials became the property of the Senate, before they were presented. Until then, I considered it a matter between the representative and his constituents; and, in future, if I could not persuade mine to express their views, intended for me to present here in Congress, not calculated to insult individual members, I could, at least, refuse to present their petitions. Respectfully, by running the pen over and around it. By whom this act was done I know not; but I must be allowed to say, that, if a paper so mutilated had been put into my hands, I should certainly never have presented it to the Senate, without clear and satisfactory evidence that the obliteration was made by the authority of those from whom I had received it. I should have felt it my duty to state the fact, in the first instance, to the Senate, lest it might be inferred, hereafter, that I had changed the character of the paper without any authority whatever to do so. I hope it may appear that no improper means have been resorted to for the purpose of cleansing those proceedings of some part of the filth which disfigures and disgraces them. Be that as it may, there are other passages in the paper which render it unfit to remain on the files of the Senate. It ought, in my opinion, to have been indignantly returned from whence it came, as a just rebuke for such an abuse, so unjustifiably made, of a sacred constitutional privilege. Other views have been taken of this matter by those to whose custody the paper has been intrusted, and it is now before us, on a motion to print and refer it to the Committee on Finance. I cannot yield my assent to this proposition: 1st. Because both the preamble and resolutions contain a gross, palpable, and malicious libel on the members of both Houses of Congress, generally, and a member of this body, whose name is particularly mentioned.

SAMUEL MCKEAN.

2d. Because the entire proceedings are communicated in language highly unbecoming, and disrespectful to both Houses of Congress.

3d. Because a material part of the preamble has been obliterated, and there is no evidence that this was done by the persons who were appointed to sign and transmit it to Congress; and therefore it is not the same paper which was read to, and adopted by, the people of York.

I have another objection to taking the usual order on those proceedings. They are not signed in the handwriting of any one; they appear to have been cut from the columns of some newspaper. The names of the president, vice presidents, and secretaries, are printed, and, therefore, no responsibility rests on them, for the libelous matter which they contain; nor is there in them any security against the forgery of either of those names. I beg leave to read a single sentence in the preamble, which stamps the reckless character of the political partisans by whom it was drawn. This sentence, if it stood alone, would be sufficient with me to refuse to pay the usual respect, or any respect at all, to the proceedings of this meeting. Not content with fulminating the disgusting epithets which are to be found in the pensioned presses of this administration, they add to these the charge of bribery and corruption on the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, in the following words, the import and design of which no one can mistake:

"And who are the men that would thus sell us (body and soul, if they could) into a slavery so foul, so debasing? Look into the ranks arrayed on the side of the bank, and there you will find them. By loans and accommodations, (how convenient the terms,) it has enlisted in its service some of the most eminent lawyers, many of the most influential presses, with a host of the purest patriots in both Houses of Congress. Are such men fit guardians of the liberties of our country?"

This infamous insinuation, implicating the members of both Houses in the charge of corruptly accepting bank accommodations, in consideration of the support which they give that institution in the legislative halls, is offered for our acceptance, by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and we are gravely asked to promulgate it to the American people, under our sanction! These pliant tools of the junto who surround the Chief Magistrate, were not willing to leave the matter on the footing of a mere inuendo—but the base calumny is again repeated in one of the resolutions said to have been agreed to by the meeting. That no doubt might remain of the sense in which they wished to be understood, they resolve, "that an institution that would offer a price for Senators, Representatives, and editors of papers, in the shape of facilities, loans, accommodations, and fees, would not hesitate to sell the people." Thus the foul libel is carried out in the most formal manner, that the Bank of the United States had actually purchased support in the Senate and House of Representatives, by bribing and corrupting the members of the two Houses of Congress.

Sir, is it possible that such insult and indignity, offered to the American Senate, will be endured? Shall we patiently sit here and listen to falsehood and vituperation, impudently laid before us with all the solemnity of memorials and petitions for a redress of grievances? Shall we receive this half sheet of a pensioned newspaper, without any known signature, as authentic, and deem it worthy of a place among the archives of the Senate? Sir, these are strange times in which we live, and strange scenes are continually rising up before us, hitherto unknown in our political history. Every man who values his liberty, ought, in such a crisis, to bring all his energies, nerved by conscious integrity and patriotism, into action, against the corrupting influences of power and patronage which are seen and felt throughout our country.

But, sir, said Mr. P., the most extraordinary part of this whole proceeding, is the mutilated paragraph which contains a gross and palpable libel on the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, now in his seat.

[Mr. WEBSTER said: Read it sir, and let us see what it is.]

Mr. POINDEXTER asked, who made this mutilation? It is an important inquiry, which ought to be distinctly answered. If it is left unexplained, I cannot regard the transaction as very creditable to the individual who presented the paper. Without the permission of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I should not have trespassed on the sensibility of the Senate so far as to have read this vulgar and offensive paragraph; but with his assent, I proceed to read it. The mutilated part of the preamble is in these words:

"One word in conclusion. Daniel Webster, now a Senator, and a champion of the bank, was, at its creation, a member of the House of Representatives. Then the bank was not his client, and he was opposed to it. His unbiased opinion, as a representative of the people, was in direct opposition to what he now holds; but 'now he is concerned for the bank,' (in legal phraseology,) and no doubt finds it a good fat client, as it has already disposed of more than fifty thousand dollars in the shape of fees. In 1816 he was alarmed at the dangerous powers such an institution could make its own, and he raised his voice for a sounder currency than mere 'promises to pay,' with nothing wherewith to fulfil such promises. He then said 'Gold and silver currency was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad, and that, in the present state of the world, there could be no other currency.'"

The attempt to expunge this vile stuff from the paper, does not, in the least, change its character; it furnishes the most ample evidence of the meaning of those sentences which impute bribery and corruption, in general phrases, to the members of this body. The calumny will fall harmless at the feet of the honorable gentleman whose purity it assails; but it is difficult to conceive a more gross and deliberate insult to the Senate; and still more painful and humiliating to dwell on the means employed to introduce it to the notice of the body on which the libel was intended to operate, and bring into contempt and disrespect, among the people of the United States. Sir, it is high time for the Senate to take care of its own dignity, assailed, as it is, with perpetual calumnies by the Chief Magistrate, and the miserable panders of detraction who are daily around him. This preamble and resolutions have a strong family likeness to expressions which have been ascribed to the President, in reference to the corrupt influence of the bank on honorable members of this and the other House of Congress. We often find, substantially, the same language in the official journal, conducted under the eye of the President, and superintended by individuals holding offices of profit at his will and pleasure. I cannot undertake to vouch for the fact, but I think it highly probable, that this paper was concocted in this city by the cabal to whom I have referred, and forwarded to one of the faithful in York, for the edification and instruction of the good people in that respectable district of Pennsylvania. This mode of manufacturing public opinion has become familiar of late, and constitutes an important feature in the political tactics of the party who now rule the destinies of the country.

Sir, these proceedings, cut from the columns of a news-paper, having no responsibility, defaced and mutilated, and grossly libellous, ought not, and cannot, if we respect as we ought the high trust which has been confided to us, be permitted to disgrace the files of the Senate. For one, I enter my most solemn protest against receiving the paper, or taking any order on it whatever. Let it be thrown among the great mass of fabrication and falsehood which it suits the purpose of the administration to disseminate against this body, because it cannot be moulded to the purposes of power or corruption, and it will find its condemnation in the frowns of every impartial, intelligent man in the community.

Mr. PRESTON asked: How came this paper before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT informed the gentleman that he had received it, accompanied by a letter, which would be read.

Mr. PRESTON. Then the paper has been brought before the Senate by the Presiding Officer.

The letter was then read.

The CHAIR then stated, as well as he could be heard, that, on receiving the petition, he had looked into it, and discovered that the portion which had been erased contained imputations, improper in their character, on a member of the Senate. He had therefore submitted it to the Senator from Pennsylvania, with a suggestion, that, if they considered they had authority to do so, they should strike out the exceptionable paragraph. They had done so. He then adverted to the difficulty which existed in laying down the precise rule which should govern as to what particular language should be admitted, and what should not be admitted, as proper to be received. This difficulty had been increased, in consequence of the tenor of a debate which had recently taken place on the presentation of a petition.

Mr. PRESTON asked: Did the Chair mean to state that the obliteration took place after the paper was in the possession of the Senate, and that it was done with the knowledge of the Vice President?

The VICE PRESIDENT expressed his assent.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he had been informed that such a statement of the proceedings of this meeting would be presented, and that it would present an altogether false account of it; and he was requested to lay the evidence of this misrepresentation before the Senate. He had been told, at the same time, that there was one part of the paper about to be presented which contained matter scandalous in reference to himself. He had said then, what he had always felt, that he felt much reluctance in laying this evidence before the Senate, because he should have regarded it as more consistent with self-respect to have taken no notice of such idle and ridiculous scandal. He had consented, however, to lay the paper in his hand before the Senate, knowing that the sentiments of the respectable citizens of York would be misrepresented here by this truly miserable statement of the proceedings.

He considered it due to the Vice President to say, that he was this morning informed by that gentleman of the offensive character of the reference to himself. He had told the Presiding Officer, he was aware of the existence of the offensive paragraph, and that he considered it unimportant whether it was read or not. The Presiding Officer had said that the paragraph was highly improper, and that he would not present the proceedings unless this part of them was stricken out. When the paper was read, he had not heard the offensive clause, and, of course, he concluded that it had been expunged. As to the resolutions, he had not read them, or seen them, until to-day. He considered them as obnoxious to the charges which the Senator from Mississippi had alleged against them. They did contain offensive imputations as to members of the Senate. But, as this was a subject which would take up some time, he would, if the gentleman from Mississippi had no objection, move to lay the proceedings on the table, to give the Senators from Pennsylvania time to look into the character of the statement. If they should afterwards determine to renew the motion to refer and print, the further discussion of the matter might take place.

Mr. PRESTON said that he was unwilling that this occasion should pass without expressing his astonishment at the fact which was presented. The right of petition he regarded as a most sacred right. He could not acknowledge the right of any individual to interfere between the petitioners themselves, and the body to which their petition was to be presented. If a single phrase could be stricken out, others might be erased, and the whole of the resolutions might be so remodelled as to suit the purposes and opinions of persons here. He felt himself particularly called upon to enter his solemn protest against a proceeding which might become a precedent, when a petition was in the custody of any officer of this body, and, of course, was in the possession of the Senate, that any one should assume the responsibility of making any alteration therein; and he would further protest, whenever such petition or paper should be in the charge of the Vice President, against that officer presenting it in a mutilated state.

Mr. WILKINS said that he owed some explanation to the Senate on this subject. Coming into the Senate chamber this morning, just before the Chair had called the Senate to order, he had not allowed himself nor had his colleague, sufficient time to look over the entire proceedings on the face of the paper which had been put into the hands of the Presiding Officer. That officer had made the same objection to him, which he had suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Presiding Officer had stated to him the difficulty of presenting a paper containing a paragraph so peculiarly offensive as the one which had been stricken out, and which, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, had been read, and he had suggested to him and his colleague, whether they thought they possessed authority to strike out the offensive matter, or not.

On this suggestion being made by the Chair, the very difficulty intimated by the gentleman from South Carolina presented itself to his mind: How far had they, representing the people of Pennsylvania, the right to alter a memorial coming from that people? If this had been the first case of the kind presented to him, he should at once have said that he had no authority; that the people had a right to put their own grievances in their own language. But he and his colleague had been guided by one or two cases which had been previously under the notice of the Senate. The only paragraph he had read was the one so offensively bearing on the Senator from Massachusetts in particular; and he had said to his colleague, that, if he would share the responsibility of the act, he would strike that out. He did then strike out the paragraph, just as the Senate was called to order. He would have gone still further, if there had been sufficient time to go through the whole of the proceedings, and stricken out the other part, which generally charged the corruption of Senators and Representatives. Whether or not he and his colleague had committed an error in doing what they had done, was doubtful to their minds. But, it must be obvious, on the face of the act, that the striking out matter which was individually offensive to a member of the Senate, could not have proceeded from any improper motive; and it did not change, in any essential point, what the people of York had presented. The language stricken out had no useful bearing on the question which they were shortly to be called on to decide. This extent of interference had resulted entirely from this motive. He was willing to say that there was another paragraph in the proceedings which ought not to be there. He alluded to the resolution charging the bank with offering a price to Senators, Representatives, and editors, in the form of loans, facilities, &c. If he had cast his eye upon that resolution previous to the presenting of the paper, he should have taken the same liberty, and stricken that out also. He had no doubt on the subject of the respectability of the meeting. He believed that one of the gentlemen who had signed the letter transmitting these proceedings was recently a representative of the district in the other House, [ADAM KING,] for one or two sessions. He had this apology to offer for the people of the county of York, who had sent these resolutions: We were all aware of the very great excitement which now prevails every where on the subject of the United States Bank. There had been presented to the people no question which came so directly home to the feelings and interests of the people. Hence it is that these primitive assemblies have been got up; and hence all our struggling to obtain public opinion. Hence also the contest here, at this moment, to determine which party has the majority in York. All were struggling for the public sentiment, because that will ultimately decide the question. However the gentleman from Massachusetts might flatter himself as to the public sentiment in Pennsylvania, he himself was very willing that the Senate should take that sentiment as it was at this moment, and make it the rule for their decision of the question. One word as to which party had the majority at that meeting. He had a letter on the subject, signed by about fifteen gentlemen, at the head of whom was Mr. Adam King, which letter he would desire to be read. The question was, which of the two parties had the majority. The meeting was represented as a very large one. The room in which it was held was capable of holding from 3 to 400, when it was full. Here, then, was prima facie evidence that the resolutions presented had been carried by a majority, because the officers elected to preside at the meeting had attested the fact. We had the proceedings in form, and attested by the officers of the meeting. So much, therefore, to show that there was the prima facie evidence of the majority. There had been a protest exhibited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which was signed by 53 persons; and these individuals represent that they were present when the resolutions were rejected by a vote of 3 to 1. Where 53 composed the majority of 3 to 1, how miserable must have been the minority! Was it possible that a minority, which could not have consisted of more than 16 or 18, in the proportion of 1 to 3, could have succeeded in obtaining a transmission of the proceedings. The protest, itself, showed the improbability of the story. As to the erasure, it might have been unjustifiable, as he had before said, but it was made entirely out of delicacy to the member assailed. If this motive was not sufficient to justify the act, it ought, at least, to excuse it. He asked for the reading of the letter of Adam King, and others, and the letter was accordingly read.

Mr. PRESTON said, he did not look upon the memorial which had been presented to the Senate by the Vice President, as that which had been addressed to it by the people of York county. He would not interfere with the course which the Senator from Pennsylvania had thought proper to pursue, as he was responsible for his conduct to his constituents. But, Mr. P. said, he did feel himself called upon, as a member of the Senate, to declare his opinion, that, in consequence of the alteration which had been made in the memorial from York county, the one presented could not be considered as the same. What was the object intended by making the alteration? It was to change the character of the memorial—to stamp upon it a peculiar character, in order that it might be brought to the consideration of the Senate; it having originally contained a foul and personal attack on one of the members of that body. Now, the Senate had been told, that, notwithstanding the offensive expressions had been stricken out, to render the memorial more palatable, it was the same that the Vice President had presented that morning, and which had been read at the Clerk's table. Mr. P. considered it to be a document of a very different character—altogether a very different thing. Honorable members might, perhaps, individually, assume the responsibility of standing between their constituents and the body of which they were members. He would not stop to inquire into the propriety of that course. But the memorial to which he referred was in the hands of officers of this House, and the new character that had been stamped upon it was effected while it was in that situation. If, after a memorial or petition should have been placed in the hands of an officer of the Senate, the character of it could be changed by a mutilation of its language—striking out expressions that might be deemed objectionable or offensive—then he (Mr. P.) would ask, had not the individual the same opportunity to make additions to the document? It appeared that the erasure was made because the language involved a most libellous and unjustifiable attack on the Senator from Massachusetts. He (Mr. P.) contended that the whole character of the memorial had been changed by the erasure, and that it was the duty of Senators to take care, to be extremely vigilant, that no interception take place between the Senate and the people. He regarded the document in question as bearing a very different character now from what it did before the excision of the offensive expressions, and was of opinion that those who undertook to modify, or otherwise change, the wording of memorials, would be held to a strict account for it, though they might assume that responsibility. He most solemnly protested against the officers of that House meddling with the terms in which those instruments might be couched. If the door was once allowed to be opened; if the officers of that body were once permitted to touch, in any way even, the constituents of the honorable Senator, [MR. WILKINS,] in what way would his (Mr. P.'s) constituents have stood the next day. His constituents might send a memorial to the Senate through the hands of the Vice President, not to him, and their views might be so altered as to represent those of officers of that body rather than their own, and be so recorded. When a memorial was presented by the Vice President, or any other member of the Senate, he took it upon responsibility. After some further observations, Mr. P. said he was extremely anxious that the Senate should look to its rights and the rights of the people, and keep them well guarded. He would therefore renew the motion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that the memorial should be laid on the table, in order that the Senate might have an opportunity to inquire into its rights, for it was a subject sufficiently grave to demand at their hands the fullest deliberation and examination.

Mr. CLAY said that he really thought, under all the circumstances that had attended the presentation of that memorial, it was the duty of the Senate to give some decision which might operate in future as a precedent in a like case, if a like case should ever happen. He agreed with the honorable member from South Carolina, that the paper had lost its identity, that it was not a memorial coming from any portion of the people of York county; that it was not such a paper as they had transmitted for the purpose of being presented to the Senate; and that, therefore, it could not be received, unless it was admitted that, while a paper was in transitu—nay, what was worse, whilst in the hands of the officers of this House—a paper might be changed in its character, and made a new and altered instrument altogether. From the conclusion to which the honorable Senator from South Carolina had come, it was perfectly evident that, if they who had made it had a right to make an erasure, they had also the right of insertion. Now, if they could do either of those things, then he, Mr. C., would ask, what had become of the right of petition; a sacred and inviolable right, and one that ought to be preserved and maintained inviolate, as it had been in all times heretofore? What made the case more remarkable was, that one of the two Senators from Pennsylvania had declared in his place, that he had received no communication, either from the petitioners themselves or those opposed to the memorial. He, Mr. C., believed that cases of that kind might have occurred in the practice of Congress, in which, if a private petition were sent to the Senate through a member, he might alter it in particulars, if not respectful, or not of a proper or legal form. But here was an alteration made under very different circumstances—the memorial having been brought before the Senate by its Presiding Officer; and now the Senate were called upon to say whether they would or would not receive the document as altered. It was of the first importance that the Senate should decide whether it would or would not sanction the alteration or mutilation of memorials addressed to it; and it did seem to him the correct course was, that the Senate should now come to a decision as to whether or not they would acquiesce in permitting memorials to be altered after being forwarded to them. It had been said by an honorable Senator on his left, that there were analogous cases on record; now, if there were, he, Mr. C., knew nothing of them. If they had existed, it was high time that they should be put a stop to, for they could lead only to pernicious consequences. It seemed to him, therefore, entertaining these sentiments on the subject, that they had better take a vote on it. He was opposed to laying the petition on the table, because it presupposed that it had been formally received, and that the Senate had subsequently disposed of it. He thought they ought not to receive it at all. It had been said, and correctly said—for such was the course of parliamentary proceeding every where—that the first question to be put was: "Shall the petition be received?" Although this was the preliminary question, according to the practice of the Senate, yet it was not put in every instance on the presentation of a petition. That being the case, he would move the Senate that the petition be not received, and he made the motion on all the grounds which had been stated. He made it, in the first place, because the memorial had lost its identity; because it was not a genuine document; because it had been altered; because it was not the same paper that was transmitted to the Senate. And he made it, also, on the same ground that had been taken by the gentleman from Mississippi—that it was couched in language which ought not to be addressed to that body, and was unbecoming those who employed it, and ought not to be received.

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and observed, in substance, that it was with much regret that the Chair felt itself compelled to detain the Senate at so late an hour, by any observations of its own, upon a subject which had been already so fully discussed. But as the question to be decided was in its nature one of order, in respect to which it was not only proper in itself, but conformable also to parliamentary usage, for the Chair to take a part, he felt it his duty as well to the Senate as to the Chair, to state briefly, not only the considerations by which its course had been influenced in the particular case now before the Senate, but also the general principles which the Chair had adopted for its government in regard to the subject-matter out of which it has arisen. He believed such a course, on his part, necessary to a correct understanding of the immediate question under discussion, and that it could not fail to be useful in future. By the express provision of the constitution, the Senate is authorized to "determine the rules of its proceedings." By this provision of the constitution, the rules of order, in its proceedings, are subjected to the legislation of the Senate without restriction, other than such as may be found to result from other and express provisions of the constitution. This right has been exercised by the Senate by means of the rules which it has from time to time established. These rules provide that every question of order shall be decided by the President, subject, nevertheless, to an appeal to the Senate. They provide, further, that the President may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order. This latter provision is peculiar to this body, and its rules are, in that respect, unlike those of the other branch of the legislature. But little conversant with questions of order, and anxious to regulate its course by the best lights that could be obtained, the Chair thought it proper, at an early day, to look into the practical interpretation which had been given to the authority thus conferred on it, by those who had preceded the present incumbent in the occupation of the Chair. Upon that examination it was found that it had generally been the practice of the Chair, and especially upon important points of order, to take the sense of the Senate in respect to them in the first instance, whenever there was, in its judgment, a sufficient question as to the proper course of proceeding to render such a step advisable. Having regard to the character and construction of the body, this mode of proceeding appeared to the Presiding Officer to be not only discreet in itself, but he thought it would give to this peculiar provision an effect most conformable to the respect which was justly due to the Senate from a Presiding Officer not chosen by itself. The Chair, therefore, felt no difficulty in adopting it as a rule for its own conduct. Why that course could not be pursued upon the first presentation of the papers in question, consistently with other and paramount considerations, and why it is not only most proper, but highly desirable, that the sense of the Senate should now be taken upon the immediate question before it, he trusted would be made quite obvious in the succeeding observations which he felt it his duty to submit.

The subject-matter out of which the present question has arisen, presents two points for decision; that is to say, first, Does a communication intended to be laid before the Senate through the medium of the Presiding Officer, from the moment of its reception by the Chair, become, ipso facto, as is contended, the property and part of the archives of the Senate, so as to deprive the Chair of all discretion as to the disposition to be made of it, without the approbation of the body? And if that be not the case, then, secondly, Under what responsibility does the Chair rest to the Senate, in regard to the character of the communications which it suffers to reach the body through its agency? These are certainly questions of a very grave character, well deserving the deliberate consideration of the Senate. They are questions in respect to which there would seem to be a diversity of opinion among the members: and it is certainly far from being the intention of the Chair to pass, in this form, upon the correctness of the conflicting deductions which have, in this respect, been drawn from the premises before us, by honorable Senators. Its only purpose is to state its own views, and, in doing so, it feels that it may safely assume, that if it be correct to say that the Chair has no rightful authority over communications addressed to it for the use of the Senate, no right to return them to those from whom they came; to deliver them over to their representatives on this floor, and withhold them from the Senate, then most clearly the Chair cannot be held responsible for the contents of any paper thus presented. It can only be necessary to state this proposition, to render the incongruity and injustice of the opposing pretension obvious to the meanest capacity, and to secure its rejection by every unprejudiced mind. What, then, is the true rule as to the power and duties of the Chair, in regard to the disposition of papers addressed to it with a view to their submission to the Senate? Could the Chair allow itself to consult its convenience only, and to relieve itself from responsibility, there is no rule that could be suggested, by which those objects would be more effectually accomplished, than that which has been contended for—by which its office, in this respect, is converted into one of a purely ministerial character, and by which every paper, received by it for the use of the Senate, is at once converted into a portion of the Senatorial archives. But the Chair has not been able to satisfy itself, that it could thus be relieved from a duty which it owed to the Senate. It has, on the contrary, considered it to be a portion of that duty to withhold such communications as, in the exercise of its best discretion, it considered to be so framed as to render their presentation inconsistent with the respect due to the Senate; as well as such as were, from other considerations, justly subject to the operation of the same rule. Scarcely a week passes, in which communications are not received by the Chair, with a request to have them laid before the Senate, in respect to which it is apparent that their authors are suffering under mental aberrations. Communications of this sort, of which many are constantly in the possession of the Chair, would, on the supposition referred to, be entitled to the disposition which is claimed for the paper under consideration. But the exercise of the discretion referred to has not been confined by the Chair to papers of this description, which might justly be regarded as extreme cases. It has, on the contrary, felt it to be within the line of its duty, to withhold from the Senate communications which, however high and sound the source from which they emanated, contained reflections upon the Senate, plainly derogatory to its honor. It is but a few weeks since that the Chair received, with a request to lay them before the Senate, the proceedings of a public meeting held in the city of Philadelphia, which, it was obvious, had been a very large one, and which the Chair does not doubt to have been also very respectable, in which the severest censure was denounced against this body, for an act in which the present incumbent of the Chair happened to have had a particular interest. Under the influence of the sense of duty which has been expressed, the Chair did not hesitate to deliver the paper to one of the Senators from that State, with a request that it should be respectfully returned to the source from which it had come, with the information that the Chair felt it to be inconsistent with its duty to lay a paper containing such matter before the Senate. The Chair would have preferred in this, as it would in every similar case, to have pursued the course authorized by the rules of the Senate, and which has heretofore, in other respects, been so extensively adopted, of taking the sense of the Senate, in the first instance, upon the propriety of receiving the paper in question. But it has hitherto appeared to the Chair, that that could not be well done without exposing the Senate to the indignity against which the discretion exercised by the Chair was calculated to protect it, viz. the indignity of having a paper read to it which reflected upon its character and motives.

The Chair has thought it proper to be thus particular in the statement of its views and practice, to the end, that if the opinion which has been so confidently advanced, that every paper received by the Chair becomes the property of the Senate, subject to its exclusive disposition, be that of the body, the fact may be authoritatively announced, either in the form of a rule, or decision of the Senate, and thus made the rule of conduct for the future. If such a rule were adopted, the respect which the Chair entertains for the body over which it has the honor to preside, as well as a sense of duty, will induce it to carry the same into execution. But the Chair has felt itself constrained to regard this as an erroneous view of the subject, and it has already stated its own impressions as to the nature and extent of the responsibility under which it rested to the Senate, in the discharge of this portion of its official duties.

In taking upon itself the exercise of the discretion before stated, the Chair was, by no means, unapprized of the extent and delicacy of the responsibility which, without previous reference to the wishes of the Senate, it assumed; but which it cheerfully encountered, with the view of upholding the true dignity of a body, to the advancement of whose highest interests it had determined to devote itself.

The difficulties of a successful discharge of this trust in the particular case under consideration, had, moreover, been in no small degree increased by the course which was taken by the Senate, and by the character of the debate, on the part of some of its members, in two cases similar in principle, which have recently been acted upon. It was well known that the Senate, although its attention was directly called to their exceptionable character, decided in those cases, to receive papers, which, on account of the reflections they respectively contained, upon the body and its presiding officer, they refused to refer or to print; and that, in the discussion which arose upon their presentation, the principle was distinctly and solemnly avowed, that, in a period like the present, it did not belong to the Senate to prescribe to a suffering people the language in which they should call upon their representatives for a redress of grievances. In these proceedings the Chair was not inclined, on account of its relation to the subject, to take part; nor could it, perhaps, have done so with propriety, if its inclinations had been otherwise.

Although, as has been observed, the difficulties of the Chair, in the performance of this part of its duties, at all times delicate, were thereby unavoidably increased, its opinion was not changed in respect to the principles which it had adopted. Acting upon that principle, the Chair declined to submit the proceedings in question to the Senate, although well satisfied of the respectability of the source from whence they emanated, because they contained improper reflections upon one of its members by name. Although the Chair participated so far, at least in the sentiments alluded to, as to be willing to extend the most liberal indulgence to the right of petition, it could not regard it as consistent with the peculiar relations in which it stood towards this body, to permit others to say to it, in a petition presented through the agency of the Chair, that, for which it would be the duty of the Chair to call a Senator to order, when uttered orally in respect to one of his compeers on this floor. The Chair, therefore, delivered the paper to one of the Senators from Pennsylvania, and accompanied it by a declaration that, unless he and his colleague felt themselves authorized to suppress the exceptionable matter, the Chair could not reconcile it to its sense of duty to present it to the Senate. Upon that question, the Chair did not, of course, express its opinion; but it regards it as due, as well to the honorable Senators from that State, as to itself, to say, that if it had regarded such an act on their part to be liable to any just exception, it would never have submitted the paper to them with any such suggestion. It did not so regard it, and, least of all, could it have anticipated that an act done under the circumstances, and from the motives by which it was characterized, would have elicited the exceptions which have been made to it. The facts and circumstances of the case were now before the Senate, and, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to their effect upon the question of the validity of the paper in its present state, the Chair is quite confident there can be none as to the correctness of the motives by which the transaction has been characterized.

This, however, is not the only objection that has been raised against the presentation of the paper. It was objected by an honorable Senator, that these proceedings, the erasure of a part of which is deemed so objectionable, are but a part of a common newspaper, without even the autograph signature of any of the presiding officers, or other mark of authenticity; and, therefore, not admissible according to parliamentary usage. That objection has, however, been fully answered by the reading of the original letter from the committee appointed by the meeting to communicate its proceedings to the Chair, and which is before the Senate in the state in which it was received, but which had been overlooked by the acting Secretary of the Senate. But it is further objected, that the paper in question does still contain exceptionable matter, inasmuch as it charges the corruption of Congress by the bank. The Chair has no hesitation to say, that, if the paper had appeared to it to be susceptible of that construction, it would not have deemed it proper, upon its own mere motion, to lay it before the Senate. Upon the brief and cursory examination which it was alone in the power of the Chair to give to its contents, extended as they are, they did not strike the Chair as charging more than a disposition upon the part of the bank to corrupt Congress and the press. Nor is the Chair now satisfied that the proceedings in question, although, upon the examination to which they have been subjected by the Senate, they are certainly found to contain many injurious insinuations, do contain the charge of practised corruption of the legislature. The Chair, perhaps, owes it to itself to state, that, before presenting the proceedings, it suggested to the Senator more directly referred to by them, its willingness to hold them up for further advisement and examination, and that it was in consequence of hearing from that Senator that he had a response to the proceedings in his possession, that he would probably make some observations upon them, and that he would prefer to have them presented forthwith, that the Chair was induced to present them this morning. But, whatever may be the just construction of their contents, it is in the power of the Senate to make such a disposition of them, upon the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky, as may be deemed most consistent with justice and the respect that is due to the body.

In regard to the suggestion that the Chair should ask permission to withdraw the paper, it has only to say, that it thinks it in every respect desirable, that the Senate should itself now express an opinion upon the point presented to its consideration by the pending motion. Such a decision is particularly important in the present agitated state of the country, and in view of the great probability that cases of the same kind may again arise if not prevented by the formal decision of the Senate. To have taken its opinion upon the subject in the first instance under the rule of the Senate, would have been the choice, of course, of the Chair, had it not been for the difficulty which has been referred to. The subject is now before the Senate. Whatever room there may be for a difference of opinion, as to the strict propriety of the course which had been taken, there cannot be any, it is hoped, in respect to the motives and intentions which prompted to that course. Upon this point, the Chair does not feel itself to be under the slightest necessity to indulge in protestations or assurances of any kind. It is fully persuaded that no unprejudiced mind will, for a moment, hesitate in believing that its conduct in the whole matter has, so far at least as intention is involved, been controlled by the principles which were avowed by the Chair at the threshold of its duty, and which, it is well assured, have been most faithfully adhered to. Why, then, should the decision of the Senate be superseded through its agency? It can perceive no good reason for such a course, whilst many are opposed to its adoption. Independently of the intrinsic importance of such a decision, there are other considerations of a still more imperative character. As has already been stated, the Senate has heretofore decided to receive communications from the people upon this subject, which, on account of the injurious reflections they contained, as well on the Senate as on its Presiding Officer, it refused to commit or print. The subject having then entered into the deliberation and decision of the Senate, it is desirable that all further action upon it should be under its control, when that can, as in the present case, be done without impropriety. Again: A grave question has been made and fully discussed, as to the control of Senators over the communications of their constituents, under circumstances like the present. It is proper, also, that that point should be settled by the Senate. To render the proposed course admissible on the part of the Chair, there should at least be unanimity on the part of the Senate in desiring it. Such appears not to be the case. It is not only expressly objected to by Senators, but there obviously appears to be a diversity of opinion amongst the members upon the abstract question whether the paper should be received or not. Under such circumstances, and without noticing an objection of order which would render the step improper without unanimous consent—a consent which has already been refused—the Chair cannot but think, that it will best discharge its duties to all parties, by allowing the question before the Senate, and upon which the yeas and nays have been already ordered, to be taken.

Mr. KANE observed, that he held in his hand a petition equally offensive in language as the one they were then discussing. It contained charges against the motives of their Presiding Officer; and when he should have an opportunity of presenting it, he would move that it be printed and laid upon the table. He rose for the purpose of noticing the inconsistency of some of the observations that had been made by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who had stated that the petition was in the custody of the Senate, in the hands of its Presiding Officer, and being so situated it should not, and could not, be altered by him. In the next breath they were told, that, if the alterations were made in it, and it was received, it would be upon the responsibility of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He (Mr. K.) concurred in the remark, that every member of that body, when he presented a paper, whether in the form of a memorial, petition, or any thing else, should bear the responsibility of having violated any rule of the Senate. The same remark he regarded as applying to the Vice President also; that he should examine every paper sent to him for presentation before laying it before the Senate; and, if unobjectionable in its character, it should be presented; but if it contained a libel on any member or members of that body, then it would be that officer's duty to withhold it. Now, what was the fact with respect to that petition? It was a petition containing complaints and statements on the great subject which now agitated the country, but with them was mixed up paltry and frivolous allusions to a member of the Senate. Well, the Vice President had looked at the paper, and found it to contain objectionable language, but considering the right of petition to be sacred, he felt himself unpleasantly situated as to what was the best course to pursue. Now, he (Mr. K.) thought that in the present state of the case it would be better to give the Senators from Pennsylvania the petition, than to send it back to the petitioners; and, for his own part, he conceived that the Senators, acting on their own responsibility in regard to this matter, would not be taking a course at all improper. So far as the petitioners had confined themselves to the great object of petition, he agreed that it would have been correct to have received the petition. He agreed with the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] who had said the other day, that it was desirable that all exceptionable matter should be expunged from papers presented to the Senate, as well as to the courts of chancery, before they could be received. He (Mr. K.) considered it necessary, in order to preserve the dignity of the Senate, that all offensive matter should be expunged; and it would have been a much more dignified course, if this petition could have been referred to a committee, and been purged of the offensive language which it contained, before being put upon the records of the Senate.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said, that in a recent debate on the subject of one of these memorials, he had objected to the proceedings, because they contained remarks which were improper in themselves, and derogatory to the character of this body. He was then met with the declaration, that the people ought not to be interfered with in the slightest degree, in their exercise of the right of petition. He was further told, on that occasion, that this was only the court language which was returned to us. Now, Senators object to receive these proceedings, because they contained reflections on the members of this House, and the other House. He did not so understand the language. He had looked into it, and, with the exception of the part which had been stricken out, he had discovered nothing so offensive in its character as was to be found in resolutions presented here from another quarter, from the tin-plate workers in Philadelphia, and which had been offered here by a Senator on his own responsibility, received without objection, and was now printed and lying on the tables of Senators. [Here Mr. K. read a part of the resolutions to which he had referred, and which alluded to the manner in which General Jackson was ruled by the magician and the kitchen cabinet.] When this paper was presented, it was received in a very different feeling from that which was now exhibited, because it was from those who were in favor of the bank, and opposed to the administration. What now did the gentlemen say, who, when that memorial was presented, disdanted with so much eloquence upon it, as coming from the hard hands and honest hearts of the country? What was the character of the paper now presented? The resolutions adopted by the meeting at York were there, but they were introduced by a preamble. The people who adopted the resolutions did not order that this preamble should also be presented. The direction of the meeting was, to transmit the resolutions only. The preamble constituted no part of the subject. The resolutions were embodied in a compact form. As to striking out any part of the preamble, that he did not consider as important. He knew very well, himself, that, when any paper transmitted contained offensive remarks on any of the officers of the Government, or any of the members of Congress, it was usual to run the pen across them. The right of petition was thus preserved, while no violation of proper decorum was permitted. The rules of the Senate required that, when a member presented a memorial or paper to the Senate, he should state its contents, and the question is then taken: Shall it be read? But, after the paper had been sent to the Secretary and read, it is then in possession of the Senate, and must be disposed of either by laying it on the table, or in some other manner, at the pleasure of the Senate.

[Mr. K. here read an extract from the Manual, to support his views.]

The practice of the House, it would be seen, dispensed with putting the formal question for the reading of the paper. He felt some surprise that the gentleman from South Carolina should protest, with such apparent warmth, against the mode of proceeding which had been adopted by the Vice President and the Senators from Pennsylvania. If ever there had been a disposition exhibited to treat any member of the Senate with delicacy, it was exhibited on this occasion—and where, then, was the extraordinary impropriety of making the alteration? Where, in such case, was any just reason for imputation? Where was there any disposition to alter the views of the petitioners?

Mr. PRESTON explained, that he had not alleged that there was any disposition to do wrong.

Mr. KING resumed: He held that nothing had been done, on this occasion, which ought not to have been done; nothing but what the Senator from Pennsylvania owed to the Senator from Massachusetts, and to his constituents, who, in a moment of excitement, had adopted the exceptionable words. There was no more done than was right, when the exceptionable language was stricken out, leaving the important views of the petitioners unchanged. No one pretended that petitioners had a right to go out of their way to attack members. It could do no good. He would always enter his protest against such a course; and, whenever such language appeared in a paper, it was the duty of the Senator representing the petitioners to strike it out. If such a petition was sent to him, he should deem it a duty he owed to this body, to strike out every offensive remark.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, it was due to himself to say a few words in reply to the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] who made allusion to the remarks which fell from him (Mr. P.) when certain proceedings of public meetings of the citizens of Erie and Germantown, in Pennsylvania, were before the Senate. The honorable gentleman is mistaken, if he supposes that I approved the offensive language of the resolutions at either of these meetings of the people. I certainly condemned the allusions made to the Presiding Officer, to particular members of the Senate, and to the body itself; but I then said, and my opinion on that subject remains unchanged, that the reference made by the citizens of Erie to a certain political event, (the rejection of a nominee to a high office, a few years past,) and the censure bestowed on it, although highly indecorous and improper, might be excused, or at least palliated, by recurring to the precedent which had been set by a member of the Senate, in his place, who had used language in debate far more offensive and indecorous than that contained in these resolutions, and was permitted to proceed without having been called to order. I am sure no Senator present can have forgotten that, at an early period of the debate on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the removal of the public deposits, a Senator, on this floor, gratuitously went out of his way for the purpose of animadverting on the same political event, (which it would be improper in me to explain more minutely at this time,) took it upon himself to say, in a most solemn appeal to the Vice President, personally, that the "rejection of any nomination by the Senate had long since ceased to be a reproach to any one."

[SENATE.]

He went further, and congratulated that high officer of the Government, that the "foul stain, the black spot," which the Senate had put on him, had been "washed out by the virtue of an enlightened people." Other language, equally derogatory to the dignity of the Senate and the decorum of debate, had been used by the same Senator, and tamely permitted to pass without rebuke. Now, sir, I repeat what I before said, that we had no just right to complain of the good people of Erie, residing, as they do, in a section of the country far removed from the seat of the National Government, for having sent back to us our own refined parliamentary language. While I cannot approve any violation of the respect due to this body, coming from any quarter, I would not permit the pernicious example to originate within these walls. It may well excite surprise that self-respect is not sufficiently felt, by every honorable member, to protect the body from imputations equally uncalled for, indecent, and unfounded. But, sir, the paper before the Senate is of a character entirely different from any which has heretofore been presented. The Erie resolutions, it is true, compliment the Presiding Officer, and speak of the body in which he presides as "an aristocratic Senate." This opinion may or may not be just, and yet nothing of corruption is implied. A man may be an "aristocrat" in principle or practice, without personal dishonor. The Senate might be an aristocratic body, and yet the motives of its members may be free from the taint of corruption. But the proceedings now before us contain a direct charge of bribery, a gross and palpable libel on the body, and a libel still more gross and palpable on a Senator who is particularly named. There is no analogy between the two cases.

With respect to the resolutions adopted at the Germantown meeting, I have not and do not approve so much of them as are supposed to cast a censure on the Vice President and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILKINS.] It may, however, be matter of doubt whether these honorable gentlemen will admit that they impute to them any thing which they are prepared to disclaim, in point of fact, or from which they desire to escape. One of the resolutions ascribes the action of the Executive, in removing the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, to the advice and influence of the Vice President. Will that high officer of the Government say, that he did not advise the measure, or that he does not approve it? Will he say that the movement was against his opinion? I presume not. Would he regard a declaration, which placed him by the side of the President in this "experiment," as a libel, or even a censure, on him? I had always supposed the converse of the proposition to be true: that he would consider it highly offensive to doubt his fidelity to the Chief Magistrate on this subject. If I am correct in this conclusion, the citizens of Germantown stand acquitted of the slightest disrespect to this body in making the avowment. I understand the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania is charged with giving his support to this measure of the President, which that portion of his constituents deem unconstitutional and injurious to their best interests. The honorable gentleman will not contest the fact, and the inference is a matter of opinion on which he, doubtless, honestly differs from those who express it. I cannot recognise any thing in these precedents to justify my vote in favor of receiving and laying on the table the libellous resolutions, transmitted to the Chair by a portion of the people of York county. I was glad to hear the honorable member from Pennsylvania, on my right, [Mr. WILKINS,] state that there were other parts of this paper over which he would have run his pen, if he had carefully examined it before it was presented. Will the honorable gentleman vote to receive the paper, if these paragraphs, which he admits to be disrespectful to the Senate, are not expunged? I hope not. The honorable gentleman has sent to the Secretary a communication, which he stated to be under the signature of Adam King, formerly a representative in the other House, and, therefore, entitled to full credit. I do not mean, sir, to question the verity of the statements made in that communication, but I would respectfully inquire, whether this is the same Adam King whom the enlightened and patriotic people of York, a few years past, turned out of his seat in the House of Representatives, for having voted against the bill to renew, for a limited time, the charter of the Bank of the United States? Have these people now united with Mr. King and denounced their own principles? I confess, sir, my mind is not prepared to credit a change so sudden and unaccountable, on a subject so important, especially after the solemn protest to the contrary, which many respectable citizens of that county have signed, and presented to the Senate this morning by an honorable member from Massachusetts.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. WRIGHT, LEIGH, PRESTON, BIBB, MANGUM, McKEAN, BLACK, CALHOUN, CLAYTON, WEBSTER, FORTSYTH, BROWN, KANE, and SPRAGUE.

The question was then taken to receive the petition, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows: YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Kent, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Waggaman, Webster.—24.

So the Senate refused to receive the proceedings of the York county meeting.

Mr. WEBSTER then gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to re-charter the Bank of the United States.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, at a quarter before six o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 18.

BOSTON MEMORIAL.

Mr. WEBSTER rose and said, that it would be perceived by the Senate, that he had a roll before him, of no ordinary dimensions. It was a protest, respectfully addressed to both Houses of Congress, against the recent proceedings of the Executive Government in regard to the public moneys of the United States, and urgently requesting Congress, by the interposition of its own just authority, to restore the constitution and laws to that free and proper action which the public interest and prosperity demanded. This paper, sir, (Mr. W. said,) proceeded from a place not altogether obscure—not altogether unknown in the history of the United States. It came from the people of Boston, assembled in Faneuil Hall: it came from those walls in which the earliest accents of independence rang—from under that roof beneath which our young American liberty shook her wings, ere she went forth to fly over a thousand hills, and to proclaim independence to three millions of souls. It was sent by those, and the sons of those, who, in that same place, in '74, '75, and '76, heard the voices of Otis, of Warren, and of Hancock, and who gave to those distinguished speakers as much impulse as they received from them. This paper, Mr. W. said, was signed by 6,841 independent voters, tax-payers, and men of property of the city of Boston. Here were no men of straw; this paper presented the names of men of different habits and occupations, of numbers whom he had mentioned as the electors of that city; and, as far as he knew, of a greater number of persons than any excited election had ever called together before. The names were here for the inspection of the Senate; and his colleague, who was well acquainted with many of them, could vouch for their high standing and respectability. Whatever character the memorial might bear elsewhere, it here challenged investigation. The sentiments of the meeting at which the memorial was got up, approached nearer to a feeling of unanimity than was usual on such occasions; and the strictest examination would be unable to detect in it any fault, even if accidental error could be discovered. This memorial had no secret communication with the Government, or any department of it. He had heard, it was true, of attempts which had been made to influence some departments of the Government by communications not destined to see the light, or to reach the public ear. He would not say, that by such communications, the President had been deceived, but he would say, that, if he listened to them, there was great danger of his being deceived, and he hoped he would look with great caution at any paper which came to him without his possessing a full knowledge of those who framed it.

An honorable Senator from Tennessee, early in the session, expressed an opinion in regard to these representations to Congress, equally sound and liberal. He said he looked with distrust on any proceedings which had been got up by those who had an interest in the offices of the Government. No such interest influenced those whose memorial he now presented; they had no party feelings which would induce them to uphold the evils produced by the measures of those who administered the Government; and they had no motives to make them causeless fault-finders with the Chief Magistrate. He (the Chief Magistrate) has been recently with them, and they received him with hospitality and cordiality, which he hoped was sufficiently exemplified when, in June last, the majority of this people evinced no feelings towards him but good. They had not all of them, though many had, preferred him for the distinguished station to which he had been elevated; but all saw that a majority so large as to command respect, had placed him at the head of the Government, and they cheerfully acquiesced. They wished nothing else but that he should complete the second term of his Presidency with as much honor as had distinguished any of his illustrious predecessors. They were not eager complainants against the measures of the administration; they were not swift witnesses in the cause in which they were engaged; they had not rushed forward to make known their sense of their own grievances at an early hour; they had not raised the cry of distress, whether distress existed or not; they came to speak their sentiments with moderation and firmness; they came to speak of their sufferings, and to describe a state of things they knew to exist.

This paper had been brought here by a committee of gentlemen, of whom, as they were his neighbors and friends, he could hardly speak with delicacy; and especially as some of them were as well known to Congress as to himself, and needed no recommendation from him. They were gentlemen of different relations in life, social and political. They came here to testify to what they knew; to present a state of things which they believed the majority of Congress could not realize, and which they believed they could not, without actual and personal participation, understand. Their mission was to Congress—they had no order to go elsewhere for relief—had no message for any other department of the Government; and, believing that the evils of which they complain admitted only of legislative remedy, they came to the legislature. Believing the law to have been violated, they came to Congress; believing that distress exists to a calamitous extent, and believing that no other power on earth can relieve it, their commission is to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States exclusively. Their protest was on such a subject, that no considerations on earth could have induced them to sign such a paper, had it not been for that alarming, shocking state of things, so deeply affecting the public interests. Had not all incredulity on the subject become satisfied? Had not the whole of the population, from Maine to New Orleans, been satisfied—had not all their doubts been silenced? If there be on the vast surface of this happy country, on the sides of its fertile hills, and in the soil of its rich valleys—if there be any spot so favored, that distress has not reached it, let the inhabitants of that spot rejoice; but let them rejoice with fear and with trembling; for, so sure as the light of the sun—if he might compare what was beneficent in action with that which was deleterious—so sure as the rays of the sun would, in due time, penetrate the deepest shades of the forest, so sure was it that the distress which now affected the industry and prosperity of a great part of the country, must act every where and be felt every where. In their opinion, the act of the Secretary of the Treasury in removing the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, plainly violated the chartered rights of that corporation. And, was it not so? The act was unrepealed. The benefit that was intended to be conferred on the bank for the services it was to render the Government, was not at present enjoyed by it. It had been deprived, then, of one part, and that the principal part, of the consideration which formed the ground of the contract which had been maintained with the Government. How had it been deprived? The courts were open—had it been summoned into them? The law was in operation—had it been made to act on it as a delinquent corporation? No. No one arraigned it before a tribunal. Nobody brought it to trial for a violation of law. It existed, had its functions, as a corporation, but it was deprived of one of the principal advantages secured to it by its charter, and deprived for such reasons as were before the Senate and before the country. Those persons were not unaware, that if its rights were attacked, it was, and would be always resisted, and those who attempted the usurpation would be rendered odious to the community. Power always sought such subjects upon which to try its experiments. The individuals to whom he had reference, protested against the Executive denunciation of the bank. They protested against the Executive Chief Magistrate raising, waging, and carrying on war against that corporation. They thought they saw the cause that had produced their present distress in the connexion that had existed between the Government and the bank. Might not we distinctly see the origin of that controversy which had so much agitated, and still did agitate the country, and which carried so much distress to every family? Was it not assumed from the beginning, and did it not still assume the character of a warfare between the President of the United States and the government of the Bank of the United States? It had not only been said in the common vehicles of party exultation and commendation, but it had been said within the walls of Congress, that in triumphing over that institution—in conquering it—in bringing it to the feet of the President—he would earn for himself a more flourishing garland, a more glorious victory, than he won by the battle of New Orleans. The sentiment in which that mode of commendation sprung was easy to be seen. He feared there was a love of conquest—a thirst for victorious struggles—a delight in triumphing, which had brought on the conflict between the administration and the bank; while the interests of the people were crushed between active and defensive operations.

The memorialists thought that such a controversy was out of place between the President and the bank—that the origin of his action should be far above it—that neither the bank nor any other corporation should entitle itself to any share of his personal hostility. They therefore protested against the continuance of that war between the Executive on the one hand and the bank on the other, as it was destructive to them—ruined the whole country, and was not a little discreditable to its character in the eyes of the world. They protested against the act of the Executive, in regard to the public treasure, as tending to bring about that state of things which the gentleman from Kentucky had so often presented to the Senate—the union of the purse and the sword. They recognised the Chief Magistrate as the Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; they recognised in Congress the power and duty to guard the national resources; and they thought that the withdrawing of the public revenue from a place fixed by law, settled by the charter of the bank, for reasons connected in no way with the safe-keeping of the moneys, but on account of opinion's sake, was an unauthorized act. After reasoning, and after argument upon the subject, the moneys were acknowledged to be safe. Congress having recently acted on the subject, having seen no reason for the change, they were of opinion, that the reasons given for the removal of the public treasure, were altogether perfectly indefensible. They thought that the effect of the measure was to produce, to augment the rapidity of certain tendencies which they believed had attended the Government for some years past, and that was the tendency to increase power and influence in the Executive hands. They were of opinion, that the substruction of the public revenue from a custody where it was under the eye of Congress, to a custody where it was only under the eye of the Secretary of the Treasury, was one great proof of the existence of that tendency to increase power. Were they not right? Where were the public treasures of the United States? No man in that Senate knew; no man in the other House knew. The last time that the Senate had heard of them, they were deposited in certain banks not created or fixed by its will. They might be changed, for aught the Senate knew, within the last half hour, to some other place, which it knew not. What was (said Mr. W.) the condition of the treasure six months ago. Was it situated as it is now? Did not every member know where the money was then?—and had not Congress an account of it, and could see that it was all there! Had Congress any such right now? Had that House, or the other, the power to go to the Bank of the Metropolis, or to the Manhattan Bank, in order to see that the money deposited in those places was safe? The Executive had now the preservation of the public treasure, and Congress had no control over it. It was a fact not to be denied, that every dollar of the public money—ordinarily eight or ten millions—between the moment of its receipt at the custom-house and the land offices—from the moment of its appropriation under the authority of law, was under the entire, exclusive government of the Secretary of the Treasury—Congress knew not where—Congress declared not how.

The memorialists thought that this withdrawing of the public money from the inspection of Congress, from the guardianship of Congress, and placing it where it was subject to the guardianship and control of the officers of the Executive Government, was an encroachment upon the just rights of both Houses of Congress. They protested against that violation of the spirit of the constitution. They professed themselves to be in favor of a national bank, but that was a matter which they would leave most cheerfully to the wisdom of Congress. They did not insist upon a national bank—that might be a measure of expediency or in expediency—but they did insist that the law should be upheld, that the power of Congress should continue to be exercised in regard to the disposal of the public revenue, and that the public treasure should be under the authority of those who had a right to the control of it, according to law. They declared that in the present state of the country, looking to the effects of those measures, and the extent of the evil, they saw no remedy but in Congress; they saw no remedy till Congress should take up the subject and determine to act by its authority, and establish such measures of relief as its wisdom should dictate. He entirely agreed with them—he agreed with them altogether, that relief must come from Congress, or through Congress. But he wished to say that relief, though it come through the instrumentality of Congress, must have a higher origin. It could not come from the Executive department in the first place: the case was past the surgery of all such practitioners. No state doctors, beginning where they might, or ending where they might, had power over that affliction of an afflicted community. Not one of them could pluck up this deep-rooted disease. It was a case in which the patient must minister to himself. The people must take the remedy into their own hands; they must act on the case through Congress, and he agreed, through the instrumentality, through the agency of Congress, but they must act on the case with their own will and their own power. The spirit, and the only spirit, that could move over the face of those waters, was the power to produce chaos to order; the only spirit that could cause that elemental strife to subside, and the sun again to appear in his East, was the intelligent, manly, free spirit of the American people—summoned all by the state of the country, and by the state of their own interests, to come and put a check to such usurpations of power, and to apply that remedy which they, and they alone, could apply.

Mr. W. then moved that the protest be read and printed, with the names, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SILSBEE said: After the full and impressive remarks of my colleague, I shall detain the Senate no longer than to make a single one; and the single and brief remark to which I shall confine myself, is, that I have long enjoyed a personal acquaintance with some of the individuals whose names are appended to this memorial, as well as with some of those who have brought this memorial here. And there are no individuals known to me, here or any where, whom I think more competent to form correct opinions of the cause and of the effects of the existing pecuniary embarrassments of the country, than some whose names are seen upon this memorial.

Mr. SPRAGUE rose and said, that he had been requested, and although he felt, as he was sure that every one must feel, that it would be an act of supererogation to add any thing to the forcible remarks which had been already made, yet he could not refuse to add his testimony to the high character of the individuals who had transmitted this memorial. He supposed that because he had long enjoyed the acquaintance of many of the signers, and of all of the committee who had borne the memorial hither, it was expected of him that he should offer that testimony.

The Senate had now before them the memorial of about 7,000 of the citizens of the city of Boston, and their testimony to the existing distress; and this testimony might be considered as strong and as emphatic as any which had ever yet reached the Senate, or been presented here by any of the representatives of the people in their places. This testimony came from New England, the land of the primitive pilgrims—from Massachusetts, the first State which moved in that glorious struggle to which he was happy that allusion had been made yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, and which had led in our independence—from Boston, which, in that State, had been the earliest to resist oppression, and to start in the career of liberty. He was not going to attempt any eulogium on that section of the country. The names which he had pronounced were in themselves a higher eulogium than any language could convey, and would carry to every human heart a feeling of impressiveness which no words could increase.

Boston Memorial.—Re-chartering Bank United States.

You, sir, continued Mr. S., who recently have visited those places, in company with the Chief Magistrate—you need no language of mine to impress on you the true character of this people. You have yourself recently stood in the high places in Boston and its vicinity, on the heights of Dorchester on one side of the city, and on Bunker's hill on the other; at Charlestown and at Cambridge. You have there almost had in view the plains of Concord and of Lexington; and have stood where the blood of our fathers called to their descendants, "Sons, scorn to be slaves!"—where that flag was first unfurled which has since floated, in proud triumph, over every wave, and against every foe—in that Faneuil Hall, where the voices of the Adamses, the Hancocks, and the Otises, first breathed into this country the breath of life. You have partaken of the unbounded hospitality of this people, and I am sure you will respond to the sentiment, that that is the land where friends find a welcome, and foes a grave.

If he was not misinformed, (Mr. S. continued,) during that visit, while the Chief Magistrate was reposing in the city of Boston, this disastrous measure had been decided on, which had now brought before the Senate the protest and memorial of 7,000 of these citizens. If he had not been greatly misinformed, the letter of the 25th of June, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, was dated from Boston, during that visit, and at the very time when the person whose name was affixed to it, was confined to his chamber by sickness, in a dark room, and in a condition of entire incapability of physical or intellectual effort. Would to Heaven, that, amidst the scene of uninterrupted prosperity which then surrounded him on all sides, the respect which was every where paid to the authorities of the Union, some strong influence could have withheld his hand from that signature, while such tributes of respect and approbation were tendered to those who were the agents in continuing to us a Government which provided for and protected the general happiness. That people whom the President then saw in a condition of prosperity and gladness had now come hither by thousands, with the language of gloom and sorrow and dismay. It was from the same source, it was under the same roof, as has been so well remarked by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that memorials, protests, and petitions, were transmitted to the British Parliament. Those memorials, protests, and petitions, denounced, at that time, an act of political power, seizing their money without the consent of either themselves or their representatives. The descendants of those people come now, and protest against an act of political power, also seizing their money without their consent, or the consent of their representatives. The memorials, protests, and petitions sent to the British Parliament were contemned. He trusted that a different fate awaited those which were now sent to Congress. The memorialists had come hither because they thought that they lived, or ought to live, under a government of laws. They have come here with faith in law, and in the national legislature, and ask for relief and for redress. It had been remarked, that they did not go to the Executive mansion, they did not pass by the Halls of Congress, to lay their complaints at the feet of the Executive. They believed that the Executive had no right to interfere: and the manner in which the other committees who had come hither were treated by the Chief Magistrate, had prevented them from exposing themselves to similar treatment. Their behaviour to the Chief Magistrate in the city of Boston, shows that they know how to respect the official dignitaries of the country: their refusal now to go to him, shows that they know how to respect themselves.

The memorial was read, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

RE-CHARTERING BANK UNITED STATES.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose and said: I rise, Mr. President, pursuant to notice, to ask leave to bring in a bill to continue, for six years, the act incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; and shall hope for that indulgence of the Senate which is usually granted on such occasions, if I accompany its introduction with some remarks on the general state of the country, as well as on the nature of the measure proposed. If leave be granted, it is my purpose to move to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance, that it may take the usual course, and come up for the consideration of the Senate in due season.

Mr. President, in the midst of ample means of national and individual happiness, we have, unexpectedly, fallen into severe distress. Our course has been suddenly arrested. The general pulse of life stands still, and the activity and industry of the country feel a pause. A vastly extended and beneficent commerce is checked; manufactures suspended, with incalculable injury to those concerned in them; and the labors of agriculture threatened with the loss of their usual reward. Our resources are, nevertheless, at the same time, abundant, and all external circumstances highly favorable and advantageous; such as fairly promised us, not only a continuance of that degree of prosperity which we have actually enjoyed, but its rapid advancement, also, to still higher stages.

The condition of the country is, indeed, singular. It is like that of a strong man chained. In full health, with strength unabated, and all its faculties unimpaired, it is yet incapable of performing its accustomed action. Fetters and manacles are on all its limbs. If we could but unbind it, if we could break these iron chains, if we could once more set it free, it would, in a moment, resume its activity, and go on again in its rapid career. It is our duty, sir, to relieve this restraint, to unshackle the industry of the people, and give play, once more, to their common action and their common energies. The evils, all the evils, which we now feel, and feel so acutely, result from political measures; and by political measures, and political measures alone, can they be redressed. They have their origin in acts of Government, and they must find their cure in other acts of Government.

Only six months ago, sir, the country presented an aspect, in regard to all its great interests, exceedingly satisfactory and gratifying. Our commerce was highly prosperous, and our manufactures, for the present at least, flourishing. Agricultural products commanded fair prices, and the general appearance of things exhibited more than a usual degree of activity. The year elapsing between the autumn of 1832 and that of 1833, was a year of great prosperity. In the activity of commerce, it is possible enough that some degree of overtrading had taken place; but there is nothing to show that great excess had been committed in that particular. In general, the state of things was sound, as well as prosperous. The commerce of the country had reached, I think, to a greater extent than in any former year; the amount of exports for 1833 being, according to the Treasury estimate, no less than ninety millions of dollars, and that of the imports no less than one hundred and nine millions. The internal and coasting trade was in a still more flourishing condition. This branch of the national industry has grown into the very highest importance, affording a vast field for active usefulness, enriching all parts of the country by its mutual exchanges of commodities, and furnishing profitable employment to great numbers of the people. It was carried on last year both by sea and land, with great vigor; and the situation of the currency of the country gave it facilities such as never existed elsewhere over so broad an extent. The money circulation was free, and the banks in good credit. They were doubtless somewhat too economical in the use of specie, and sustained their credit on a basis not sufficiently broad to be quite secure. But no great degree of danger to the circulation was felt, or generally feared.

Such was our condition in September last, and the change which has since taken place must strike all minds. How do we stand now, in respect to these great interests? Let us look to our commerce, the main source of our revenue, as well as a source of wealth, and let us see how that is affected, or likely to be affected by recent occurrences. I have stated the amount of exports and imports for the last year; those for the present cannot, of course, be yet estimated with accuracy, but we are not without some means of forming opinions upon this interesting point. I think it is evident that there must be a falling off in the imports, and consequently a falling off in the revenue. I shall be very glad to find myself mistaken in this opinion, but it appears to me there is much reason to entertain it. As one of the Committee on Finance, I have felt it my duty, of course, to look to the state of the Treasury, and to form some opinion, if I could, of what may be its future condition. Its present state, as we learn from the Secretary's report, with his estimate of the receipts and expenditures of the year, is substantially as follows:

Estimated balance in the Treasury, January 1, 1834,	$7,983,790
But from this deduct the amount of appropriations already made, and which remain unsatisfied, which amount the Secretary supposes may yet be required for the objects for which it was appropriated,	5,190,287
Balance remaining in the Treasury unappropriated,	$2,793,503
Estimated amount of receipts for 1834:
Customs,	$15,000,000
Land,	3,000,000
Bank dividends and miscellaneous,	500,000
	18,500,000
Total of means for the use of 1834,	$21,293,503
Estimated expenditures for 1834,	23,501,994

This statement would seem to exhibit a deficit of more than two millions; and this would doubtless be the result, should the appropriations of the year all be called for within the year; but experience shows that this is not to be expected. What amount of appropriations may remain uncalled for, however, is necessarily uncertain.

Among the expenditures, it is to be observed, is included the sum of five millions, within a fraction, for the payment of the balance of the public debt, which becomes "reimbursable at the commencement of the next year."

The Secretary supposes, even without making any allowance for the effect of recent measures, that the receipts for 1835 will be less than those for 1834; and that, unless the revenue should be more productive than is anticipated, it will be necessary in two years from this time to retrace our steps, and to impose duties on articles which are now free, in order to meet the current expenses of the Government.

If such were the prospects of the country in regard to revenue, before the late measures had so much disturbed its commerce, it cannot but be expected that, under the influence of that cause, there may be a very considerable deficiency, especially should the cause continue.

It is not very easy to ascertain to what extent the importations of the year may fall short of previous importations, in consequence of the disturbed state of things; but I know an opinion is entertained among those who have the best means of forming a correct judgment, that there may be a falling off in the receipts of the customs from a quarter to a third of the amount anticipated. Should this prove to be true, which there is certainly too much reason to fear, Congress may be called on, much earlier than within two years, to furnish additional means of revenue.

The diminution will be mainly felt in the last half of the year, it being generally understood that orders for fall importations have been countermanded to a great extent. It is not thought improbable, that the receipts of the year from customs, estimated at fifteen millions, will fall down to twelve. This, should it happen, would no otherwise disturb the intended course of things, than as it would postpone the payment of the balance of the public debt; but this effect it is not unlikely to produce. On such subjects, however, no very sure anticipations can be founded, and therefore I speak with no positiveness. But it is my expectation that the receipts of the year will fall below the estimate, and probably to the extent I have mentioned; and that this effect will be produced by no other cause than the deranged state of things, occasioned by the removal of the public moneys.

If such be the consequences of the measure on our foreign commerce, and on the revenue, its effect on the internal trade of the country is a thousand times more disastrous. Here, it produces, not only diminution, but stagnation; and such a stagnation as has caused a cessation of production. The industry of the country is arrested, and its useful labor suspended. Great activity prevailed in the manufacturing districts, under a sanguine expectation that the law of the last session would, for a time at least, ensure success to that great interest. But this new measure has struck that interest with a sudden and deadly blow. It is now but little more than twelve months since the manufacturing portion of the community was deeply alarmed by the pendency of a measure in the other House, known usually as Mr. Verplanck's bill. Throughout the Middle and the Northern States, and wherever that interest existed, the apprehension of change in the policy of the country diminished the value of property, embarrassed all calculations for the future, and disturbed and deranged the course of private occupation and industry. But how small was all that evil, compared with the effects produced by the Secretary, when he interfered with the public revenues!

I will not go over the long list of cases, in which prosperous manufacturing establishments have been compelled to discontinue their operations, under the pressure of the times. I will only advert to an instance or two, taken, without selection, from papers and letters before me. Let Paterson, in New Jersey, be one of these instances; the state of which interesting and afflicted town has been, indeed, repeatedly presented to the Senate by the members from that State. The population of Paterson, I believe, is about ten thousand; and it is known to be a population almost exclusively engaged in manufactures. In September last, 43,500 spindles were in operation in it. Of these, 24,500 have stopped, and 5,000 others are expected to stop as soon as stock on hand is worked up. I am informed that the manufacturers at Paterson cannot prevail on their consignees in Philadelphia and New York to come under responsibilities for them, even to the amount of one-third the cost of producing the article. The means, therefore, of paying labor, and purchasing new stock, are completely cut off.

We may see another instance, sufficiently appalling, in the manufactories in New Hampshire. I understand a cotton mill at Dover, of six thousand spindles, has ceased operation, and another was to cease the 15th of this month; a mill with four thousand spindles, at Newmarket, and another at Nashua, of five thousand, have ceased also; and a large woollen mill, at a place called the Great Falls, employing two or three hundred hands, has stopped with the rest. These, sir, are instances of the effect of the experiment upon our manufacturing interests. Accounts similar to these have reached us from New York, Connecticut, Maine, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania. I need not enter into the particulars of these accounts. Their general character is like that of those which I mentioned from New Jersey and New Hampshire.

It is often inquired, how this enormous amount of evil could spring from a cause so apparently inadequate to produce it? Can it be possible, it is asked, that the Secretary has brought about all this distress, simply by removing a few millions of dollars from one bank into other banks. Sir, nothing is more true, and nothing more easily accounted for.

Every commercial country has one great representative constantly passing and acting between all its citizens. This universal representative is money, or credit, in some form, as its substitute. Without this agency nothing can be bought, and nothing can be sold; capital has no income, and labor no reward. It is no more possible to maintain the ordinary business and intercourse between man and man without money and credit, than to maintain an intercourse between nations without ministers or public agents, or to maintain punctual correspondence by letter without the mail. And all the distress which the country now suffers arises solely from acts which have deranged the currency of the country, and the credit of the commercial community. The country is as rich, in its general appearance, as it was before the experiment was begun; that is to say, men have the same houses, lands, ships, and merchandise. But the value of these has fallen; or, to speak more correctly, they have lost the power of being exchanged; and they have lost this power, because of the embarrassment which has befallen the general medium of exchange.

Six months ago a state of things existed, highly prosperous and advantageous to the country, but liable to be injuriously affected by precisely such a cause as has now been put into operation upon it. Business was active, and carried to a great extent. Commercial credit was expanded, and the circulation of money was large. This circulation, being of paper, of course rested on credit; and this credit was founded on banking capital, and bank deposits. The public revenues, from the time of their collection to the time of their disbursement, were in the bank and its branches; and, like other deposits, contributed to the means of discount. Between the Bank of the United States and the State banks, there was a degree of watchfulness, perhaps of rivalry; but there was no enmity, no hostility. All moved in their own proper spheres, harmoniously and in order.

The Secretary disturbed this state of peace. He broke up all the harmony of the system. By suddenly withdrawing all the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, he forced that bank to an immediate correspondent curtailment of its loans and discounts. It was obliged to strengthen itself; and the State banks, taking the alarm, were obliged to strengthen themselves also, by similar measures. So that the amount of credit actually existing, and on which men were doing business, was suddenly greatly diminished. Bank accommodations were withdrawn; men could no longer fulfil their engagements by the customary means; property fell in value; thousands failed; many thousands more maintained their individual credit by enormous sacrifices; and all being alarmed for the future as well as distressed for the present, forbore from new transactions and new engagements. Finding enough to do to stand still, they do not attempt to go forward. This deprives the industrious and laboring classes of their occupations, and brings want and misery to their doors. This, sir, is a short recital of cause and effect. This is the history of the first six months of the "experiment."

Mr. President, the recent measures of the Secretary, and the opinions which are said to be avowed by those who approve and support them, threaten a wild and ruthless attack on the commercial credit of the country, on that most delicate and at the same time most important agent in producing general prosperity. Commercial credit is the creation of modern times, and belongs, in its highest perfection, only to the most enlightened and best governed nations. In the primitive ages of commerce, article is exchanged for article, without the use of money or credit. This is simple barter. But, in its progress, a symbol of property, a common measure of value, is introduced, to facilitate the exchanges of property; and this may be iron, or any other article fixed by law or by consent, but has generally been gold and silver. This, certainly, is a great advance beyond simple barter, but no greater than has been gained, in modern times, by proceeding from the mere use of money to the use of credit. Credit is the vital air of the system of modern commerce. It has done more, a thousand times, to enrich nations, than all the mines of all the world. It has excited labor, stimulated manufactures, pushed commerce over every sea, and brought every nation, every kingdom, and every small tribe, among the races of men, to be known to all the rest. It has raised armies, equipped navies, and, triumphing over the gross power of mere numbers, it has established national superiority on the foundation of intelligence, wealth, and well-directed industry. Credit is to money what money is to articles of merchandise. As hard money represents property, so credit represents hard money; and is capable of supplying the place of money so completely, that there are writers of distinction, especially of the Scotch school, who insist that no hard money is necessary for the interests of commerce. I am not of that opinion. I do not think any Government can maintain an exclusive paper system, without running to excess, and thereby causing depreciation.

I hold the immediate convertibility of bank notes into specie to be an indispensable security to their retaining their value; but, consistently with this security, and, indeed, founded upon it, credit becomes the great agent of exchange. It is allowed that it increases consumption, by anticipating products; and that it supplies present wants out of future means. And as it circulates commodities without the actual use of gold and silver, it not only saves much by doing away with the constant transportation of the precious metals from place to place, but accomplishes exchanges with a degree of despatch and punctuality not otherwise to be attained. All bills of exchange, all notes running upon time, as well as the paper circulation of the banks, belong to the system of commercial credit. They are parts of one great whole. And, sir, unless we are to reject the lights of experience, and to repudiate the benefits which other nations enjoy, and which we ourselves have hitherto enjoyed, we should protect this system with unceasing watchfulness, taking care on the one hand to give it full and fair play, and on the other to guard it against dangerous excess. We shall show ourselves unskillful and unfaithful statesmen if we do not keep clear of extremes on both sides.

It is very true that commercial credit, and the system of banking as a part of it, does furnish a substitute for capital. It is very true that this system enables men to do business, to some extent, on borrowed capital; and those who wish to destroy all such, act wisely to that end by decrying it. This commercial credit, sir, depends on wise laws, steadily administered. Indeed, the best governed countries are always the richest. With good political systems, natural disadvantages, competition, and the world, may all be defied. Without such systems, climate, soil, position, and every thing else may favor the progress of wealth, and yet nations be poor. What but bad laws and bad government has retarded the progress of commerce, credit, and wealth, in the peninsula of Spain and Portugal, a part of Europe distinguished for its natural advantages, and especially suited, by its position, for an extensive commerce, with the sea on three sides of it, and as many good harbors as all the rest of Europe? The whole history of commerce shows that it flourishes or fades, just in proportion as property, credit, and the fruits of labor, are protected by free and just political systems. Credit cannot exist under arbitrary and rapacious governments, and commerce cannot exist without credit. Tripoli, and Tunis, and Algiers, are countries, above all others, in which hard money is indispensable; because, under such governments, nothing is valuable which cannot be secreted and hoarded. And as government rises in the scale of intelligence and liberty, from these barbarous despotisms to the highest rank of free states, its progress is marked, at every step, by a higher degree of security and of credit. And this undeniable truth should make well-informed men ashamed to cry out against banks and banking, as being aristocratical, oppressive to the poor, or partaking of the character of dangerous monopoly. Banks are a part of the great system of commercial credit, and have done much, under the influence of good government, to aid and elevate that credit. What is their history? Where do we first find them? Do they make their first appearance in despotic governments, and show themselves as inventions of power to oppress the people? The first bank was that of Venice; the second that of Genoa. From the example of these republics, they were next established in Holland and the free city of Hamburg. England followed these examples, but not until she had been delivered from the tyranny of the Stuarts, by the revolution of 1688. It was William the Deliverer, and not William the Conqueror, that established the Bank of England. Who supposes that a Bank of England could have existed in the times of Empson and Dudley? Who supposes that it could have lived under those ministers of Charles II who shut up the exchequer, or that its vaults could have been secure against the arbitrary power of the brother and successor of that monarch?

The history of banks belongs to the history of commerce and the general history of liberty. It belongs to the history of those causes which, in a long course of years, raised the middle and lower orders of society to a state of intelligence and property, in spite of the iron sway of the feudal system. In what instance have they endangered liberty, or overcome the laws? Their very existence, on the contrary, depends on the security and the rule both of liberty and law. Why, sir, have we not been taught, in our earliest reading, that, to the birth of a commercial spirit, to associations for trade, to the guilds and companies formed in the towns, we are to look for the first appearance of liberty, from the darkness of the middle ages; for the first faint blush of that morning which has grown brighter and brighter till the perfect day has come? And it is just as reasonable to say that bills of exchange are dangerous to liberty, that promissory notes are dangerous to liberty, that the power of regulating the coin is dangerous to liberty, as that credit, and banking, as a part of credit, are dangerous to liberty.

Sir, I hardly know a writer on these subjects who has not selected the United States as an eminent and striking instance, to show the advantages of well-established credit, and the benefit of its expansion, to a degree not incompatible with safety, by a paper circulation. Or, if they do not mention the United States, they describe just such a country, that is to say, a new and fast-growing country. Hitherto, it must be confessed, our success has been great. With some breaks and intervals, our progress has been rapid, because our system has been good. We have preserved and fostered credit, till all have become interested in its further continuance and preservation. It has run deep and wide into our whole system of social life. Every man feels the vibration when a blow is struck upon it. And this is the reason why nobody has escaped the influence of the Secretary's recent measure. While credit is delicate, sensitive, easily wounded, and more easily alarmed, it is also infinitely ramified, diversified, extending every where, and touching every thing.

There never was a moment in which so many individuals felt their own private interest to be directly affected by what has been done, and what is to be done. There never was a moment, therefore, in which so many straining eyes were turned towards Congress. It is felt by every one, that this is a case in which the acts of the Government come directly home to him, and produce either good or evil, every hour, upon his personal and private condition. And how is the public expectation met? How is this intense, this agonized expectation answered? I am grieved to say, I am ashamed to say, it is answered by declamation against the bank, as a monster, by loud cries against moneyed aristocracy, by pretended zeal for a hard money system, and by professions of favor and regard to the poor.

The poor! We are waging war for the benefit of the poor! We slay that monster, the bank, that we may defeat the unjust purposes of the rich, and elevate and protect the poor! And what is the effect of all this? What happens to the poor and all the middling classes, in consequence of this warfare? Where are they? Are they well fed, well clothed, well employed, independent, happy, and grateful? They are all at the feet of the capitalists; they are in the jaws of usury. If there be hearts of stone in human bosoms, they are at the mercy of those who have such hearts in their breasts. Look to the rates of interest, amounting to twenty, thirty, fifty per cent. Sir, this measure of Government has transferred millions upon millions of hard-earned property, in the form of extra interest, from the industrious classes to the capitalists, from the poor to the rich. And this is called putting down a moneyed aristocracy! Sir, there are thousands of families who have diminished, not their luxuries, not their amusements, but their meat and their bread, that they might be able to save their credit, by paying enormous interest. And there are other thousands who, having lost their employment, have lost every thing, and who yet hear, amidst the bitterness of their anguish, that the great motive of Government is kindness to the poor!

It is difficult, sir, to restrain one's indignation, when, to so much keen distress, there is added so much which has the appearance of mere mockery. Sir, let the system of the administration go on, and we shall soon not know our country. We shall see a new America. On the map where these United States have stood, we shall behold a country that will be strange to us. We shall see a class of idle rich and a class of idle poor; the former a handful, the latter a host. We shall no longer behold a community of men, with spirits all active and stirring, contributing, all of them, to the public welfare, while they partake in it, pushing on their fortunes and bettering their own condition, and helping to swell, at the same time, the cup of the general prosperity to overflowing. We shall see no more of that credit which reaches out its hand to honest enterprise; of that certainty of reward which cheers on labor to the utmost stretch of its sinews; of that personal and individual independence which enables every man to say that no man is his master. Sir, I will not look on the picture. I will not imagine what spectacle shall be exhibited, when this country not only halts in her onward march, but recedes; when she tracks back in the long and rapid strides of her forward movement; when she sets herself to undo all that she has done; when she renounces the good she has attained; when she obstructs credit, destroys enterprise, arrests commerce, and smothers manufactures.

Re-chartering Bank United States.

Mr. President: I confess I find it difficult to respect the intelligence, and, at the same time, the motives of those who alarm the people with the cry of danger to their liberties from the bank. Do they see the same danger from other banks? I think not. With them, bank capital and bank credit is dangerous or harmless, according to circumstances. It is a lion, whose conduct and character appear to depend on his keeper. Under the control of this Government, it is fearful and dangerous; but under State authority, it "roars as gently as a sucking dove; it roars as it were any nightingale."

Both the members from New York have labored to persuade us that the public liberties of this whole country are in imminent danger from a bank with thirty-five millions. And yet, sir, they feel no fears for the liberty of the people of their own State, with a banking capital of twenty-three millions, and a proposed addition of ten millions, all lodged in banks associated under the safety-fund system, and all under the supervision of a political board appointed by the Government. In all this they see no danger to liberty; but their anxiety is intense, lest a bank of thirty-five millions should enslave all the people of the twenty-four States.

Again, sir, from the time of the veto message to the present moment, the country has been assailed with the cry of danger, from the small portion of foreign capital which is in the stock of the bank. Republicanism, it is said, cannot exist in a country where there is a bank with dukes and marquises and lords among its stockholders. And yet, sir, have we not seen the Executive approving of an enormous loan by the cities of this District from Dutch capitalists, and sanctioning a law binding down all their citizens, and all their property, to pay the interest of this foreign debt, by provisions vastly more strict and severe than those which compel the payment of taxes to their own Government? And is not Pennsylvania now deliberating whether she will not send an agent to Europe to borrow money to meet that very exigency which the present state of things creates? And is not the new bank, too, proposed to be established in New York, to be created on foreign capital?

Sir, are arguments of this nature altogether creditable to the country? Do they exhibit us in a respectable light abroad? Do intelligent observers, elsewhere, behold our public men addressing themselves to the people in fair discussion on the real merits of public questions; or may they not think rather, that they see them attempting to carry favorite measures of party by false cries of danger to liberty?

The truth is, that banks, every where, and especially with us, are made for the borrowers. They are made for the good of the many, and not the good of the few. Even their ownership, to a very great extent, is in the hands of men of moderate property. I have read a very able speech, by Mr. Cushing, in the legislature of Massachusetts, in which he states that he has taken pains to examine the list of stockholders in several banks in his neighborhood, and he finds a majority of the stock (I think more than two-thirds) in the hands of charitable societies, guardians, widows, and traders with small capital. And, sir, at this moment, the stockholders of the Bank of the United States have infinitely less interest in the questions which we are discussing, as stockholders, than they have as citizens of the country. The stock is constantly in the market, and daily changing hands; and any one who wishes for it may always buy it. It is not permanently vested in any hands; and this of itself shows that the corporation is, in its nature, incapable of prosecuting any purpose hostile to the public liberties. Indeed, sir, I think it time, high time, that there should be a pause in this outcry against the bank, as dangerous from its political power, or as favoring wealth in its masses rather than in its distribution. Sir, prejudice, excited against the bank, is a much more powerful engine for political purposes than the bank itself. It is more than a match for ten banks. Not long ago, a member, not now with us, declared on this floor, that, in the course of his political struggles, some years ago, he felt sure triumph the moment an impression was made that the bank had taken part against him; and that if he were again to be a candidate, he should wish for no surer pledge of success. His own experience, thus candidly stated, seems not to have been lost on others. I full well know, sir, the power of such prejudices. I know how easily they may be excited, and how potent is their agency. Efforts to excite them, and calculations on their efficacy, when excited, have sometimes succeeded, and must be expected sometimes to succeed in popular governments. They are among the means by which little men occasionally become great. But they are not among the means by which lasting character is to be attained, any more than they are among the means by which substantial and important public service is to be rendered to the country.

I now proceed, Mr. President, to the state of opinion existing both in and out of Congress, as to the remedy proper for the present condition of things.

There are three classes of persons, holding on this subject different opinions.

1. Those who believe a bank to be constitutional and necessary, and, seeing no danger from the present institution, would prefer, if they could follow their own choice, to re-charter the bank for the usual period, with the usual powers; modified, however, in any manner that the experience of the past may suggest.

2. There are those who think a bank useful, but who do not believe Congress has the power to incorporate a bank, under any form.

3. There are those who admit the power of Congress to make a bank, and are in favor of some bank, but oppose the continuance of the present.

It is obvious, sir, that if any relief come to the country, it must proceed from some degree of union between these classes, or some of them.

And the question is, Is there any common ground on which these can meet? Is there any expedient which they will consent to lay hold on to save the country? Or will they leave it a prey to their differences of opinion?

Now, sir, among those who oppose those measures of Government which have brought the present distress on the country, a great majority would prefer a continuance of the charter of the present bank for the usual term. This would be their wish, and I am one of them. We passed a bill for such a re-charter, through both Houses, two years ago, but it was negatived by the President. I would prefer a bank of fifteen or twenty years' duration; either this or a new one; for I do not act from a regard to the pecuniary interest of the stockholders in the present bank, although I would not consent to do them any injustice.

But, sir, I see no chance of renewing this charter, at present, for a long period. It appears to me that the minds of members of Congress are in a state to render this hopeless. I give up, therefore, my own preference; I sacrifice my opinions to that necessity which I feel to be imposed upon me by the condition of the country. I go for relief, for efficient relief, and for immediate relief. I feel this to be demanded of me by every dictate of duty and patriotism, and by the loud voice of the country. I obey that voice, and cheerfully yield every thing to the accomplishment of the object. When I ask others to make sacrifices, I begin with making them myself.

Preferring a permanent measure, I yet agree to a temporary measure. Desirous of settling the question for a length of years, I yet consent to leave it open, in the hope of obtaining present relief and security; and I earnestly entreat all those with whom I have generally concurred in opinion, to concur in a temporary measure. If we cannot do all we would, let us do what we can. Let us make a proposition which no reasonable man, who really desires to relieve the country, can object to. That is my object, and with that single object have I prepared this bill.

And now, sir, I will say a word to the gentlemen who have constitutional scruples about all banks. They find a bank actually existing. They find that this bank, or another like it, has existed through more than three-fourths of the whole period of our Government. They find Congress to have asserted the constitutional power to establish a bank, over and over again; they find all the judicial tribunals to have sanctioned the power, and four-fifths of the State legislatures, and as great a proportion of the people to have confirmed it. Now, sir, as sensible and candid men, they cannot say that it is a clear case against the power. They must admit there is some reason for supposing the power to exist. The most they can say is, that the bank stands on a doubtful authority. Now, suppose that to be true. Let it be admitted that the bank stands on a doubtful title. Does it follow that they must suddenly destroy it? Will not they give it time to wind up its affairs, without producing excessive injury to the people? Shall it be brought to a sudden termination, at whatever cost, at whatever ruin to the public happiness?

Besides, sir, if the bank be unconstitutional, what is that state of things into which the country must fall, when the bank charter expires? Can any thing be more unconstitutional than that state of things?

Again, sir, I must say, that some of those States, now most opposed to the bank on constitutional ground, helped to make it. Look to New York; look even to Virginia: these States had much more hand in creating this bank than Massachusetts. In 1816, there was no majority in the two Houses of Congress of the members from Virginia opposed to the bank on constitutional grounds. Virginia actually gave much more support to it than Massachusetts, and a Virginia President approved the bill. May not a degree of forbearance, then, be justly expected, even though the opinion should now be, that the bank stands on a doubtful right? Sir, it is enough to state these suggestions, without arguing them at length, to candid and honorable men.

I do not, on this occasion, argue the question of the power of Congress to make a bank, but I cannot but recur to the strong view presented of the question the other day by the honorable member from Vermont near me, [Mr. PAXTON.] Congress, said he, having, by express grant, the power to regulate commerce between the several States, if money, if currency, silver or paper, be a thing essential to commerce, how can they regulate the commerce without regulating the currency of the country? And if the constitution of the United States does allow the States to create banks, with power to issue paper, and Congress still may not control or regulate that paper, either by a bank of its own, or any other just means, how can it be said that Congress has power to regulate commerce between the States? These are questions, sir, which I cannot answer.

In the next place, sir, as I have said, there are those who are for a new bank.

Sir, gentlemen may well be for a new bank, but they cannot be for that and for nothing else, if they really intend to relieve the country. No new bank can be established before 1836. This we all know. And what are we to do in the mean time? I am not against a new bank, when the proper time comes to make it, if that shall be the general voice of the country; but it is idle to talk of a new bank now. Those cannot feel the exigency of the moment, they do not realize the pressure of the times, who talk of a new bank, and nothing but a new bank. Let them bring forward a project for a new bank whenever they please; but let us, in the mean time, not suffer the present distress of the country to go on, and to increase, for the want of a more immediate measure. I do not object to take the question of a new bank into consideration at any time, either in this Congress or the next; but I do object to holding out any hope to the country of immediate relief from such a measure, because we know it cannot afford such relief. We are in an emergency. Great interests are in danger of being overwhelmed; we need some plank, something to lay hold on, to buoy us up, and keep our heads above water, until more effectual and permanent provision for our safety can be made.

I will now, sir, state the general substance of the bill which I ask leave to introduce.

The first section proposes to continue the present bank for six years, but with this provision, viz. that so much of the present charter as gives the bank an exclusive right shall not be continued, but that Congress may make any other bank, if it see fit, to come into existence at any time after 1836.

This is the great feature of the bill. It continues the bank for a short period, and takes away the exclusive right. Congress is thus left at perfect liberty to make another bank whenever it chooses. When the present agitation shall have subsided, when a day of calm consideration comes, and the people have had time for deliberation, then Congress may make a permanent provision, satisfactory to itself and to the country. Can any thing be more reasonable than this? Can the bitterest enemy of the present bank refuse to give it time to wind up its affairs without distress to the people? Can the most ardent advocate of a new bank refuse, meantime, to allow the country to relieve itself, by the use of the present, until a new one shall be established?

Sir, I am not dealing in plausibilities only. I mean to leave the whole question, between this bank and a new one, fairly open. I mean to give to neither any manner of advantage. If Congress establish a new bank, it may easily go into operation while the present is gradually retiring from operation, and the business of the country will feel no violent shock.

I mean to give the present bank no claim to a renewal; but, on the contrary, the only new power conferred on it by this bill, is a power to enable it to wind up its concerns.

As to the time, I think six years not too long. If we were now certain that a new bank would come into existence in 1836, I think it would be convenient, for all parties, that this bank should have six years to run. The new bank would hardly get into full operation under a year or two, and time is absolutely necessary to enable this bank gradually to collect its debts. A hastened collection must distress the people. With an existing debt of fifty-five millions, and pressed and solicited, on all sides, still further to extend its loans, in order to relieve the country, all must see that the affairs of the bank cannot be closed without intolerable pressure on the community, unless time be given for that purpose. But, if six years be thought too long, I will consent to five, or to four. My own opinion is, that six years is not too long.

The second section provides, that the public moneys, becoming due after the 1st of July, shall be deposited in the bank and its branches, as heretofore, subject, however, at any time after this act shall be accepted, to be removed by order of Congress. If Congress shall establish a new bank, they will of course remove the deposits into it. The effect of this provision will be to give to Congress, at all times, what rightfully belongs to them—a full control over the public purse. It separates that purse from the sword, and re-establishes the just authority of the legislature.

Then comes the section by which the bank is to pay $200,000 a year, for each of the six years, as compensation for the benefits of a continuance of its charter. This provision is adopted from the bill of 1832. For one,

Re-chartering Bank United States.

[MARCH 18, 1834.]

I should have been willing that a fixed per centage should have been paid, instead of this bonus, to be divided among the States, according to numbers; but others objected to this, and I have sought to avoid all new causes of difference.
